IV. God’s everlasting love to his people and his gratuitous election of them to grace and glory, constituted another branch of that doctrine which was taught and preached by Jesus Christ the righteous. He declared in a solemn address to his Father, made in the hearing of his disciples, Thou hast loved them as thou hast loved me (q). Now the Father’s love to Christ was truly and properly eternal. It knew no commencement nor will know a period. For it follows in the very next verse, Thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world. Consequently if the Father loved his people as he loved his Son, he must, according to our Lord’s own words, have loved them from everlasting. Hence proceeded his choice and appointment of them in Christ to eternal life as the end; and to faith and sanctification as the means. That he has so chosen and appointed them is evident from the express repeated declarations of Christ himself. I thank thee, says he, holy Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes; even so Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight (r). Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to them it is not given (s). Many are called, but few chosen (t). Shall not God avenge his own elect who cry day and night unto him (u)? Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven (v). To sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, except (y) unto those for whom it hath been prepared of my Father. I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen (z). There shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders: inasmuch that if it were possible they should deceive the very elect (a). For the elects’ sake whom he hath chosen he will shorten those days (b). He shall send his angels, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from under one end of heaven to the other (c). Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world (d). On which passages and a multitude of others to the same effect, all of which strongly assert a personal and immutable election; I do not know a more scriptural and judicious comment than those words of our own Church: “Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby, before the foundations of the worlds were laid, he hath constantly decreed, by his counsel secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation as vessels made to honour (e).” Of these “vessels made unto honour,” she declares the Church at large to consist: “The true Church” says she “is an universal congregation or fellowship of God’s faithful and elect people (f).” Hence, in perfect harmony with Scripture and herself, she prays that God would, “make his chosen people joyful (g).” that he would “shortly accomplish the number of his elect (h);” and declares that “Almighty God hath knit together his elect in one communion and fellowship, in the mystical body of his Son Christ our Lord (i).” Neither doth this blessed doctrine, if taken as it is revealed in Scripture, and as it stands thence adopted by the Church, tend either directly or remotely to the relaxation of human diligence, or to the detriment of good works. The apostle hath declared that we are chosen to salvation (k) through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth, and no otherwise. And the Church, who justly affirms, on one hand, that “The godly consideration of predestination and of our election in Christ, is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons (l); and takes care on the other, to remind her children in the second homily on almsgiving, that it is “by their obedience unto God that they declare openly and manifestly to the sight of men that they are the sons of God, and elect of him unto salvation.”

V. The covenant of grace and redemption which subsisted between the three divine persons, before all worlds, in behalf of the Church and people of God, held a distinguished place in that scheme of doctrine preached by the Lord from heaven. He termed his precious blood the blood of the new covenant (m): because he shed it in consequence of his own voluntary stipulation with the Father and the Spirit. He told his disciples, I covenant a kingdom unto you as my Father covenanted unto me (n). A little before his last sufferings he said, Father, the hour is come (o): the tremendous, the important hour agreed and fixed upon, when the counsel of peace was between us both. I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do (p); and which I promised to execute when I entered into covenant with thee for the salvation of lost sinners. One of the last words he uttered on the cross was, It is finished (q): I have accomplished all my fœderal engagements, and completed the designs of grace, for which the Lord God and his Spirit sent me (r) into the world.

Nor does our excellent establishment lose sight of this momentous article. She makes express mention of God's "counsel secret to us." (s) She declares that Christ "took upon him," or engaged and stipulated, "to deliver man." (t) She directs us to "give most humble and hearty thanks to God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, for the redemption of the world, by the death of Christ; (u) because that redemption was founded on a previous treaty, in which all the three persons were mutually concerned. For what was the covenant of grace but the concurring will and determination of Father, Son, and Spirit, to save sinners by the intervention of a Mediator? "When the fulness of time was come, that is, says our Church, the perfection and course of years appointed from the beginning, then God, according to his former covenant and promise, sent a Messiah (x). She adds, that "Christ the Son of God did, by the appointment of his Father, come down from heaven, to be wounded for our sakes (y):" and reminds us, elsewhere, that our "freedom is purchased with the price of the precious blood of Jesus Christ, who was ordained to the same purpose before the world was made (z)." The covenant of redemption proceeded on a certain and infallible foresight of the fall of man. Hence we need not wonder,

VI. That Christ took care to inculcate the doctrine of original sin. He plainly alluded to the event of the temptation in paradise, when he termed the instrument of it a liar, and a murderer from the beginning (a). In declaring that which is born of the flesh is flesh (b), he gives us to understand that all mankind are, by nature, destitute of that moral image of God in which their first father was created. He represents this universal, hereditary corruption of the human race as the source whence every actual sin proceeds: From within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness; all these evil things come from within, and defile the man (c). Well, therefore, might he observe to Nicodemus, Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again; for, except a man be born again, born from above, inwardly and outwardly renewed by the supernatural power of the blessed Spirit, whose purifying agency resembles that of water, he cannot see the kingdom of God; (d) he can neither be a subject of the kingdom of grace here, nor have a part and lot in the kingdom of glory hereafter. Warranted by these express and solemn asseverations of Christ, the Church affirms that "original, or birth sin, is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man who naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is [quàm longisimè] gone as far as possible from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil." (e) So in the first part of the homily for Whitsunday, she draws this double portrait of man in the state of nature, and of man in a state of grace: "Man of his own nature is fleshly and carnal, corrupt and naught, sinful and disobedient to God; without any spark of goodness in him, without any virtuous or godly motion, only given to evil thoughts and wicked deeds. As for the works of the Spirit, the fruits of faith, charitable and godly motions; if he have any at all in him, they proceed only of the Holy Ghost, who is the only worker of our sanctification, and maketh us new men in Christ Jesus. Such is the power of the Holy Ghost to regenerate men, and, as it were, to bring them forth anew; so that they shall be nothing like the men they were before."

VII. Pardon of sin by the sacrifice of

(m) Called "The new Covenant," not in respect of its date (for it is truly and properly eternal), but with respect to the revelation of it to Adam. The covenant of grace made with Christ before all worlds (Gal. iii. 16. 2 Tim. i. 9. Tit. i. 2.), was not discovered and made known to our first parents, until after they had broken the covenant of works; which latter being first revealed, is therefore styled The Old Covenant. Adverting to which important distinction, i. e. with a view (not to the manifestation but) to the real date of the covenant of redemption, himself, and by the atonement of his own propitiatory sufferings and death, was another of those truths which he taught and preached.

Prior to Adam's fall, the law insisted only on a sinless, persevering obedience, as the term and condition of our ultimate salvation. But man being fallen, the law steps in with another demand on us, a demand super-added to the former; namely, that we suffer that penalty which the broken covenant of works denounces against every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them. From this penalty nothing could exempt us but the substitution of Jesus Christ to bear it in our stead. And blessed be the riches of his grace, he, who knew no sin, was made sin, a sin-bearer and a sin-offering for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. He hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, by his own blood, being made a curse for us. Hence he averred, that his blood was shed for many, for the remission of sins; (f) and that the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life ανταλυτρον, a substitutionary ransom for many (g). In exactly the same point of view does the Church consider the nature and efficacy of his atoning blood. "He came," says our fifteenth Article, "to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world." She testifies that God gave his "only Son to be unto us a sacrifice for sin," as well as "an example of godly life (h);" and, treating professedly of the "perfect redemption," accomplished by his most precious death, avers that "there is no other satisfaction for sin, but that alone (i)."

VIII. The justification of sinners by his own imputed righteousness is, likewise, a doctrine which Jesus taught. Justification is that gracious act of God by which he reckons and esteems a person perfectly righteous, and finally rewards him as such. Now God, whose judgment is always according to truth, (k) can never deem any man perfectly righteous who is not, in some way or other, possessed of a perfect righteousness. But, all mankind being tainted with original defilement, which even the grace of regeneration does not fully exterminate during the present life, since, in our native state, we are totally sinful, and, in our renewed state, sanctified but in part; it follows that no man is, in himself, completely righteous. As, therefore, forgiveness of sin can only flow to us through the channel of Christ's imputed sufferings; so, justification, or acceptance with God, can only flow to us through the channel of Christ's imputed obedience.

By imputation, I mean God's graciously placing that to our account which we did not personally do. Whoever denies the imputation of Christ's sufferings to us men, is a Socinian in the essential import of the word. And whoever denies the imputation of Christ's own personal obedience must, to be consistent, deny the imputation of Christ's own personal sufferings. You must admit the imputation of both, or you virtually disallow the imputation of either: for if it be deemed unreasonable that God should justify sinners by a righteousness which they themselves did not perform; what will become of that doctrine which affirms that sinners are pardoned through a ransom which they themselves did not pay, and by a death which they themselves did not undergo? Explode, therefore, the imputation of Christ's righteousness, and we are, that instant, in the very gall of Socinianism: for the atonement itself stands on one and the same basis with the other. The language of the moral law is inflexibly this: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength; and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Do this, and live: but if thou sin, thou diest. Obey me perfectly, and I pronounce thee justified: break me in any one point, and I pronounce you condemned as guilty of all." But where is the man (Christ only excepted) who ever did love God with all his heart and strength? where is the person who practically loves his neighbour as himself, and who has never broken the law so much as in one point? Consequently, not a single descendent from Adam can be justified by his own obedience to the moral law. We must, if justified at all, be clothed, by imputation, with the obedience of him who alone, strictly speaking, fulfilled all righteousness; or yielded such a conformity to the law as was perfect in all its parts, and perfect in the highest degree. Hence he directs us to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness (l): the kingdom of God the Son, as our portion, and an interest in the righteousness of God the Son, as the procuring cause of it. He shewed the utter impossibility of being justified by human works, and the absolute necessity of our being clothed with a better righteousness than our own, in those parts of his sermon on the mount wherein he explained the spirituality and extent of the moral law. By declaring, that causeless and immoderate anger are murder (m), in the estimation of God; that mere concupiscence is adultery, in the eye of uncreated purity; and that even to speak a contemptuous word to our neighbour brings us, according to the strict tenor of God's perfect law, in danger of hell-fire (n); he gives us to understand, that by the deeds of the law no flesh living can be justified. When our Lord speaks of that wedding garment (o), by which we have free access unto the Father; and of that best robe (p), in which his repenting people stand faultless before the throne; he means, I dare believe, that righteousness of God incarnate, which is to all and upon all them that believe (q). Very express is the decision of the Church concerning this essential branch of Christian doctrine: "We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith; and not for our own works or deservings (r)."

 She lays it down as a most certain truth, that "God made his blessed Son obedient to the law for man." (s) She quotes and adopts that remark of St. Basil, that "Paul gloried in the contempt of his own righteousness, and that he looked for the righteousness of God by faith (t)."
 Nay, she affirms, in so many words, that "Christ is now the righteousness of all them who truly believe in him. He for them paid their ransom by his death; he for them fulfilled the law in his life; so that now, in him and by him, every true Christian man may be called a fulfiller of the law (u)."
 Supported by such positive evidence, I will venture to pronounce that the man who denies justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ is, in the strictest acceptance of the term, a dissenter from the Church of England. Every real member of that Church will and does adopt that usual saying of one of its brightest ornaments, "Had I all the faith of the patriarchs, all the zeal of the prophets, all the good works of the apostles, all the holy sufferings of the martyrs, and all the glowing devotion of the seraphs; I would disclaim the whole, in point of dependance, and count all but dross and dung, when compared with the infinitely precious death and the infinitely meritorious righteousness of Jesus Christ my Lord."

IX. The doctrine of effectual vocation and conversion, by the influence of insuperable grace, stands high on the list of the doctrines taught by Christ. All that the Father giveth me shall come to me (x), or be made to believe in me, to the saving of their souls. The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead, the dead in sin, shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and, hearing, they shall live (y): live to God below; and live with God, when their spirits return to him that gave them. Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold, who are not within the pale of Judaism; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one flock and one shepherd (z). To the same effect speaks the Church: "Wherefore they that be indued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called, according to God's purpose, by his Spirit working in due season (a)."

 Nor can any thing be more truly apostolical than that solemn caveat which she enters against the imaginary powers of free-will, in the first part of the homily concerning repentance: "Even so must we beware and take heed, that we do in no wise think in our hearts, imagine, or believe, that we are able to repent aright, or to turn effectually unto the Lord, by our own might and strength. For this must be verified in all men, Without me ye can do nothing. Again: Of ourselves we are not able so much as to think a good thought. And, in another place, It is God that worketh in us both the will and the deed. For this cause, although Jeremy had said before, If thou return, O Israel, return unto me, saith the Lord; yet afterwards he saith, Turn thou me, O Lord; and I shall be turned, for thou art the Lord my God. And therefore that ancient writer and holy father Ambrose, doth plainly affirm that the turning of the heart unto God is of God: as the Lord himself doth testify by his prophet, saying, And I will give thee a heart to know me, that I am the Lord; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return to me with their whole heart."—In her public addresses to God, the Church acknowledges that it is from him "All holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works, do proceed (b); and that it is he "Who maketh us both to will and to do those things that be good and acceptable to his divine majesty (c)."

Inseparable from the grace of effectual calling, are,

X. The sanctifying agency and constant inhabitation of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of them that believe.

Cyrus is reported to have said to Cræsus, "The chests in which I keep my riches are the hearts and affections of my people." With still greater truth may it be said that the souls of the regenerate are the repositories in which God lays up the riches of his grace. His best treasure is in the hearts of his people: for there himself resides. If I depart, said Christ, I will send the comforter unto you: and when he is come, he will convince the world, i. e. the elect believing world, of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment (d). He convinces of sin, by making his people sensible of their native unbelief and total sinfulness. He convinces of righteousness, by pointing out to their view, and leading them to rely upon, that vicarious obedience of one, even of Christ, through the imputation of which many are made righteous (e) before God. He convinces of judgment, by turning the soul from dead works to serve the living and true God. Satan is, as it were, brought to the bar, judged, found guilty of usurpation, and deposed (f) from the throne of the converted sinner's heart: who, thenceforward, is enabled to live, not to himself, but to the glory of that Saviour who died for him, and rose again.

Nor does the blessed Spirit cease to dwell in those who are born again of him. I will pray the Father, and he will give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you (g). Nor must we consider this promise as peculiar to the apostles: for the gracious Promiser declares, He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his heart shall flow rivers of living water; his consolations shall abound, and the overflowing streams of practical godliness shall enrich and adorn the whole of his conversation: this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive (h).

This divine influence, its intrinsic efficacy, and practical effects, are strongly recognized by our national Church. She teaches us to pray that "we, being regenerate, and made the children of God by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by the Holy Spirit;" that we may, "by the same Spirit, have a right judgment in all things, and evermore rejoice in his holy comfort (i)." She describes "godly persons" to be such as "feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the deeds of the flesh, and drawing up their minds to high and heavenly things (k)." She avers that, by the blessed Spirit of God, "the whole body of the Church is governed and sanctified (l);" and adopts this acknowledgment for her own, "No man can know thy pleasure, except thou givest wisdom, and sendest thy Holy Spirit from above. Send him down, therefore, from the holy heavens, and from the throne of thy majesty, that he may be with me, and labour with me, that so I may know what is acceptable before thee (m)." From this government and sanctification of the Holy Spirit, proceeds,

XI. That never-failing stream of good works which Christ so constantly enforced, and which all true believers are so careful to maintain. Every good tree, says our Lord, every soul made good by the grace of God, bringeth forth good fruit (n).—Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you (o).—He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me (p). Nor does the Church speak a different language: "Here is now that glass wherein thou must behold thyself, and discern whether thou hast the Holy Ghost within thee, or the spirit of the flesh. If thou see that thy works be virtuous and good, consonant to the prescript rule of God's word, savouring and tasting not of the flesh, but of the Spirit; then assure thyself that thou art endued with the Holy Ghost: otherwise, in thinking well of thyself, thou dost nothing else but deceive thyself (q)."

XII. That real sanctification and good works are crowned with the grace of final perseverance is most expressly taught by Christ. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father, who gave them me, is greater than all, and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand (r). As for those who fall away from the profession they once made, our Lord roundly ascribes it to their having had no root in themselves (s): they had the appearance of grace, but not the truth of grace. Hence he will declare to those on his left hand, Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity; I never knew you (t): whereas, if any of those that perish had, once, savingly known him, and been known by him, they might resort, "Yes, Lord, thou didst know us once, and we knew thee, prior to our making shipwreck of salvation." But this will be impossible for any of them to say. Consequently, the doctrine which affirms the perpetuity of grace stands immovable on the pillars of infallible truth. No wonder, then, that the Church should assert, "Christ Jesus, the prophets, the apostles, and all the true ministers of his word; yea, every jot and tittle in the holy Scripture; have been, are, and shall be for evermore, the savour of life unto eternal life, unto all those whose hearts God hath purified by true faith (u)." Nor does this view of things open (as is falsely affirmed) a door to disobedience and remissness. It no more follows, because a true Christian cannot fall finally from grace that he may therefore come down from his watch-tower and commit sin with (x) safety; than it will follow, that our Lord might have thrown himself from the battlements of the temple, because it was written that God would give his angels charge concerning him to bear him in their hands. And how can it be thought that this important truth leads to licentiousness, when we lay down this as a fundamental maxim, that none have any shadow of pretence to consider themselves interested in the blessing of perseverance, but those only who manifest that interest by being inwardly conformed to God, and outwardly observant of his commandments?

The nation were convinced of judgment: i. e. convinced of the judgment, or sentence of deprivation, which had passed on the former king; and that their allegiance was, thenceforward, transferred to another sovereign. Much such a revolution, spiritually speaking, ensues in the hearts and lives of those who, by the energy of renewing grace, are turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

(t) Then will I [ὁμολογήσω] solemnly aver unto them, I never [οὐδέποτε] at any time knew you: Matt. vii. 23. That ὁμολογέω is sometimes rendered by affirmo, testor, voveo, stands in no need of proof. What a shocking tenet, then, must that be which affirms the defectibility of real grace, in direct contrariety to that public and solemn asseveration, which Christ himself will make at the last tremendous audit, in the hearing of angels and men.

XIII. The doctrine of God's unlimited particular providence, in the support, government, and direction of all things without exception, makes an eminent branch of the Christian system, as taught by Christ. We find him thanking his Father as the Lord of heaven and earth (y). We hear him declare that man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God (z). Nay, that the very hairs of our head are all numbered (a) by him who made them. That it is God who maketh his sun to rise, and rain to descend (b): That he feedeth the fowls of the air, and clothes the herbage of the fields (c); and that a single sparrow falleth not to the ground without our Father's (d) will and direction. Much less can events of a superior kind, and of still more important consequence, come to pass at random or by accident; witness those words of Christ to Pilate: Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it was given thee from above (e). No less peremptory and explicit is the Church in her denial of chance, and in her recognition of absolute Providence. God, says she, "worketh all things in his secret judgment to his own pleasure (f)."

 "Epicures they be who imagine that he walketh about the coasts of the heavens, and hath no respect of these inferior things, but that all these things should proceed either by chance or at adventure, or else by disposition of fortune; and God to have no stroke in them: what other thing is this, than to say as the fool supposeth in his heart, there is no God (g)?" Pursuant to these reflections she addresses the Supreme Being under the character of him "whose never failing providence ordereth all things both in heaven and earth (h)."

XIV. The immortality of the human soul, its separate existence, consciousness, and activity, in a state of detachment from the body; together with its immediate punishment or beatification, as soon as dislodged by death; were all strongly inculcated by the great author of our faith. Fear not them that kill the body, but who are not able to kill the soul (i). He preached the same doctrine in his expiring moments, when a cross was his pulpit, and when the conversion of a dying malefactor was the last seal of his ministry: To-day shalt thou, i. e. shall thy soul be with me in paradise (k). How clear and forcible is that other declaration of his, God is not the God of the dead, i. e. of the dead only; of the bodies of men or of that part of man which dies; but of the living: of that also which survives; even their souls: for all live to him (l) in the separate state, either glorified as temples of his grace, or punished as monuments of his displeasure. To add but one more testimony: whether we consider the account of Lazarus and the rich man (m) as a parable or a fact; the instantaneous conveyance of the former on angels' wings to Abraham's bosom, and the no less instantaneous punishment of the latter—together with the conversation which passed, or was supposed to pass, between the glorified soul of Abraham and the tormented soul of the agonizing sinner—plainly prove that the spirit of man is neither extinguished by death, nor reduced to a dormant, insensible state; but either soars directly into the heights of joy, or directly plunges into the abyss of woe. To this the church subscribes; or she would not pray, "In the hour of death—good

(m) Ib. 47.

Lord deliver us ; " nor give it as her steadfast belief, that " the dead who die in the Lord, are blessed from henceforth ( $\kappa$ )," απαρι, i. e. απο τα νυν, à nunc, from the very instant they expire. In her admirable commendatory prayer, she humbly commits " the soul " of the dying person into the hands of its Creator and Saviour: and in the funeral office affirms that " the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are with God in joy and felicity." I am the more particular in citing these testimonies of the church on this subject, as the equally antisciprual and unphilosophical doctrine of soul-sleeping has of late made great progress among some who yet pass for Churchmen.

XV. Lastly, The resurrection of the same identical body that dies, and the final glorification ( $\rho$ ) of the elect in soul and body together, close the rear of that creed which Jesus taught. This is the will of him who sent me, that, of all which he has given me, I should lose none, but should raise it up again at the last day ( $\rho$ ). The hour is coming when all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth: they that have done good to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation ( $\gamma$ ). That the church, in these points likewise, is the faithful echo of her Master's voice, I need not stay to prove.

Such are the inestimable truths which the disciples of Arius, Arminius, and Socinus are labouring to wrest from our hands. How must infidels on one side, and Papists on the other, exult to see any part (though blessed be God it is a very small part indeed) of the established clergy laying the train, and holding the match to blow up that very church, of which God and man have conspired to make them the nominal guardians! Adverting to such false brethren, may she not too justly complain, He that eateth my bread layeth great wait for me, and hath lifted up his heel against me? Yea, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table? Considering the quarter whence the late application to parliament arose, it may be considered as one of the most abandoned efforts that ever was made: so consummately flagitious that the very party themselves thought proper to masquerade the battery and play it off (as much as they could) in the dark. They published their petition; but took care not to publish their names: though their names would not have taken up more room than their petition. Thus, every one that doth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved: but he that doth truth, cometh to the light, instead of shrink-

( $\rho$ ) Hence it follows, that heaven must be a place as well as a state. Which I farther argue thus:

I. It is expressly so termed in Holy Scripture. I go, says Christ, to prepare a place for you; παρασκευασαι ετοιμασια τονιον υμων. And when I go and shall prepare a place for you, I will come again and take you to myself, ινα σπον εμυ εγω, that where (here is the ubi) I am, ye may be also, John xiv. 2, 3. This is several times repeated. Chap. xii. 26. και ο υγιου εμυ εγω εκει και ο δακονος ο εμος εσαι, and where I am, there also shall the servant, who is mine, be; and Chap. xvii. 24, Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me, ο υγιου εμυ εγω, where I am; and where is that? In the highest heaven; for it follows, that they may behold my glory; even that glory which he had with the Father, before the world was, ver. 5. And in Rev. xxii. 5, it is said concerning heaven, ως ουκ εσαι εκει, there shall be no night there. Now, setting apart all needless metaphysical distinctions, a place is that, de quo recte predicantur ubi & ibi. Whatever has a real existence must exist somewhere; according to the old axiom, "quod nullibi est, nihil est," and that somewhere (be it earth, hell, or heaven) is, to speak intelligibly, the place of the thing or person there existing. It may be said that "the word place seems not to agree with the nature of spirits." It may not altogether, according to our notion of place; but as I find the Son of God applying the word place to heaven itself, and describing one by the other, I cannot prevail with myself to give up the term; place; at least, until I find another more suitable. Shall we exchange it for state? But this is obscurum per obscurius. Suppose a being to be in a certain state, or condition, without at the same time taking in the idea of place or something analogous to it, and we are more in the dark than before. Alicuius determinate is a circumstance essential to every finite thing that exists: quid ens, it must be alicubi. Sever these two if you can. Ens nullibi is the grossest of absurdities. The word state refers to a person's greatness or meanness, happiness or misery knowledge or ignorance, &c.

and can a person, or intelligent subsistence, be either great or mean, happy or miserable, i. e. can he be in any state at all, without being at the same time in aliquo ibi? or can the το που be predicated of one, concerning whom the το που cannot?—Nor is heaven alone termed a place: the region of condemned spirits is likewise so called. Lest they come also into this place of torment, said the departed sensualist, Luke xvi. 28. And Judas is said to have fallen by transgression, that he might go to his own place. Acts i. 25.

II. If heaven be not a place, I would be glad to know where the glorified body of Christ is, with which he ascended. Whither did it ascend? Where are the bodies of Enoch and Elijah? If in heaven, heaven must be the το ibi, or place, where they are. In short, if we deny the locality of heaven, we must, together with that, deny that Christ resumed his own material body at his resurrection, and that he ascended in it to the right hand of God: i. e. we must commence infidels at once. I would further ask; where will the bodies of the saints be, after the universal judgment? Will they not enter into heaven? and can bodies be in heaven, and heaven no: be the place of those bodies? Nay, I ask, whither wen the soul of a believer can, after death, be with Christ, which the Scripture assures us it is, without ubique? How, moreover could Paul, previous to his death, be caught up εως τριτου ουρανου, to the third heaven, or εως τον παραδεισον, into paradise (which two expressions are terms synonymous, as appears by the apostle's reciprocating them, 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4), and that too, perhaps, εν σωματι in his body as well as soul; if the third heaven be not a place, or whether? could he go εις παραδεισον, into paradise, and that paradise not be local? Place, according to Sir Isaac Newton's definition is pars spatii quam corpus occupat: either, therefore the bodies of the saints never will be in heaven (which would infer a flat denial of the resurrection); and the body of infidelity is not in heaven (which but to imagine were infidelity indeed); or heaven may be, is, and must be, truly and properly, local.

ing from it, that his deeds may he made manifest that they are wrought in God. Not so wrought was the deed by which those gentlemen violated their promises to God, trampled on the supremacy of the king, treated the episcopal bench as cyphers, and laboured to destroy the faith they had solemnly engaged to preach.

To say that "the church would be sufficiently secured by subscribing only to the Scriptures at large;" is a mere pretence, far too thin to conceal the cloven foot which larks beneath. Arians and Socinians profess to believe the Bible. Papists, Arminians, and Pelagians profess the same. So does every sect which affects to shelter itself under the name of Christianity. Besides, upon the petitioners' own principles, subscription to the Bible itself would bear quite as hard on some men as subscription to the Liturgy and Articles is supposed to do on others. One man may be every whit as sincere in infidelity as another can be in heterodoxy. And if in after times a candidate for holy orders should happen to be an infidel, it would (according to the mode of reasoning adopted by the feathery divines) be full as grievous an encroachment on the right of private judgment to insist on such a man's subscribing to the Scriptures, as it can possibly be to insist on other people's subscribing to the Thirty-nine Articles. If the exaction of the latter is now cried out against as an imposition, so in a short time would the former. And with full as much reason: for can it be proved that God has given heretics a charter of ease, to the exclusion of poor infidels?—The Socinian goes but one step farther than the Arian; and the Deist goes but one step beyond the Socinian. Is the difference of a single step so very important, that every ecclesiastical door must be thrown wide open to admit the bible-subscribing Socinian; while the non-subscribing infidel has every door flung in his face, though he stand but a few inches from his admitted neighbour, yea, so near him that their elbows might touch? Would not a Deist, a Mahometan, a Jew, a Pagan, or a Papist, have as much cause in that case to exclaim as an Arian or Socinian pretends to have now? I conclude therefore that subscription to the Bible, and subscription to the Liturgy, Articles, and Homilies, stand on one and the same bottom: and the argument for abolishing subscription to these, would hold with equal force for the abolition of subscription to that. It is manifest therefore to what point the superseding project ultimately tends.

The plain truth seems to be that the petitioners wish to divest the Church of a power which even a free-mason's club justly possesses (I mean the power of expecting conformity to herself from all whom she admits into her bosom); only that they themselves may sit down to the loaves and fishes without the trouble of previously saying grace. They want to be supported at the public expense for doing nothing and for believing nothing. But in such a case would not the wisdom of the legislature soon begin to ask this reasonable question, "Why all this waste of tythes and church-lands on a useless body of men?" And would not a speedy resumption of both be the natural consequence? It certainly would if the legislature were in their senses. Let the petitioners therefore lay at least this to heart in due season. If they care not for the doctrines which they have solemnly subscribed, let them however take heed to what they confessedly love, even the bag, and that which is therein. (r) Though they have no regard to the ark of God, yet let them prudently take some thought for the security of their Diana.

Clergymen of this cast are very apt to complain of the contempt which is thrown upon them. But is it at all surprising that any, who are ritual conformists and avowed doctrinal dissenters, should be disliked for their want of integrity, and despised for their insignificance? How pertinent and solemn are those words of God, by the prophet: The priest's lips should keep knowledge, and men should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts. But ye are departed out of the way: ye have caused many to stumble at the law; ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord of hosts: therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people, according as ye have not kept my ways, but have been partial in the law.

In a letter of Mr. Pope's (if I mistake not), mention is made of an eastern fable to this effect: The owls and bats once joined in a petition to Jupiter against the sun; humbly shewing that his beams were so insufferably troublesome that the petitioners could not fly abroad with comfort, but were kept prisoners in their respective recesses, for at least twelve hours out of the twenty-four. Jupiter, seeing Phœbus shortly after, informed him of the application he had received; adding, I shall however take no notice of the petition; and be it your business to revenge yourself by shining.

May the sentiment be verified in the clergy of the establishment, at this critical and perilous juncture! Let us be careful to stand in the good old ways, and steadfastly abide by the doctrines of the reformation, which are found to quadrate so exactly with the glorious gospel of the blessed God. Be it our care at once to avenge and heal the wounds of our sacred mother the church, by shining in her defence : by holding forth and holding up the word of life, purely, without mixture ; meekly, without malevolence, yet intrepidly, without fear or shame ; honestly, without self-seeking ; fully, without reserve, without partiality, and without hypocrisy ; practically, (s) by giving all diligence to order every part of our own moral demeanour as becometh the gospel of Christ : giving no just cause of offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed ; but in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left (t). That when the destined season arrives, at which we must give account of our stewardship to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, we may be found of him in peace, watching, praying, labouring ; and ascend, from our Master's work, to our Master's joy, as Cincinnatus was found busy at his plough, when called to the dictatorship of Rome.

FREE-WILL AND MERIT FAIRLY EXAMINED.

OR,

MEN NOT THEIR OWN SAVIOURS.

The substance of a discourse preached in the parish church of St. Anne, Blackfriars, London, on Wednesday, May 25, 1774.

Truly in vain is Salvation hoped for from the hills and from the multitude of mountains. Truly, in the Lord our God is the Salvation of Israel. Jer. lii. 33.

SERMON VI.

Not unto us. O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy Name, give Glory, for thy Mercy and for thy Truth's Sake. Psalm cxv. 1.

SOME expositors have supposed that this Psalm was penned by the prophet Daniel, on occasion of the miraculous deliverance

(s) Plat, the philosopher, had a nephew (named Spetusippus) whose morals were so intolerably dissolute that his parents discarded him and turned him out of doors. Plato then took him into his own house to live with him. While there, the amiable philosopher did not endeavour to reclaim him by dry lectures and disgusting expostulations : but strove to make him in love with virtue, by the brightness of his own example. The expedient succeeded.—Spetusippus, at once shamed and charmed by the practical eloquence of his uncle's blameless life, grew reformed on principle, and afterwards became himself a very eminent philosopher.—Are we desirous of winning souls to Christ, and of demonstrating ourselves to be the children of God ? Our exhortations and our profession must have the sanction of our own example ; which, more than all the cold harangues on the "moral fitness of things," and the "beauty and expediency of virtue," will bring glory to God, honour to the gospel, comfort to our own minds, and solidly edify those to whom of Shadrac, Meshac, and Abednego, when they came out unhurt from the burning fiery furnace, into which they had been thrown by the command of king Nebuchadnezzar.

And, indeed, there are not wanting passages, in the Psalm itself, which seem to countenance this conjecture. As where we read, at the fourth verse (speaking of the idols of the heathens, and perhaps with particular reference to that golden image which Nebuchadnezzar commanded to be worshipped), Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands : they have mouths, but they speak not ; eyes have they but they see not.

I dare say, that, in such an auditory as this, a number of Arminians are present. I fear that all our public assemblies have too many of them. Perhaps, however, even these people, idolaters as they are, may be apt to blame, and indeed with justice, the absurdity of those who worship idols of silver and gold, the work of men's hands. But let me ask : if it be so very absurd to worship the work of other men's hands, what must it be to worship the works of our own hands ? Perhaps you may say, "God forbid that I should do so." Nevertheless, let me tell you, that trust, confidence, reliance, and dependence, for salvation, are all acts and very solemn ones too, of divine worship : and upon whatsoever you depend, whether in whole or in part, for your acceptance with God, and for your justification in his sight, whatsoever you rely upon, and trust in, for the attainment of grace or glory ; if it be any thing short of God in Christ, you are an idolator to all intents and purposes.

Very different is the idea which Scripture gives of the ever-blessed God, from that of those false gods worshipped by the heathen ; and from that degrading representation of the true God which Arminianism would palm upon mankind. Our God (says this Psalm, verse the third) is in the heavens : he hath done whatsoever he pleased. This is not the (u) Arminian idea of God : for our we minister and with whom we converse. Thus reasons the apostle Paul ; Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself ? Thou that preachest a man should not steal ; dost thou steal ? Thou that sayest, a man should not commit adultery ; dost thou commit adultery ? Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law, dishonourest thou God ? Rom. ii. 21—23.

(t) 2 Cor. vi. 3—7.

(u) I was lately introduced to the acquaintance of a very learned and sensible Arminian, whose political writings, and whose social virtues, entitle him to no small share of public and domestic esteem. This worthy gentleman has sagacity to perceive, and integrity to acknowledge, the prodigious lengths to which the free-will scheme, if carried as far as it naturally leads, must inevitably push its votaries. He sees its consequences clearly ; he swallows them without difficulty ; and he avows them very honestly.

"God does all he possibly can" [these were the gentleman's own words to me in conversation] "God free-willers and our chance-mongers tell us that God does not do whatsoever he pleases; that there are a great number of things which God wishes to do, and tugs and strives to do, and yet cannot bring to pass: they tell us, as one ingeniously expresses it,

"That all mankind he fain would save,
But longs for what he cannot have.
Industrious thus to sound abroad
A disappointed changling God."

How does this comport with that majestic description, Our God is in the heavens! He sits upon the throne weighing out and dispensing the fates of men; holding all events in his own hand; and guiding every link of every chain of second causes, from the beginning to the end of time. Our God is in heaven possessed of all power; and, (which is the natural consequence of that) he hath done whatsoever he pleased: or, as the apostle expresses it, (the words are different, but the sense is the same) he (x) worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.

Therefore it is that we both labour and suffer reproach: even because we say (and the utmost we can say upon the subject, amounts to no more than this; to wit, that) our God is in heaven, and has done whatsoever pleased him. And do according to his own sovereign pleasure he will, to the end of the chapter; though all the Arminians upon earth were to endeavour to defeat the divine intention, and to clog the wheels of divine government. He that sits in heaven (y) laughs them to scorn: and brings his own purposes to pass, sometimes, even through the means of those very incidents, which evil men endeavour to throw in his way, with a mad view to disappoint him of his purposes. Allthings, saith the Psalmist, serve thee (z): they have all a direct tendency, either effectively or permissively, to carry on his unalterable designs of providence and grace. Observe: effectively, or permissively. For we never say nor mean to say that God is the worker of evil: we only maintain that, for reasons unknown to us, but well known to God, he is the efficacious permitter (not the (a) agent, but the permitter) of whatsoever comes to pass. But when we talk of good, we then enlarge the term; and affirm, with the Psalmist, that all the help [i. e. all the good] that is done upon earth, God does it himself (b).

I remember a saying of the great Monsieur Du Moulin, in his admirable book, entitled, Anatome Arminianismi. His observation is, that the wicked, no less than the elect, accomplish the wise and holy and just decrees of God: but, says he, with this difference; God's own people, after they are converted, endeavour to do his will from a principle of love: whereas they who are left to the perverseness of their own hearts (which is all the reprobation we contend for) who care not for God, nor is God in all their thoughts, these persons resemble men rowing in a boat, who make toward the very place on which they turn their backs. (c) They turn their backs on the decree of God; and yet make toward that very point without knowing it.

One great contest between the religion of Arminius, and the religion of Jesus Christ, is, who shall stand entitled to the praise and glory of a sinner's salvation? Conversion decides this point at once: for I think, that without any imputation of uncharitableness, does all he possibly can, to hinder moral and natural evil but he cannot prevail. Men will not permit God to have his wish."—Then, said I, the Deity must certainly be a very unhappy Being.—“Not unhappy in the least,” replied the ready philosopher: “God knows that in consequence of the free-will with which he has endued his rational creatures, he himself must be disappointed of his wishes, and defeated of his ends, and that there is no help for it, unless he had made us mere machines. He therefore submits to necessity; and does not make himself uneasy about it.”

See, on what tremendous shoals free-willers, when honest, run themselves aground! Is their god the Bible-God? Certainly not. Their god “submits” to difficulties which he “cannot help” himself out of, and endeavours to make himself “easy” under millions and millions of inextricable embarrassments, uncomfortable disappointments, and mortifying defeats. Whereas, concerning the God of the Bible, it is affirmed that he hath done, and will always continue to do, whatsoever he pleaseth.

Observe, reader, the piety and the consistency of the free-will scheme.—This said scheme ascends, on the ladder of blasphemy, to the mountain top of atheism; and then hurls itself from that precipice into the gulph of blind adamantine necessity, in order to prove mankind free agents!

My interview with the philosopher abovementioned (whom, by the way, I most heartily acquit of all intentional atheism, or even disrespect to the Supreme Being), was seasoned with so many curious and uncommon circumstances of free debate, that my respectable and invaluable friend, the Rev. Mr.

Ryland, senior, of Northampton (who was present the whole time) acknowledged, after we had taken our leave of the worthy gentleman, that the said philosophic politician is a very honest, and consequently, a very unusual phenomenon.

(a) To say that the doctrine of predestination makes God the author and actuator of sin, is one of the most daring, (and at the same time most irrational) cavils, that ever dishonoured Arminianism itself. The state of the matter stands thus.—Since the fall of Adam and his sons (an event, the divine motives to the permission of which we are not entitled to know), God need only leave men to themselves by withholding the restraints of grace and providence; and men's corrupt free agency will, of itself, carry them headlong into all evil.

(c) The same great reasoner observes, that “God over-rules even the follies of mankind, and makes use of wicked men themselves, to execute his own righteous views: just as a person may draw a strait line, or give a right blow, with a crooked stick.”—Illi ipsi, qui resistunt mandato Dei servant ejus Providentia: et. r. nigum instar ed tendunt quod obvertunt terga. Deus, pe' insipientiam hominum perfecti consilia sua sapientia. Utitur hominibus injustis, ad exercendam suam justitiam. Non secus, ac si quis obter tobaculo, rectum icum infligat.

Molinæi Anat. Arin. cap. 3. p. 17.—Edit. Ludg 1619.

I may venture to say that every truly awakened person, at least when he is under the shine of God's countenance upon his soul, will fall down upon his knees, with this hymn of praise ascending from his heart, Not unto me, O Lord, not unto me, but to thy name give the glory : I am saved, not for my righteousness, but for thy mercy and thy truth's sake.

And this holds true even as to the blessings of the life that now is. It is God that sets up one and puts down another (d). Victory, for instance, when contending princes wage war, is all of God. The race is not to the swift, as swift ; nor the battle to the strong, as such (e). It is the decree, the will, the power, the providence of God, which effectually, though sometimes invisibly, order and dispose of every event.

At the famous battle of Azincourt, in France, where, if I mistake not, 80,000 French were totally defeated by about 9000 English, under the command of our immortal king Henry V. ; after the great business of the day was over, and God had given that renowned prince the victory, he ordered the foregoing Psalm (that is the 114th), and part of this Psalm whence I have read you the passage now under consideration, to be sung in the field of battle ; by way of acknowledging that all success, and all blessings, of what kind soever, come down from the Father of lights. Some of our historians acquaint us that, when the triumphant English came to these words which I have taken for my text, the whole victorious army fell down upon their knees as one man, in the field of conquest ; and shouted with one heart, and with one voice, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give the glory, for thy mercy and for thy truth's sake.

And thus it will be when God has accomplished the number of his elect, and completely gathered in the fulness of his redeemed kingdom. What do you think your song will be when you come to heaven ? Blessed be God, that he gave me free-will ; and blessed be my own dear self, that I made a good use of it ? O no, no. Such a song as that was never heard in heaven yet, nor ever will, while God is God, and heaven is heaven. Look into the Book of Revelation, and there you will find the employ of the blessed, and the strains which they sing. They cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred and tongue people and nation. (f) There is discriminating grace for you ! Thou hast redeemed us out of every kindred, &c. that is, from (g) among the rest of mankind. Is not this particular election and limited redemption ?

The Church below may be liable to err ; and if any visible Church upon earth pretends to be infallible, the very pretension itself demonstrates that she is not so. But there is a Church which I will venture to pronounce infallible. And what Church is that ? The Church of the glorified, who shine as stars at God's right hand. And, upon the infallible testimony of that infallible Church, a testimony recorded in the infallible pages of inspiration, I will venture to assert that not one grain of Arminianism ever attended a saint into heaven.— If those of God's people, who are in the bonds of that iniquity, are not explicitly converted from it while they live and converse among men ; yet do they leave it all behind them in Jordan (i. e. in the river of death) when they go through. They may be compared to Paul, when he went from Jerusalem to Damascus, and the grace of God struck him down : he fell a free-willer ; but he rose a free-gracer. So however the rust of self-righteous pride (and a cursed rust it is : may God's Spirit file it off from all our souls), however that rust may adhere to us at present, yet when we come to stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, it will be all done away, and we shall sing, in one full, everlasting chorus, with elect angels, and elect men, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us.

And why should not we sing that song now ? Why should not we endeavour, under the influence of the Spirit, to anticipate the language of the skies, and be as heavenly as we can before we get to heaven ? Why should we condemn that song upon earth which we hope for ever to sing before the throne of God above ? It is to me really astonishing that Protestants and Church of England men, considered merely as rational creatures, and as people of common sense, who profess to be acquainted with the Scriptures, and to acknowledge the power of God, should have any objection to singing this song, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy and for thy truth's sake.

Still more wonderful and deplorable it is, that some who even make profession of spiritual religion, and talk of an inward work of God upon their hearts, should so far lose sight of humility and of truth as to dream either that their own arm helped the Almighty to save them, or at least that their own arm was able to have hindered him from saving them. What can reflect deeper dishonour upon God than such an idea ? And what can have a directer tendency to engender and to nourish that pride of heart which deceiveth men ?

It pleased God to deliver me from the Arminian snare, before I was quite eighteen. Antecedently to that period there was not (with the lowest self-abasement I confess it) a more haughty and violent free-willer within the compass of the four seas. One instance of my warm and bitter zeal occurs just now to my memory. About a twelve-month before the divine goodness gave me eyes to discern, and a heart to embrace, the truth, I was haranguing one day in company (for I deemed myself able to cope with all the predestinarians in the world), on the universality of grace, and the powers of human free-agency. A good old gentleman (now with God) rose from his chair, and coming to mine, held me by one of my coat-buttons while he mildly addressed me to this effect: My dear sir, there are some marks of spirituality in your conversation; though tinged with an unhappy mixture of pride and self-righteousness. You have been speaking largely in favour of free-will: but from arguments let us come to experience. Do let me ask you one question. How was it with you when the Lord laid hold on you in effectual calling? Had you any hand in obtaining that grace? Nay, would you not have resisted and baffled it, if God's Spirit had left you in the hand of your own counsel?

I felt the conclusiveness of these simple, but forcible, interrogations, more strongly than I was then willing to acknowledge. But blessed be God, I have since been enabled to acknowledge the freeness and omnipotence of his grace, times without number; and to sing (what I trust will be my everlasting song when time shall be no more), Not unto me, O Lord, not unto me, but unto thy name, give all the glory.

We never know so much of heaven in our own souls, nor stand so high upon the mount of communion with God, as when his Spirit, breathing on our hearts, makes us lie low at the footstool of sovereign grace, and inspires us with this cry, O God, be mine the comfort of salvation, but thine be the entire praise of it!

Let us briefly apply the rule and compass of God's word to the several parts of which salvation is composed; and we shall soon perceive that the whole building is made up of grace, and of grace alone. Do you ask, in what sense I here take the word grace? I mean by that important term, the voluntary, sovereign, and gratuitous bounty of God; quite unconditioned by, and quite irrespective of, all and every shadow of human worthiness, whether antecedent, concomitant, or subsequent. This is precisely the scriptural idea of grace: to wit, that it [i. e. salvation in all its branches] is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth; but of God, who sheweth mercy (h). And thus it is that grace reigneth, unto the eternal life of sinners, through the righteousness of Jesus Christ our Lord (i).

1. In canvassing this momentous truth, let us begin, where God himself began—namely, with election. To whom are we indebted for that first of all spiritual blessings? Pride says, To me. Self-righteousness says, To me. Man's unconverted will says, To me. But faith joins with God's word in saying, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name, be the whole glory of thy electing love ascribed: thou didst not choose us on supposition of our first choosing thee; but through the victorious operation of thy mighty Spirit, we choose thee for our portion and our God, in consequence of thy having first and freely chosen us to be thy people.

Hear the testimony of that apostle who received the finishings of his spiritual education in the third heavens. There is a remnant, says he, according to the election of grace. And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it [i. e. if election] be of works, then is it no more of grace: otherwise work is no more work (k). Let us sift this reasoning, and we shall find it invincible.

There is "a remnant," i. e. some of fallen mankind, who shall be everlastingly saved through Christ. This remnant is "according to election:" God's own will and choice are the determinate rule by which the saved remnant is measured and numbered. This election is an election of "grace," or a free, sovereign, and unmerited act of God. The apostle would not leave out the word grace, lest people should imagine that God elected them on account of something he saw in them above others.—"Well, but," (may some say) "admitting election to be by grace, might not our foreseen good works have a little hand in the matter? might not God have some small regard to our future good behaviour?" No, answers the apostle; none at all. If election be by "grace," i. e. of mere mercy and sovereign love, then it is no more of "works," whether directly or indirectly, in whole or in part; "otherwise grace is no more grace." Could any thing human, though ever so little, be mixed with grace, as a motive with God for shewing favour to Peter (for instance) above Judas; grace would all evaporate and be annihilated from that moment. For, as Austin observes, Gratia non est gratia, nisi sit omnino gratuita: Grace ceases to be grace, unless it be totally and absolutely irrespective of any thing and of every thing, whether good or bad, in the objects of it. So that, as the apostle adds, was it possible for election to be "of works," then would it be "no more" an act of

(h) Rom. ix. 16.

(i) Rom. v. 21.

(k) Rom. xi. 6, 7.

“grace;” but a payment instead of a gift; “otherwise work were no more work.” On one hand, “work” ceases to be considered as influential on election, if election is the daughter of “grace;” and, on the other hand, “grace” has nothing at all to do in election if “works” have any concern in it. Grace and conditionality are two incompatible opposites; the one totally destroys the other; and they can no more subsist together than two particles of matter can occupy the same individual portion of space at the same point of time.

Which therefore of these contrary songs do you sing? (for all the art and labour of mankind, united, can never throw the two songs into one): Are you for burning incense to yourselves, saying, Our righteousness, and the might of our own arm, have gotten us this spiritual wealth?—Or, with the angels and saints in light, do you lay down your brightest honours at the footstool of God’s throne? with Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give glory, for thy loving mercy, and for thy truth’s sake.

Certainly, election is the act, not of man, but of God: founded merely upon the sovereign and gracious pleasure of his own will. It is not of works, lest any man should boast; but solely of Him who has said, I will be merciful to whom I will be merciful, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. God merits of us, not we of him; and it was his free-will, not our’s, which drew the impassable line between the elect and the pretermitted.

2. God’s covenant love to us in Christ is another stream, flowing from the fountain of unmingled grace. And here, as in the preceding instance, every truly awakened person disclaims all title to praise; shoves it away from himself with both hands; and not only with his hands, but with his heart also; while his lips acknowledge, Not unto us, O thou divine and co-eternal Three, not unto us, but to thy name give glory!

How is it possible that either God’s purposes, or that his covenant concerning us, can be in any respect whatsoever suspended on the will or the works of men; seeing both his purposes and his covenant were framed, and fixed, and agreed upon, by the persons in the Trinity, not only before men existed, but before angels themselves were created, or time itself was born? All was vast eternity, when grace was federally given us in Christ ere the world began: (l) well therefore might the apostle, in the very text where he makes the above assertion, observe, that the holy calling with which God effectually converts and sanctifies his people, in time, is bestowed upon us, not according to our works, but according to God’s own free purpose and eternal destination.

Repentance and faith, new obedience and perseverance, are not conditions of interest in the covenant of grace (for then it would be a covenant of works); but consequences and tokens of covenant interest. For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil; that the purpose of God, according to election (which is the standard of covenant mercy), might remain (m) unshaken, it was said unto her, the elder shall serve the younger; as it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated (n). Now, whether you consider this passage as referring to the posterity of Jacob and Esau, or to Jacob and Esau themselves, or (which is evidently the apostle’s meaning) as referring to both, the argument will still come to the same point at last; namely, that the divine counsels and determinations, in whatever view you take them, are absolutely irrespective of works, because God’s immanent decrees and covenant-transactions take place before the objects of them had done either good or evil. Of course, all the good that is wrought in men comes from God, as the gracious effect, not as the cause, of his favour; and all the evil which God permits (such are his wisdom and his power) is subservient to promote, instead of interfering to obstruct, the accomplishment of his most holy will. I mention God’s permission of evil only incidentally in this place: for properly it belongs to another argument. My present business is to shew that the good and the graces which God works (not permissively but effectively) in the hearts of his covenant people are the fruit, not the root, of the love he bears to them.

3. To whom are we indebted for the atonement of Christ, and for the redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins? Here likewise, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us! It was God who found a ransom (o). It was God who provided his own justice with a lamb for a burnt offering. It was God who accepted the atonement at our Surety’s hand, instead of ours. It was God who freely imparts the blessings of that completely finished redemption, to the comfort and everlasting restoration of all those who are enabled to trust and to glory in the cross of Christ. Against such persons divine justice has nothing to allege: and on them it has no penalty to inflict. The sword of vengeance having been already sheathed in the sinless human nature of Jehovah’s equal (p) becomes to them that believe a curtana, a sword of mercy, a sword without a point. Thanks to the reconciling mercy of God the Father, and to the bleeding grace of our Lord Jesus Christ! Human free-will and merit had nothing to do with the matter from first to last.

4. As pardon exempts us from unish-

ment, so justification (i. e. God's acceptance of us as perfect fulfillers of the whole law) entitles us to the kingdom of heaven. The former is God's παρεσις (g), or passing by of our transgressions, so as not to take notice of them; and God's αφεσις (r), or letting us go finally unpunished. But justification (which is the inseparable concomitant of forgiveness) is not merely negative, but carries in it more of positivity, and exalts us to a higher state of felicity, than mere pardon (was it possible to be conferred without justification) would do. It is God's δικαιωσις, or pronouncing of us positively and actually just: not only innocent, but righteous also. St. Bernard somewhere preserves this obvious and just distinction.—His words I remember are that God is tam validus ad justificandum quam multus ad ignoscendum: "No less mighty to justify, than rich in mercy to forgive."

Now the great enquiry is, whether God be indeed entitled to the whole praise of this unspeakable gift? Whether we should, as justified persons, sing to the praise and glory of ourselves; or to the praise and glory of God alone?

The Bible will determine this question in a moment; and shew us that Father, Son, and Spirit are the sole authors, and consequently should receive the entire glory, of our justification.

It is God [the Father] who justifieth: (·) i. e. who accepts us unto eternal life; and that freely by his grace (t), through the redemption which is in Christ, and through the imputation of Christ's righteousness, without works (u): i. e. without being moved to it by any consideration of the good works, and without being restrained from it by any consideration of the evil works, wrought by the person or persons to whom Christ's righteousness is imputed, and who are pronounced just in consequence of that imputed righteousness.

Justification is also the act of God the Son, in concurrence with his Father. St. Paul expressly declares that he sought to be justified by Christ (·). The second person in the Divinity joins, as such, in accepting of his people through that transferred merit which, as man, he wrought for this very end. Now let me ask you, did you assist Christ in paying the price of your redemption, and in accomplishing a series of perfect obedience for your justification? If you did, you are entitled to a proportionable part of the praise. But if Christ both obeyed and died and rose again without your assistance, it invincibly follows that you have no manner of claim to the least particle of that praise which results from the benefits acquired and secured by his obedience, death, and resurrection. The benefits themselves are all your own, if he give you faith to embrace them; but the honour, the glory, and the thanks, you cannot arrogate to yourself, without the utmost impiety and sacrilege.

God the Holy Ghost unites in justifying the redeemed of the Lord. We are declaratively and evidentially justified by the Spirit of our God (y): whose condescending and endearing office it is to reveal a broken Saviour in the broken heart of a self-emptied sinner, and to shed abroad the justifying love of God in the human soul (z). Herein the adorable Spirit neither needs nor receives any assistance from the sinners he visits. His gracious influence is sovereign, free, and independent. We can no more command nor prohibit his agency, than we can command or forbid the shining of the sun.

The conclusion from the whole is, that not our goodness, but God's mercy; not our obedience, but Christ's righteousness; not our towardliness, but the Holy Spirit's beneficence; are to be thanked for the whole of our justification.

And it is no easy lesson to say from the heart, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us! Self-righteousness cleaves to us, as naturally and as closely as our skins: nor can any power, but that of an Almighty hand, flay us of it. I remember an instance full to the point: and which I give on the authority of a clergymen, now living, and eminent above many, for his labours and usefulness. This worthy person assured me, a year or two since, that he once visited a criminal who was under sentence of death for a capital offence (I think for murder). My friend endeavoured to set before him the evil he had done; and to convince him that he was lost and ruined, unless Christ saved him by his blood, righteousness and grace. "I am not much concerned about that," answered the self-righteous malefactor; "I have not, to be sure, led so good a life as some have; but I am certain that many have gone to Tyburn who were much worse men than myself." "So you see, a murderer may go to the gallows trusting in his own righteousness! And you and I should have gone to hell, trusting in our own righteousness, if Christ had not stopped us by the way.

I dare believe that the above mentioned criminal, had the subject been started, would also have valued himself upon his free-agency. Free-agency, it is true, he had; and he was left to the power of it, and ruined himself accordingly: Free-will has carried many a man to Tyburn, and (it is to be feared) from Tyburn to hell: but it never yet carried a single soul to holiness and heaven.

Oh Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; free-will can do that for us; but in me, says God, is thy help (a). His free-grace must be our refuge and our shelter from our own free-will: or it were good for the best of us that we had never been born (b).

In one word, all the glory of our pardon and justification belongs to the Trinity, and not to man. It is one of God's crown jewels, unalienable from himself; and which he will never resign to, nor share with, any other being. It is impossible, in the very nature of things, that he ever should: for how can any of depraved mankind be justified by works (and without being so justified we can come in for no part of the praise); how, I say, can any of us be justified by our own doings, seeing we are utterly unable even to think a good thought (c) until God himself breathes it into our hearts.

Suffer me to observe one thing more under this article: viz. that if God's Spirit has stript you of your own righteousness, he has not stript you in order to leave you naked, but will clothe you with change of raiment (d). He will give you a robe, for your rags; the righteousness of God, for the rotten righteousness of man. Rotten indeed we shall find it, if we make it a pillar of confidence. I will say of it, as Dr. Young says of the world, "Lean not upon it:" lean not on thy own righteousness; if leaned upon, "it will pierce thee to the heart: at best a broken reed: but oft a spear. On its sharp point peace bleeds and hope expires."

Self-reliance is the very bond of unbelief. It is essential infidelity, and one of its most deadly branches. You are an infidel, if you trust in your own righteousness. You a Christian? You a Churchman? No; you have, in the sight of God, neither part nor lot in the matter. You are spiritually dead, while you pretend to live. Until you are endued with faith in Christ's righteousness, your body (as a great man expresses it) is no better than "the living coffin of a dead soul." A Christian is a believer (not in himself, but) in Christ. And what is the language of a believer? Lord, I am, in myself, a poor, ruined, undone sinner. Through the hand of thy good Spirit upon me, I throw myself at the foot of thy cross; and look to thee for mercy to wash me, for righteousness to justify me, for grace to make me holy, for comfort to make me happy, and for strength to keep me in thy ways.

5. For holiness, the inward principle of good works; and for good works themselves, the outward evidences of inward holiness, we are obliged to the alone grace and power of God most high. We do not make him a debtor to us, by loving and performing his commandments; but we become additionally debtors to him, for crowning his other gifts of grace, by vouchsafing to work in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight (e).

Say not, "Upon this plan, sanctification is kicked out of doors, and good works are turned adrift." Nothing can be more palpable and flagrantly untrue. Newness of heart and of life is so essential to, and constitutes so vast a part of, the evangelical scheme of salvation, that were it possible for holiness and its moral fruits to be really struck out of the account, the chain would at once dissolve, and the whole fabric become a house of sand.

The Arminians have of late made a huge cry about Antinomians! Antinomians! From the abundance of experience the mouth is apt to speak. The modern (f) Arminians see so much real Antinomianism among themselves, and in their own tents, that Antinomianism is become the predominant idea, and the favourite watch-word of the party. Because they have got the plague, they think every body else has. Because the leprosy is in their walls, they imagine no house is without it. Thus,

*All looks infected, that th' infected spy;
As all seems yellow to the jaundiced eye.*

It is cunning, I must confess, in these people, to raise a dust for their own defence; and, like some pick-pockets when closely pursued, to aim at slipping the stolen watch or handkerchief into the pocket of an

(a) Hosea xiii. 9.

(b) I have heard, or read, concerning that excellent dignitary of the Church of England, Mr. John Bradford (who was also burned for adhering to her doctrines), that, one day, on seeing a malefactor pass to execution, he laid his hand to his breast, and lifted his eyes to heaven, saying, "Take away the grace of God, and there goes John Bradford."

The great and good St. Austin, long before, offered a similar acknowledgment to God. Semper gratia tua et misericordia tua prævenit me: præcedens etiam ante me laqueos peccatorum; tollens occasiones et causas. Quia, nisi tu hoc mihi fecisses, omnia peccata mundi fecissem. Quoniam scio, Domine, quod nullum peccatum est, quod unquam fecerat homo, quod non posset facere, alter homo, si Creator desit, à quo factus est homo.—Soliloqu. Cap. xv. Sec. 5.

So likewise thought the author, (whose name I forget) of that tender and beautiful line:

(c) 2 Corinth. iii. 5.—In perfect harmony with this most important truth, our Church thus addresses the Majesty of heaven: O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed. And, again; Grant that, by thy holy inspiration, we may think those things that be good.—O free-will, free-will! at how low a rate wast thou estimated by the reformers and the ancient bishops of the Church of England!

(d) Zechariah iii. 4.

(f) Let it be observed, that I do not here, and in the following strictures, speak of all Arminians without exception: but of such Arminians who come within a certain denomination; and who are no less eminent for their boisterous brawling about works, than (as I can prove from too many instances) which have fallen under my own notice) for their practical adoption of bad ones.

innocent by-stander, that the real sharper may elude the rod of justice. But unhappily for themselves, the Arminians are not complete masters of this art. The dust they raise forms too thin a cloud to conceal them; and their bungling attempt to shift off the charge of Antinomianism upon others rivets the charge but more firmly on themselves, its true proprietors. The avowed effrontery with which they openly trample on a certain commandment that says, Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour, may stand as a sample of the little regard they pay to the other nine. Pretty people these, to look for justification from the "merit" of their own works, and to value themselves on their perfect love to God and man!

With regard to sanctification and obedience, truly so called, it can only flow, and cannot but flow, from a new heart: which new heart is of God's own making, and of God's own giving. I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh; a soft, repenting, believing heart: and I will cause ye to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them (g). Now God accomplishes this promise by the effectual working of his blessed Spirit: by the mystic fire of whose agency, having melted our hearts into penitential faith, he then applies to them the seal of his own holiness; from which time we begin to bear the image and superscription of God upon our tempers, words, and actions.

This is our "licentious" doctrine: namely, a doctrine which (under the influence of the Holy Ghost) conforms the soul more and more to God: carefully referring, at the same time, all the praise of this active and passive conformity to God himself, whose gift it is; singing, with the saints of old, Thou, Lord, hast wrought all our [good] works in us (h); and for all the work so wrought,—for the will to please thee, for the endeavour to please thee, for the ability to please thee, and for every act whereby we do please thee,—Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name, give glory.

And, indeed, was not this the truth of the case, i. e. if conversion and sanctification and good works were not God's gifts, and of his operation; men would have, not only somewhat, but much, even very much, to boast of: for they would be their own converters, sanctifiers, and saviours. Directly contrary to the plain letter of Scripture, which asks, Who maketh thee to differ from others, and what hast thou which thou didst not receive (i) from above? Nor less contrary to the scriptural direction, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord (k).

6. Once more. Whom are we to thank for perseverance in holiness and good works, to the end? "Oh" says an old Pharisee, perhaps, "the thanks are due to my own watchfulness, my own faithfulness, my own industry, and my own improvements." Your supposed watchfulness answers a very bad purpose, if you make a merit of it. The enemy of souls cares not the turning of a straw, whether you perish by open licentiousness, or by a delusive confidence in your own imaginary righteousness. It is all one to him, whether you go to hell in a black coat or a white one. Nay, the whitest you can weave will be found black, and a mere san benito to equip you for the flames, if God does not array you in the imputed righteousness of his blessed Son.

But, for the present, leaving pharisees and legalists to the hands of him who alone is able, and has a right, to save or to destroy; let me address myself to the true believer in Christ. You were called, it may be ten or twenty years ago, or longer, to the knowledge of God; and you still are found dwelling under the droppings of the sanctuary, and walking in him you have received; following on, to know more of the Lord; sometimes faint, yet always wishing to pursue; tossed, but not lost; occasionally cast down, but not destroyed. How comes all this? How is it that many flaming professors, who blazed out for a while, like luminaries of the first lustre, are quenched, extinguished, vanished; while your smoking flax, and feeble spark of grace, continue to survive, and sometimes afford both light and heat? While more than a few, who perhaps once seemed to be rooted as rocks, and stable as pillars in the house of God, are become as water that runneth apace; why are you standing, though in yourself as weak, if not weaker, than they? A child of God can soon answer this question: and he will answer it thus: Having obtained help of God, I continue to this day (l). Not by my own might and power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts (m).

And he that kept you until this day will keep you all your days. His spirit, which he freely gives to his people, is a well of water, springing up, not for a year, not for a lifetime, only; but into everlasting life (n). God's faithfulness to you is the source of your faithfulness to him. Christ prays for you; and therefore he keeps you watching unto prayer. He preserves you from falling; or when fallen, he restores your soul, and leads you forth again in the path of righteousness for his name's sake. He has decreed and covenanted, and promised and sworn, to give you a crown of life; and, in order to that, he has no less solemnly engaged, and irrevocably bound himself, to make you faithful unto death.

"Well, then," says an Arminian, "if these things are so, I am safe at all events. I may fold up my arms, and even lay me down to sleep. Or if I choose to rise and be active, I may live just as I list." Satan was the coiner of this reasoning: and he offered it, as current and sterling, to the Messiah, but Christ rejected it as false money.—If thou be the Son of God, said the enemy; if thou be indeed that Messiah whom God upholds, and his elect in whom his soul delighteth; cast thyself headlong; it is impossible thou shouldst perish, do what thou wilt: no fall can hurt thee; and thy Father has absolutely promised that his angels shall keep thee in all thy ways; jump, therefore, boldly from the battlements, and fear no evil.

The devil's argumentation was equally insolent and absurd, in every point of view. He reasoned not like a serpent in his wits, but like a serpent whose head was bruised (o), and who had no more of understanding than of modesty. Christ silenced this battery of straw with a single sentence: Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God (p). So said the Messiah. And so say we. And this is answer enough to a cavil whose palpable irrationality would cut its own throat, without the help of any answer at all.

God's children would be very glad if they could "live as they list." How so? Because it is the will, the desire, the wish, of a renewed soul (i. e. of the new man, or the believer's regenerate part; for old Adam never was a saint yet, nor ever will be); it is, I say, the will and the wish of a renewed soul, to please God in all things, and never to sin on any occasion, or in any degree. This is the state to which our pantings aspire: and in which (would the imperfection of human nature admit of such happiness below) we "list" to walk. For every truly regenerated person can sincerely join the apostle Paul in saying, With my mind, I myself serve the law of God, (q) and wish I could keep it better.

God's preservation is the good man's perseverance. He will keep the feet of his saints (r). Arminianism represents God's Spirit as if he acted like the guard of a stage coach, who sees the passengers safe out of town for a few miles; and then making his bow, turns back, and leaves them to pursue the rest of their journey themselves. But divine grace does not thus deal by God's travellers. It accompanies them to their journey's end, and without end. So that the meanest pilgrim to Zion may shout, with David, in full certainty of faith, Surely, goodness and mercy shall follow me all my days, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever (s). Therefore, for preserving grace, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give the glory, for thy loving mercy and for thy truth's sake.

7. After God has led his people through the wilderness of life, and brought them to the edge of that river which lies between them and the heavenly Canaan, will he intermit his care of them, in that article of deepest need? No, blessed be his name. On the contrary, he (always safely, and generally comfortably) escorts them over to the other side; to that good land which is very far off, to that goodly mountain and Lebanon.

I know there are some flaming Arminians who tell us that "a man may persevere until he comes to die, and yet perish in almost the very article of death:" and they illustrate this wretched god-dishonouring, and soul-shocking doctrine, by the simile of of "a ship's foundering in the harbour's mouth."

It is very true that some wooden vessels have so perished. But it is no less true, that all God's chosen vessels are infallibly safe from so perishing. For, through his goodness, every one of them is insured by him whom the winds and seas, both literal and metaphorical, obey. And their insurance runs thus: When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and when through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee (t). The ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion, with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads (u): so far from foundering within sight of land.

Even an earthly parent is particularly careful and tender of a dying child: and, surely, when God's children are in that situation, he will (speaking after the manner of men) be doubly gracious to his helpless offspring, who are his by election, by adoption, by covenant, by redemption, by regeneration, and by a thousand other indissoluble ties.

There are no marks of shipwrecks, no remnants of lost vessels, floating upon that sea which flows between God's Jerusalem below and the Jerusalem which is above. The excellent Dr. William Gouge (x) has an observation full to the present point. "If a man," says he, "were cast into a river, we should look upon him as safe, while he was able to keep his head above water. The Church, Christ's mystic body, is cast into the sea of the world, [and afterwards into the sea of death]; and Christ, their head, keeps himself aloft even in heaven. Is there then any fear or possibility of drowning a member of this body? If any should be drowned, then either Christ himself must be drowned first, or else that member must be pulled from Christ: both which are impossible. By virtue therefore of this union, we see that on Christ's safety our's depends. If he is safe, so are we. If we perish, so must he."

Well, therefore, may dying believers sing, Not unto us, O Lord, but to thy name give glory! Thy loving mercy carries us when we cannot go: and, for thy truth's sake, thou wilt save us to the utmost without the loss of one.

8. When the emancipated soul is actually arrived in glory, what song will he sing then? The purport of the text will still be the language of the skies: Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give the praise.

Whilst we are upon earth, we have need of that remarkable caution which Moses gave the children of Israel (y): Speak not thou in thine heart, after that the Lord thy God hath cast them out from before thee, saying, for my righteousness, the Lord hath brought me in to possess this land. Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess this land. . . . Understand, therefore, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiff-necked people. Now, if the earthly Canaan, which was only a transitory inheritance, was unattainable by human merit; if even worldly possessions are not given us for our own righteousness' sake; who shall dare to say that heaven itself is the purchase of our own righteousness? If our works cannot merit even the vanishing conveniences and supplies of time, how is it possible that we should be able to merit the endless riches of eternity? We shall (x) need no cautions against self-righteousness when we get safe to that better country. The language of our hearts, and of our voices, will be; and angels will join the concert; and all the elect, both angels and men, will, for ever and ever, strike their harps to this key: Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give the glory, for thy loving mercy and thy truth's sake.

O, may a sense of that loving mercy and truth be warmly and transformingly experienced in our hearts! for indeed, my dear brethren, it is experience, or the felt power of God upon the soul, which makes the gospel a savour of life unto life. Notwithstanding God's purpose is steadfast as his throne, notwithstanding the whole of Christ's righteousness and redemption is finished and complete as a divine and almighty agent could make it; notwithstanding I am convinced that God will always be faithful to every soul whom he has called out of darkness into his marvellous light; and notwithstanding none can pluck the people of Christ from his hands; still, I am no less satisfied that it must be the feeling sense of all this, i. e. a perception wrought in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, that will give you and me the comfort of the Father's gracious decrees, and of the Messiah's finished work.

I know it is growing very fashionable to talk against spiritual feelings. But I dare not join the cry. On the contrary, I adopt the apostle's prayer, that our love to God, and the manifestations of his love to us, may abound yet more and more, in knowledge and in all feeling (a). And it is no enthusiastic wish, in behalf of you and of myself, that we may be of the number of those "godly persons" who, as our Church justly expresses it, "feel in themselves the workings of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh, and drawing up their minds to high and heavenly things." (b) Indeed, the great business of God's Spirit is to draw up and to bring down. To draw up our affections to Christ, and to bring down the unsearchable riches of grace into our hearts. The knowledge of which, and earnest desire for it, are all the feelings I plead for. And for these feelings I wish ever to plead. Satisfied as I am, that, without some experience and enjoyments of them, we cannot be happy, living or dying.

Let me ask you, as it were, one by one, has the Holy Spirit begun to reveal these deep things of God in your soul? If so, give him the glory of it. And as you prize communion with him, as you value the comforts of the Holy Ghost, endeavour to be found in God's way, even the high-way of humble faith and obedient love: sitting at the feet of Christ, and desirous to imbibe those sweet, ravishing, sanctifying, communications of

(y) I have been informed that, when the news of John Goodwin's death was brought to his uncle, Dr. Thomas Goodwin, the latter cried out, "Then there is another good man gone to heaven."—"Gone to heaven, Sir?" answered the person; "why, your nephew was an Arminian."—The Doctor replied "True: he was an Arminian on earth, but he is not an Arminian now."

Whether John Goodwin went to heaven or not (which is a question too high for sublunary decision.) certain it is as I have already observed, that not one inhabitant of the celestial city ever carried a single particle of Arminianism with him into the gates of that Jerusalem. Of every Arminian now living, whose name is in the book of life, it may be truly said, that if grace do not go so far as to make him a Calvinist on earth, glory [i. e. grace made perfect], will certainly stamp him a Calvinist, in the kingdom of God, at farthest.

grace, which are at once an earnest of and a preparation for complete heaven when you come to die. God forbid that we should ever think lightly of religious feelings! for if we do not in some degree feel ourselves sinners, and feel that Christ is precious, I doubt the Spirit of God has never been savingly at work upon our souls.

Nay, so far from being at a stand in this, our desires after the feeling of God's presence within ought to enlarge continually, the nearer we draw to the end of our earthly pilgrimage; and resemble the progressive expansion of a river, which, however narrow and straitened when it first begins to flow, never fails to widen and increase in proportion as it approaches the ocean into which it falls.

God give us a gracious spring-tide of his Spirit to replenish our thirsty channels, to swell our scanty stream, and to quicken our languid course! If this is not our cry, it is a sign either that the work of grace is not yet begun in us, or that it is indeed at low water, and discoloured with those dregs which tend to dishonour God, to eclipse the glory of the gospel, and to spread clouds and darkness upon our souls.

Some Christians are like decayed milestones; which stand, it is true, in the right road, and bear some traces of the proper impression; but so wretchedly mutilated and defaced that they who go by can hardly read or know what to make of them. May the blessed Spirit of God cause all our hearts this morning to undergo a fresh impression; and indulge us with a new edition of our evidences for heaven! O may showers of blessing descend upon you from above! May you see that Christ and the grace of God in him, are all in all! Whilst you are upon earth, may you ever ascribe the whole glory to him! And sure I am, that when you come to heaven, you will never ascribe it to any other.

GOOD NEWS FROM HEAVEN.

OR,

THE GOSPEL A JOYFUL SOUND.

The substance of a discourse preached in the Lock Chapel, near Hyde Park Corner, on Sunday, June 19, 1774.

How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God! Therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.—
PSALM xxxvi. 6.

SERMON VII.

Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound; They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance: In thy name shall they rejoice all the day, and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted.

PSALM LXXXIX. 15, 16.

I HAVE often wondered at the hardness of those writers who have presumed to affirm that the gospel, or message of free and full salvation by the blood and righteousness of God's co-eternal Son, was unknown to those who lived under the legal dispensation.

Nothing can be more untrue. We may as reasonably affirm that the sun did not shine during the legal dispensation. And as it was the same sun which now shines that then illuminated the world, so it was the self same Sun of righteousness, who now rises upon the souls of his people with healing in his beams (c) that then shone upon God's elect, visited them with the irradiations of his love, and saved them by faith in his own future righteousness and atonement. Unto us, saith the apostle, is the gospel preached, as well as unto them (d). And again, These all died in faith, having seen the promises afar off; and were persuaded of them [πισθευτες, were assured of interest in them], and embraced them (e). So that we may confidently affirm, concerning all God's enlightened people who lived before the Messiah's incarnation, that like Abraham (f), they saw the day of Christ in perspective, and rejoiced in the believing anticipation of that blessed sight.

As the depravation of human nature is intrinsically the same in all ages; and as men in and of themselves were neither better nor worse, during the Mosaic economy, than they have been ever since, and are at this day; it follows that the disorder must be the self same, the remedy likewise must be the same; and, of course, that there are not two ways of salvation, one for the believing Jews, and another for the believing Gentiles; but that our Lord's declaration ever did, and ever must, stand good:—I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh to the Father but by me (g). Suppose we carry our appeal to this psalm, for the truth of the observation here made? What do you think David sings of in the text? Certainly he sings of those supernatural comforts imparted by the Holy Ghost, and which the psalmist knew would be procured for all the elect by the blood of Christ. Hence he likewise celebrates the praises of that righteousness in which, and in which alone, the redeemed of the Lord are exalted to a state of communion with God, and to the inheritance of the saints in light.

No wonder, therefore, that a psalm so richly fraught with evangelical truth should open in a strain of praise and thanksgiving to that God of all grace whose love to his people embraced them without beginning, and shall follow them without end. I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations. Now, do you think that David did not enjoy what his since been called the full assurance of faith? or can you imagine that David was unacquainted with what has since been termed the doctrine of final perseverance? certainly he was led into the clear perception of both these truths; else he could not have said, I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever; not only to-day and to-morrow, if I live; not only this year and the next, if I live; not only through life, but when I come to die; and not only when I pass through the streams of death, but when I am landed safe on the other side; the high praises of his mercy and faithfulness shall be ever in my mouth. David was egregiously mistaken in his views, if what some blasphemously affirm to be true, that "he who is a child of God to-day may be a child of the devil to-morrow." You must either deny that the psalmist wrote under the unerring guidance of God's Spirit; or you must admit that the final preservation of God's renewed people is a doctrine of God's book.

But it is not enough for true believers to be sensible of the mercy of the Lord, and of the perpetuity of his grace: they wish to diffuse the savour of his name far and wide, and to realize David's resolution, with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations. Some who know the truth shun to declare it, and are afraid to speak out; they hide Christ's mark in the palm of their hands, instead of wearing it on their foreheads; and wrap up their Christianity in a cloak of secrecy; as if they deemed it their highest dishonour to be seen with Christ's livery on their backs. On the contrary, such believers as are strong in faith, giving glory to God, (instead of sneaking to heaven through bye-ways and private roads, concealed in a covered litter with the curtains drawn close about them,) rather wish to go thither over the public road of a declared profession, in an open chariot, so as to be seen and known of all men. But ministers of the gospel, above all mankind beside, should with their mouths make known God's faithfulness; and instead of desiring to slink into heaven at the back-door (if any such door there be), march publicly, with colours flying, and with sound of trumpet, to the great gate of the celestial city, and labour to carry thither as many souls with them as they possibly can.—Hence they must be urgent and importunate, in season and out of season; reproving, rebuking, and exhorting, with all long suffering and doctrine (h): the ministry of the word being the principal reaping-hook which God's Spirit makes use of, to cut off the poisonous excrescences of self-righteousness, to cut down the baneful weeds of practical licentiousness, and to gather elect sinners to the sanctifying and saving knowledge of himself. Let it however be observed, that the ministerial calls and exhortations of God's ambassadors, urged and addressed, as well to the awakened as the unawakened; do by no means imply that, in the divine intention, grace is universal, as the Arminians talk: nor that man, by a proper use of his reasonable faculties, becomes the architect of his own salvation. No. Quite the contrary. A fisher who stands upon the shore, and plunges his net into the sea at large, is not so frantic as to think of catching all the fishes in the sea, though he offers the net indefinitely, and without exception. So when a Christian minister spreads the gospel-net, he preaches to all that come within the sphere of his address; not with an expectation of catching all, but of catching as many as God shall please; knowing that it is the Holy Spirit alone who can drive souls into the net, and effectually catch them for Jesus Christ.

What was it which made David so desirous to sing of the mercies of the Lord? What was it that warmed and emboldened him at all events to make known Jehovah's faithfulness from one generation to another? It was the glorious gospel of the blessed God, seen in the light of the Spirit, and experienced through the influence of grace. Here is the reason of David's zeal: For I have said, mercy shall be built up for ever, thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens. What is this mercy, that is built up for ever, but the glorious and the gracious scheme, the glorious and the gracious fabric of our salvation, founded in the eternal purpose of God—carried into execution by the labours and the death of Jesus Christ—and then applied and brought home to the heart by the illuminating and converting power of the Holy Ghost? This is that mercy which is built up for ever. It was planned from everlasting: and will know no ruin nor decay through the illimitable line of eternity itself. Who is the builder of this fabric? Not man's free-will. Not man's own righteousness nor wisdom. Not human power nor human skill. Every true believer will here join issue with David, that it is God, and God alone, who builds up the temple of his church; and who, as the builder of it, is alone entitled to all the glory.

The elect constitute and form one grand house of mercy: a house, erected to display and to perpetuate the riches of the Father's free grace, of the Son's atoning merit, and of the Holy Ghost's efficacious agency. This house, contrary to the fate of all sublunary buildings, will never fall down, nor ever be taken down. As nothing can be added (i) to it, so nothing can be diminished from it. Fire cannot injure it: storms cannot overthrow it: age cannot impair it. It stands on a rock (k), and is immovable as the rock on which it stands: the three-fold rock of God's inviolable decree, of Christ's finished redemption, and of the Spirit's never-failing faithfulness. God is neither an unwise, a feeble, nor a capricious architect. He does not form a wretched scheme, liable to be frustrated, and which will hardly hang together at best: but all is well-ordered; all is everlasting; all is sure; and nothing consigned to after-thought or peradventure. God having irreversibly drawn his plan, and Christ having completely accomplished the redeeming work assigned him; the sacred Spirit has only to breathe upon the hearts of his people in effectual calling, give them faith, imbue them with inward holiness, preserve and increase the holiness he communicates, lead them forth in the paths of outward duty and obedience, exercise them with deserts, visit them with his comforts, keep them from falling, or restore them when fallen, seal them to the day of Christ, and carry them safely through death to heaven.

(h) 2 Timothy iv. 2.

Thus, mercy shall be built up for ever. And as surely as this book is the book of God; as surely as the Spirit of God inspired it, and inclined David to write these words; so surely is that a truth which the words themselves convey. No part of salvation is left at sixes and sevens; but the whole is a plan which does honour to infinite wisdom; a plan, conceived and hid (l) in the all-wise mind of God from eternal ages, but afterwards externally made known in the written word, or gospel of grace; and savingly unfolded in the souls of men, when the blessed Spirit begins to turn us from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God (m).

I was, yesterday, at some little distance from town; and received a very refined entertainment, in going over a most superb and elegant mansion which, both within and without, exhibited such a combination of magnificence, beauty, and perfection of taste, that I could not help feeling a curiosity to know how long that masterly edifice was in building? and, on being informed that it was both founded and finished within the compass of ten months only; I could not help observing, to some friends who were with me, that if human art and human hands could rear so transcendent a fabric as this, in so short a space, why should we think it strange that Jesus Christ was able to finish, and that he actually did finish, the fabric of man's salvation in a course of three-and-thirty years?

Blessed be God, our salvation is a finished work. It neither needs, nor will admit of, supplement.—And here, let us remember, that, when we talk of a finished salvation, we mean that complete and infallibly effectual redemption accomplished by the propitiatory merit of Christ's own personal obedience, and of Christ's own personal sufferings; both one and the other of which have that infinite perfection of atoning and of justifying efficacy, that it is utterly out of our power to add anything to the merit or validity of either. Every individual of mankind, for whom Christ obeyed, and for whom he bled, shall most certainly be saved by his righteousness and death, not one of the redeemed excepted; seeing Christ has paid, completely paid, the debt of perfect obedience and of penal suffering: so that divine justice must become unjust, ere it be possible for a single soul to perish for all or any of those debts which Christ took upon himself to discharge, and which he has absolutely discharged accordingly.

Arminianism cannot digest this grand Bible-truth. Hence that poor, dull, blind creature, Bishop Taylor, tells us, somewhere, if I mistake not, that "We are to atone for our great sins by weeping; and for our little sins by sighing." If our sins have no other atonement than this, we shall go on weeping, and wailing, and gnashing our teeth, to all eternity. But thanks to divine grace, the work of atonement is not now to do. Christ has already put away our sins by the sacrifice of himself (n). We are acquitted from guilt, and reconciled to God, not by our own tears, but by the precious blood of Jesus Christ, as of a lamb without spot or blemish (o):—not our own sighs, and tears, and sorrows; but the humiliation, the agony, the bloody sweat, and the bitter death, of Him who did no sin, of Him who was found in fashion as a man, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; these, and these alone, are the propitiation for our sins (p). And as surely as Christ obeyed, as surely as Christ expired, as surely as he rose again, as surely as he intercedes for all the people of his love; so certainly will they all, first and last, be enabled to sing of his faithfulness to all generations; and of that mercy which shall be built up for ever in their full, free, and final glorification.

This is farther confirmed, by those words of the Psalmist, "Thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens." As much as to say: "When all thy chosen, redeemed, and converted people are assembled round thy throne; then thou wilt, in the very heavens, give an everlasting proof of thy everlasting faithfulness." So far will

God be from leaving his people to perish in their passage through the wilderness of life, or through the river of death, that he will present them all, faultless, before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy (q) God loves his jewels too well, and Christ bought them at too dear a rate, and the Holy Spirit polishes them with too much attention, either to throw them away, or to lose them, at last. No: they shall be made up (r); their number shall be accomplished; and in their glorification will the whole Trinity be glorified.

Now, after surveying some of the branches, let us look at the grand root whence they spring. Having taken a cursory view of these streams, by which the Church of God is enriched unto salvation; let us endeavour to contemplate them in their great Source and Head. That you will find in verse the third; where God the Father says, I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant, thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. Do you suppose that this was spoken to David in his own person only? No, indeed: but to David as the anti-type, figure, and fore-runner of Jesus Christ.—Hence, the Septuagint version renders it, I have covenanted τοῖς ἐκλεκτοῖς μου, with my elect people, or with my chosen ones: i. e. with them in Christ, and with Christ in their name. I have sworn unto David my servant, unto the Messiah who was typified by David; unto my co-eternal Son, who stipulated to take on himself the form of a servant; thy seed, i. e. all those whom I have given to thee in the decree of election, all those whom thou shalt live and die to redeem, these will I establish for ever, so as to render their salvation irreversible and inamissible; and build up thy throne, thy mediatorial throne, as King of saints, and covenant Head of the elect, to all generations: there shall always be a succession of favoured sinners to be called and sanctified, in consequence of thy fœderal obedience unto death; and every period of time shall recompense thy covenant-sufferings with an increasing revenue of converted souls, until as many as are ordained to eternal life (s) are gathered in.

Observe, here, that when Christ received this promise from the Father, concerning the establishment of his [i. e. of Christ's] throne to all generations; the plain meaning is, that his people shall be thus established: for, consider Christ in his divine capacity as the Son of God, and his throne was already established, and had been from everlasting; and would have continued to be established without end, even if he had never been incarnate at all. Therefore, the promise imports that Christ shall reign, not simply as a person in the godhead (which he ever did, and ever will, and ever must); but relatively, mediatorially, and in his office-character, as the Deliverer and King of Zion. Hence it follows that his people cannot be lost: for he would be a poor sort of king who had, or might have, no subjects to reign over. Consequently, that throne of glory, on which Christ sits, is already encircled in part, and will at last be completely surrounded, and made still more glorious, by that innumerable company, that general assembly, and church of the first-born, who are written in heaven (t): for the remission of whose sins his blood was shed; for the justification of whose persons his righteousness was wrought; for the preservation of whom, in a state of grace, his intercession is still carried on in heaven; and to recover and retrieve whom from the personal dishonours of sin, the Holy Spirit comes down, and takes up his abode in their hearts, nor will ever cease from his gracious guardianship until he has sanctified them into the kingdom of God.

Well may the Psalmist add, And the heavens shall praise thy wonders, O Lord; thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints. What are we here to understand by the heavens? I should suppose the primary inhabitants of heaven; namely, the angels of light. Electing goodness, redeeming mercy, sanctifying grace, and preserving power, so beneficently exhibited in the salvation of fallen man, are wonders even to the very angels themselves. But are angels the only beings who shall wonder at this display of love? No: thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints. In the congregation of believing saints below, and of glorified saints above. For saints and angels, in the great result of things, when the transactions of grace and providence shall be unfolded and clearly laid open to the delighted view; at that august period, saints and angels, the redeemed and the unredeemed (but both elected, the one as well as the other) spirits that were always unembodied, and saints whose souls were for a time dislodged from the body in consequence of original sin, but who shall receive their bodies again in the resurrection of the just; all these, when they stand and shine above, shall join in casting their crowns, and in striking their golden lyres to the praises of him who has loved his people, and redeemed them unto God by his blood (u).

Time will not allow me to consider, as I designed, all the preliminary verses which lead to the text. Enough I hope has been observed to justify the declaration with which the text begins : Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound ! awfully intimating that there are some who sit within the sphere of this joyful sound, but who know it, feel it, and enjoy it not. It is to them a vox, et præterea nihil : a sound, and no more than a sound. But the blessedness results to those who know the joyful sound, and whose believing souls can say, The free blessings of the gospel are all our salvation, and all our desire.

It is a very common thing, when we talk of knowing the things that belong to our spiritual and eternal peace, for unconverted people to cry out, Oh, how presumptuous you are ! I totally deny the charge. It is not presumptuous to take God at his word, and to believe and to be sure that there shall be a performance of the things which are spoken and promised by the Lord (x). Thus when God avers to the penitent sinner, I, even I am he that blotth out thy transgressions for my own sake, and will not remember thy sins (y) ; it is not humility, but presumption itself, and the very quintessence of unbelief, that bids us put a negative on God's solemn asseveration, and induces us to question whether he will indeed make good his promise. I am firmly of opinion that the man who reads and professes to believe the Bible must have a large stock of assurance in the worst sense of the word (i. e. of audaciousness and effrontery), if he venture to deny that assurance in the best sense of the word, or a clear perception and conviction of interest in God's pardoning love, is the possible privilege of Christ's converted people. These will certainly concur with David in pronouncing them blessed who know the joyful sound : who know it when they hear it, and who know it for themselves ; whose hearts have been ploughed up by the Spirit of God, to receive the gospel-seed ; and in whom it springs into righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost (z). This, and this alone, comes up to the full idea of knowing the joyful sound. Hence we may learn who the persons are that know it indeed. Not Church of England People, in exclusion of others ; not Romanists ; not members of the Church of Scotland ; nor, in short, the partizans of any one denomination in particular. But the many individuals who, through grace, are enabled to know the joyful sound are those whom God takes out of all these and other denominations, to be a people for his name (a) : to wit, the elect of every age, place, and party. All God's converted, all his repenting, all his believing, all his obeying people, through the whole extent of the earth, from under one end of the heavens to the other ; all whose hearts are touched by the attractive power of his divine Spirit— are the people that know the joyful sound.

The joyful sound of what ? Of that free grace which it is the business of God's ministers to proclaim, saying, Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near (b). That joyful sound which says, Ho, every one (without exception of time, or place, or person), Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters (c) of life, joy, and salvation. But observe that even this is not a universal call. God forbid that I should be misunderstood by any who hear me this day. Do not imagine that I am hoisting the Arminian colours, and hanging out the false Arminian flag. No, by no means. I suppose there is hardly a more indefinite call, in all God's word, than that which I quoted last. But then, take notice, it is addressed only to those that thirst : i. e. to those who so far know the joyful sound as to wish for an experimental participation of the blessings it proclaims. It would be frivolous to call them to the waters who do not thirst. It would be ridiculous mockery, should we invite the dead to sit down at table, and lay a plate and knife and fork before them, and ask them why they will not eat ? The plain fact is, they cannot eat nor drink. They must be made alive ere they can have so much as an appetite to either.

There is a passage very frequently, but very idly, insisted upon by the Arminians ; as if it were a hammer which would at one stroke crush the whole fabric of free grace to powder. The passage is, Why will ye die, O house of Israel (d) ? But it so happens, that the death here alluded to is neither spiritual death, nor eternal death : as abundantly appears from the whole tenor of the chapter. The death intended by the prophet is a political death ; a death of national prosperity, tranquillity, and security. And the sense of the question is fairly and precisely this : What is it that makes you in love with captivity, banishment, and civil ruin ? Abstinence from the worship of images might, as a people, exempt you from those calamities, and once more render you a respectable nation. Are the miseries of public devastation so very alluring as to attract your determined pursuit ? Why will ye die ? die as the house of Israel ; and considered as a political body ? Thus reasonably did the prophet argue the case. Adding, at the same time, this no less reasonable declaration : As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth. Wherefore, turn yourselves, and live ye. Which imports these two things : 1. That the national captivity of the Jews added nothing to the happiness of God. It brought him no accession either of profit or pleasure.

x. Luke i. 45.
y) Isa. xliiii. 25.

(z) Rom. xiv. 14.

(a) Acts xv. 14.
(c) Isa. lv. 1.

And I should wonder much if (philosophically speaking) any thing whatever could add to the divine felicity, which is already infinite; and consequently insusceptible of augmentation.—2. That if the Jews turned from idolatry, and flung away their images, they should not die in a foreign, hostile country, but live peaceably in their own land, and enjoy their liberties as an independent people.

And now what has all this to do with the blessings of grace and glory? No more than it has to do with Gog and Magog. Would it not be very absurd, if I was to stand in a church-yard, and say to the dead bodies there interred, Why will ye die? Nor, in my idea, would it be less so, were I to ask a spiritually dead sinner, Why wilt thou die? Alas, he is dead already (e): and to put such a question to one in such a state would be, in reality, to ask a man who is already fallen in Adam (as every man is), Why wilt thou fall in Adam? Let Arminians rant in this manner if they think fit. They shall, for me, have all the ranting, unenvied and unrivalled, to themselves. I think it will not bear water.

Quite a different thing is the joyful sound of gospel grace. It imparts life to the dead, and health to the living. You bath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins (f). And, says God, concerning his quickened Church, I will [not tantalize her with an empty offer; but actually] bring it health and cure (g). Regeneration gives spiritual life, and sanctification gives spiritual health, to the soul. How is spiritual health evidenced to ourselves and others? Not by lolling in the elbow chair of sloth: but by abounding in the work of the Lord. For, however some people may call us Antinomians (as Christ himself and the apostles were so (h) called before us, by the unblushing Pharisees of that age), and falsely accuse our good conversation (i), as though we were enemies to the moral law; we are so far from it, that (I aver it boldly, and let any contradict me if they can)—We who believe salvation to be the absolute gift of grace are the only people that assert the due honours of the law, and establish its authority on an unshaken basis.

1. We assert its honours, by considering it as a transcript of God's own holiness; as absolutely perfect in all its requisitions; as the invariable standard of moral excellency; as the sublime rule by which Christ himself adjusted his own matchless obedience; and as the school-master which, in subserviency to the Holy Spirit's influence, prepares us (by the severity of its discipline) for the reception of Christ, and for hearing, to good purpose, that sound of gospel grace which is joyful to those only whom the law, thus viewed, has (k) instrumentally convinced of sin.

2. We establish its (l) authority, by grafting our obedience to it upon the never-dying principle of (m) love to Christ; by aiming at practical conformity to its precepts, as the grand visible evidence of our part in God's election and in the Messiah's (n) redemption; by believing and asserting that it still remains in full force, and will so remain while the sun and moon endure, as the rule of our moral walk; and by beseeching God the Holy Ghost to (o) write it upon our hearts accordingly. For, whatever is absolutely of moral obligation, is and must be, in its very nature, irrevocable.

Thus does the joyful sound proclaim the majesty, and even add to the sanctions, of the moral law. To fulfil the whole righteousness of that law, and to endure its awful penalty, as a covenant of works, the Son of God Most High bowed the heavens and came down.—To make his ransomed people love that law as a directory of conduct; and to make them actually transcribe its maxims into their lives, as a medium of their conformity to God; the uncreated Spirit descends upon their souls as a dove, and works in them both to will and to do.

But still we must consider the law as in the hand of (p) Christ: and remember, that the love of God, graciously shed (q) abroad in the heart is that only acceptable principle from which believers act.

Now, that joyful sound which the people are pronounced blessed who know, con-

(e) An ingenious pen has lately exposed, with equal strength and delicacy, the impertinent application, which Arminianism makes, of the prophet Ezekiel's question and exhortation.

"Arise ye dead," Arminius cries:

"Arise ye dead to sin!

"Untop your ears, unseal your eyes,

"And a new life begio.

"Why will ye die, ye wretched souls?

"Ye dead, why will ye die?

"Quicken and make your spirits whole:

"To life eternal fly."

As Baal's worshippers of old,

Begg'd, pray'd, and cry'd aloud;

Cutting their bodies, as we're told,

To wear a fac'd god;

So on the idol man he'll call,

And pompously declare,

Though slightly damaged by the fall,

It's great his powers are.

"Rise, noble creature! Men, arise!

"And make yourself alive!

"Prepare yourself to mount the skies;

"For endless glory strive."

Deluded Ser! But man will lie

Still senseless as a stone;

And you yourself stand fooling by,

'Till both are quite undone;

Unless Almighty power be mov'd

By God's free-will, not thine,

To quicken both, and make his love

On both your hearts to shine.

sists, greatly, in what the word of God brings to light concerning (r) that eternal purpose of electing grace which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. For, notwithstanding the profane endeavours of some to misrepresent that great and precious truth as a gloomy, uncomfortable doctrine, they, whose eyes God has enlightened, and they whose hearts God has touched, know that it is not a gloomy, but a joyful, sound: and all their hearts' desire is, O that I might, with more unclouded faith, behold my name shining in the Lamb's Book of Life! Christ himself, that great preacher of predestination, and who certainly was a competent judge of the question in hand, considered election as a heart-reviving doctrine: or he never would have commanded his disciples to rejoice because their names are written in heaven (s). Whoever professes to preach the gospel without taking absolute election into the account, that minister turns his back upon the tree of life, quenches one of the capital lights which he ought to elevate on a candlestick, and withholds from his people the very root and essence of the joyful sound.

What is free remission of sin, through the precious blood and atonement of Jesus Christ;—what is unconditional and irreversible justification, through Christ's righteousness imputed;—what is that truth which tells us that the Spirit of Christ is the renewer, the inhabitant, the illuminator, and the everlasting comfortor of God's children;—what is that word which assures us that the Lord will not turn away from the people of his love, nor suffer them finally to turn away from him, but that he will seal them his for ever, and preserve them through life and death to glory, though every step they take upon earth is paved with snares, and, if left to themselves a moment, down they must fall into the nethermost hell;—what is the continued advocacy of Christ, whereby he wears his priesthood upon his throne, and intercedes for his militant people, so that, while they are travelling, or fighting, or fainting, he is praying, by the perpetual presentation of himself before God, as a lamb newly slain;—what are the promises which relate to the success, support, and deliverance of the soul, in death; which ensure a bodily resurrection to glory, honour, and immortality; and which ascertain the endless beatification of soul and body together, in the kingdom of God;—What, I say, are all these, but so many parts and branches of the joyful sound? and a joyful sound it is. God make it such to us!

Was the matter left in the hand of our free-will, the joyful sound would soon darken into a dismal one. We should never come into a state of grace at all. And, if God was to put us into it, and then resign us to our own management, we should quickly make shipwreck of every thing. Adam, in the state of innocence, did not, probably, stand twenty-four hours. And how should the believer, who is in a mixt state of sin and grace, and in whom are (t) the company of two armies, flesh and spirit, at perpetual war with each other; how could such a person possibly continue, even for four-and-twenty minutes, if the same Almighty love, which put him into the covenant, did not keep him in it?

A good man of the last century says, and with great truth, "the strongest believer of us all is like a glass without a foot, which cannot stand one moment longer than is held." And our Lord had a similar view of the matter, when he declared, that he holds all his sheep in (u) his hand: as much as to say, Was I to leave you for an instant, down you would fall: therefore I hold you fast, and none shall pluck thee out of my hand.

O how comfortable is it, when the Lord makes these truths known, by his Spirit, to the heart! How blessed are the people that thus know the joyful sound! Who can see that God has loved them in his Son; who can feel that Christ died for them, to be their everlasting peace; who are satisfied that their peace is not now to make, but was completely made and sealed, by the precious blood of his cross, ages and ages before they drew their breath; who are sweetly assured that the Holy Spirit, who has begun to show them the great things of Christ, will go on more clearly to show them that he will never leave them nor forsake them, in life, in death, nor even at their journey's end! This is that joyful sound which God enables his people to know. And what is the consequence of knowing it?

Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound. Wherefore are they blessed, or happy? And in what does their blessedness consist? They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance. As much as to say, we need but know this joyful sound to be happy. We need but know what it is to be loved, chosen, redeemed, and sanctified from among men; and then that knowledge will cause us to (x) walk upon our high places, and to triumph in the name of the Lord our God. We shall bask in the smile, we shall enjoy the sun-shine, of God's countenance upon our souls.

What is the meaning of that phrase, They shall walk in the light of thy countenance! Suppose any great personage was to patronize some obscure man, and favour him with his peculiar intimacy and friendship. It would, in that case, be natural for us to say, "such a person is greatly countenanced by this or that nobleman." So here: They shall walk in the light of thy countenance: i. e. they shall be, sensibly, in the favour of God. They shall enjoy comfortable communion and fellowship with God. They shall have a satisfactory persuasion that the Lord is at peace with them, through the blood of Christ; and that (y) being justified by faith, they also are, on their part, at peace with the Lord. They (z) receive the atonement (for the true business of faith is, not to make atonement, but simply to receive and rest upon Christ's atonement, already made, and which faith itself does not render more efficacious than it intrinsically is). Sometimes, the tide of assurance rolls in so richly upon the soul, as to rise quite (if I may so speak) to high-water mark, and not to leave so much as the shadow of a doubt upon the mind. When it is thus with the believer, he may be eminently said to walk in the light of God's countenance. Faith looks (a) within the veil. The interposing scene opens. We almost hear the angels sing. We almost see the souls of the glorified do homage to grace, and throw their crowns at the divine footstool. We almost behold the King of saints (b) in his beauty, shining as (c) the Lamb in the midst of the throne.—Precious moments these! But soon the scene closes. We descend from the mountain top, and find ourselves again in the valley.

If God, however, has not yet given you any assurance of his love, do not imagine that you are therefore an alien and an outcast. For, I imagine, that God's countenance, or favour, and the light of his countenance, or the clear and comfortable knowledge of his favour, are two distinguishable things. God may bear a favour to us, he may love us, and be resolved to save us; and yet not indulge us with the immediate light of his countenance.—But of one thing I am as clearly positive as that I am now preaching in the Lock Chapel: namely, that none, whose hearts are at all wrought upon by the finger of God's Spirit, can sit down, quite easily and contentedly, without wishing to experience what the light of God's countenance means. Their desire is to know it, to walk in it, and to walk worthy of it.

Have you never observed, after the sun has been shining, perhaps for hours together, a diffusing mist has arisen from the earth, or a floating cloud has interposed in the sky, and shaded the grand luminary from your view? yet, in reality, the sun still shone as before, though your sensation of its lustre was suspended.—Thus, in the darkest seasons of spiritual distress, God's countenance, or favour, is still toward you for good; and shines, not only with inextinguishable, but also with undiminishable, intensity. Is it not, however, a most desirable felicity, to see and to feel the light of his face, beaming full upon us, as the sun when it goeth forth in its might (d)? This is what the apostle means, where he says: God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God [i. e. to enlighten us into the knowledge of the Father's glorious grace, as exhibited] εν προσωπῳ, in the person [and as displayed in the finished salvation] of Jesus Christ (e). And this is, likewise, what the psalmist means in the text: They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance.

Do you ask, "How is this happy communion with God to be attained?"—I answer: that it is not of human attainment, but of the Holy Spirit's vouchsafement. Whence David, elsewhere, prays, Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us (f).

Do you farther ask? "How this sweet illumination and fellowship are to be sought, and cultivated, and cherished?"—I answer: That the wisdom, and the will of God, and that orderly concatenation of one blessing with another, which he has established in his covenant of grace, all concur to assure us that, if we wish to enjoy the unintercepted rays of his presence within, we must cultivate holiness—abound in good works—be much in God's company, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving—drink continually at the fountain of his written word—and converse frequently, and compare experiences, with others of God's children; more especially with such of them as are either eminently lively, or remarkably exercised with desertions: such conversations are always profitable, and often make (g) our hearts burn within us, while we mutually unfold the Scriptures, and (h) speak one to another, concerning (i) the things which pertain to the kingdom of God. The sick and the dying beds of Christ's people are, in a very eminent degree, schools of instruction and consolation. I have often gone to them as cold (spiritually speaking) as a stone: and returned from them half as warm as an angel.

In one word: communion with God requires that we be found in all the means of grace, and in the way of universal duty:

and that we shun, as we would poison or the plague, whatever tends to cast a damp upon our intercourse with the Holy Ghost, to "urnish our graces, or darken our evidences. Were you to find that even the crossing of a straw was conducive to bring a cloud upon your soul, and to obstruct your fellowship with God, it would be as much your duty to abstain from crossing that straw as if, 'Thou shalt not cross a straw' was one of the ten commandments. But in all these respects every man must judge for himself in particular. God has generally connected good with good, and evil with evil. If therefore you are suffered to be off your guard, and off your watch, though you cannot (if you are a true believer) so fall as to break your neck, yet you may break your limbs in such a manner as to go halting to the day of your death. The Lord graciously "strengthen (k) such as do stand," and effectually "raise (l) up them that fall;" by making both these and those more ardently and more practically careful than ever, to walk in the light of his countenance! For surely, next to the love of God's heart, believers value the smiles of his face: from which, as from the agency of the sun, arise the buddings of conscious joy; the leaves of unsullied profession; the variegated blossom of holy tempers; and the beneficent fruits of moral righteousness.

They are totally mistaken who suppose that the light of God's countenance, and the privileges of the gospel, and the comforts of the Spirit, conduce to make us indolent and unactive in the way of duty. The text cuts up this surmise by the roots. For it does not say they shall sit down in the light of thy countenance; or they shall lie down in the light of thy countenance; but they shall walk in the light of thy countenance. What is walking? It is a progressive motion from one point of space to another. And what is that holy walking which God's Spirit enables all his people to observe? It is a continued progressive motion from sin to holiness; from all that is evil to every good word and work.

And the self-same light of God's countenance, in which you, O believer, are enabled to walk, and which at first gave you spiritual feet wherewith to walk, will keep you in a walking and in a working state to the end of your warfare. So that your path shall, under the shinings of his Spirit (for we can do nothing but as He vouchsafes his grace from moment to moment), wax brighter and brighter to the perfect day (m). The truly righteous shall hold on in his course; and he that hath clean hands shall grow stronger and stronger (n). Nor shall they only walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance; they shall also at times even run and not be weary (o): namely, when they are eminently drawn of God. Draw us, and we will run after thee (p).

Though God finds all his children still-born, or spiritually dead, before he has quickened them by his own effectual power and grace, yet he makes them alive, in order that they may live afterwards to his honour and glory (q). He lifts up the light of his countenance upon the human mind, with a view analagous to that for which he causes the light of the natural sun to rise upon the world. To what end does the sun shine upon us in a morning? Not that we may continue to close our eyelids and press all day the bed of indolence; but that we may up and be doing. And why does the light of God's Spirit shine inwardly upon his people? That they may arise and walk in the light of his countenance, and work the works of God while it is day (r), as Jesus Christ gave them example: walk becomingly of him who has called them to glory and virtue. For it is not holy talking, but holy walking, that proves us to be the children of God.

Yet, after we have done as much, and have walked as far, in the ways of God as his grace has enabled us, what is the subject matter of our confidence and rejoicing? Not ourselves, nor our own performances; but the free mercy of the Father, and the all perfect merit of Him that died and rose again. As good Mr. Hervey asks, "Can our charitable deeds expiate our innumerable offences? As soon might a drop of fresh water correct and sweeten the unfathomable brine of the ocean. Can our defective performances satisfy the demands of a perfect law, or our wandering devotions screen us from the displeasure of an injured God? As well may our uplifted hand eclipse the sun, or intercept the lightning when it darts through the bursting cloud. We can be reconciled to God only by Jesus Christ (s)."—It is the sweet employ of faith to do as many good works as she can; and to renounce them as fast as she does them: saying, Lord, when saw we thee hungry, and fed thee (t)? &c.

(t) Mat. xxv. 41.—The holy and judicious Dr. Crisp has some remarks equally valuable in themselves, and pertinent to the argument in hand. "We [who believe] do not perform Christian duties in order to our being delivered from wrath; but we perform them because we are delivered.—A man will work for Christ who hath tasted of Christ's loving-kindness: he stands ready to shew forth the praise of that glorious grace which hath so freely saved him. Such a man is as glad to work for Christ's sake, as if he was to work for his own salvation.—There are many ingenious persons in the world, who will be more ready to serve a friend that

Thus we learn from the text that the self-same people who walk in the light of God's countenance, and are active in the observations of moral duty, have, when they have done all, something infinitely better to rejoice in and to rely upon than the sanctity of their walk, and the various duties which they perform. In Thy name, not in their own rectitude, shall they rejoice all the day: and in thy righteousness, not in their own doings, shall they be exalted. During the day of sublunary life they shall sing, with the apostle, God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ (z): and when, having breathed their last on earth, they fly to the coast of immortality, they are the inchoatively, and shall (after the final audit) be completely and everlastingly, exalted to the kingdom of God, in and through the alone imputed righteousness of their Saviour, their Surety, and their Head.

By the name of Christ, in which the elect are here said to rejoice, I understand Christ himself: the blessed person signified by that name. Who is the brightness, the ακωνασμα, the emanation, or forth-beaming ray of the Father's glory (x): and is by virtue of that eternal and incomprehensible derivation (y), God of God; light of light; very God of very God; begotten, not made; co-equal partaker of one substance [i. e. of the same numerical nature and essence] with the Father: by whom all things were made.

In his name, i. e. in the divinity of his person, and in his offices as Mediator; in his finished atonement, in the perfect righteousness of his obedience, and in his never-failing intercession for the elect; it is the privilege of the humble, the contrite, the feeble, the tempted, and of the fallen (if returning) believer, to rejoice: because it was for such men and for their salvation that this adorable Being came down from heaven, and poured out his soul unto death.

Do not imagine that David was an Antinomian because he makes no mention of good works as objects of joy and dependence. True it is that he does not say, "saints shall rejoice in their faithfulness, in their affected mortifications, or even in those works that spring from genuine grace." No: not in these, but in His name shall all the Gentiles trust (z), and of his only righteousness shall they make their boast. Inherent graces and personal duties are the ornaments, but neither the foundation nor the pillars, of God's mystic temple.

As Christ's righteousness is the only merit that can exalt us to the presence and to the kingdom of God, so that doctrine alone is to be considered as evangelical which depresses the righteousness of man and exalts the righteousness of Christ: leading us to trust, not on what we do, but singly on what he has done and suffered for us. The business of the law is to knock us down from the pedestal of self-confidence and to grind us small, as Moses ground to powder and dispersed the materials of the Israelitish idol. The business of grace is to lift us from the dust, to settle us upon Christ the rock of ages, to put a new song of free salvation into our mouths, and to order our goings in the path of God's commandments. This it is (even the power of the holy Ghost, who first breaks us in pieces by the hammer of the law, and then puts us together anew by the grace of the gospel) that enables us to rejoice in the name of Christ all the day. Not that a believer's rejoicing is uninterrupted from the time of his conversion until the moment of his arrival in heaven: for the elect have their weeping as well as their triumphant seasons; and their pilgrimage is wisely chequered and diversified both with joys and sorrows that the world knows not of. The meaning therefore of the text is that a sinner is no sooner born again than Christ, and Christ alone, becomes the object of that sinner's dependance; who can thenceforth say with Dr. Watts,

"While Jews on their own works rely,
And Greeks of wisdom boast;
I love the incarnate mystery,
And there I fix my trust."

The converted sinner having thus, through the good hand of God upon him, fixed all his hopes on Jesus Christ the righteous, travels the residue of his way leaning on the merits of the (a) beloved Mediator: and is finally exalted to the actual participation of the celestial inheritance above, in and by has already raised them, than to serve a master that they may be raised. This is the true service of a believer. His eye is to the glory of Christ, in regard of what Christ hath already done for him: and not in expectation of any thing Christ has yet to do. He looks upon all as perfectly done for him in the hand of Christ, and ready to be delivered out to him [i. e. to the believer himself] as his occasions may require. The work of salvation being thus completed by Christ, and not to be mended by the creature; the believer now having nothing to do for himself [as a cause or condition of salvation]; all he doth, he doth for Christ.—I would only ask you this plain question: Are our works of sanctification Christ himself; or are they not? If they be Christ himself, then there are thousands of Christs in the world. If they be not Christ, then there is no coming to the Father by them: because the coming to the Father for peace, pardon, reconciliation, and salvation, is by Christ alone, and by him as the sole way. Salvation itself, therefore, is not the end proposed in any good work we do. The ends of our good works are the manifestation of our obedience and subjection; the setting forth the praise of God's grace, and there by glorifying him in the world; the doing good to others with a view to their profit; and the meeting the Lord Jesus Christ in the performance of duty, where he will be found, according to his promise. These are some of the special ends for which obedience is ordained: salvation being settled firm before."

virtue of that divine righteousness which God the Son wrought out, which God the Father imputes, which God the Spirit applies, and felt emptying faith receives.

The learned and evangelical Mr. (b) Thomas Cole, a renowned and useful minister of Christ in the last century, had an observation or two, in his last illness, full to the sense of the clause with which the text concludes; In thy righteousness shall they be exalted. "It would be miserable dying, if we had not something every way adequate to the demands of the law, to ground our hopes of eternal life upon. We have an abundant entrance into the kingdom of God, by the way of Christ's righteousness. The devil and the law may meet us: yet cannot hinder us from entering into heaven by that righteousness. We shall be sure to meet with the devil, with conscience, with wicked men, and with the law of God, in our way to heaven: and we can deal with none of them, but by that righteousness which hath satisfied all. Let us bring that along with us, and they will all flee before it. If a sinner comes in his own righteousness, shut him out, sayeth God; so sayeth conscience; so sayeth the law. But, when one comes clothed with the righteousness of Christ, let him in, sayeth God; so sayeth conscience; so sayeth the law: and let the devil say a word to the contrary, if he dare.

"I should not dare to look death in the face, were it not for the comfortable assurance which faith gives me of eternal life in Christ Jesus, and for the comfortable and abundant flowings in of that life. It is not what I bring to Christ, but what I receive from him. The beginnings of which I see springing up into life eternal.

"Some persons think to lick themselves whole, by their own moral righteousness; but it is the ready way to die in horror of conscience.

"If you want the manifestation of the pardon of any sins, carry them to free grace; which, having blotted them out, knows how to give you a sense of it. The gospel of our salvation is a gospel of free-grace; and they that would have it otherwise may gather up what they can, and go boasting to heaven's gates; but they will be turned back again."

And how was this great man of God supported by Christ's righteousness, when in the immediate view of death? Learn what that righteousness can then do for us, by the following memorable speech, which he addressed to one of his visitants: "You are come to hear my last dying groans: but know, when you hear them, that they are the sweetest breath I ever drew since I knew Christ Jesus."

O thou blessed Son of God, exalt us in thy righteousness, and shake us out of our own! Ye, that hear me this day, which, O which, are you for? For being found and exalted in Christ's obedience? or for inheriting perdition and damnation in your own? God enable you and cause you to choose the good part!

To cut off, as far as man can do it, all the pleas of proud, self-righteous unbelief, let me conclude with two or three pertinent remarks.

1. Why is the gospel news of salvation called the joyful sound? Not, indefinitely, a joyful, but peculiarly, and exclusively of all other schemes whatever, the joyful sound?

Because it is the vehicle of making known to us that God is love, and that he has (in the blood and righteousness of Christ) opened a channel for his love to exert itself in the salvation of the unworthy. The lost are found; the blind see: the deaf hear: the lame walk: the leprous are cleansed: the dead are made alive: and all without money, and without price (c).

2. Have you any part or lot in that blessedness of which the text speaks? Any comfortable views, or hopes of interest in God's election, and in Christ's propitiation, and in the Spirit's renewing grace? Ask, and it shall (not be sold to you for your works and for your imaginary fulfilment of pretended conditions, but a sense of interest shall) be given you: seek, in the alone name and for the alone righteousness' sake of Christ, and ye shall find the mercies you want: knock, but let it be with an empty hand, at the door of divine clemency, and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asks, receives; and he that seeks, finds; and to him that knocks, it shall be opened (d). As surely as God draws you to Christ, so surely will Christ, at his own set time, make you a sharer in the blessedness of them that know the joyful sound.

3. You, who have believed with your hearts unto righteousness, (e) give God the whole glory; and pray that you may continually have more enlivening views of that

(b) Author of a well-known treatise on Regeneration, Faith, and Repentance. This excellent man died (if so triumphant a passage to glory may be called death) September 16, 1697; as I learn from a valuable manuscript formerly put into my hands by a gentleman of London; out of which manuscript (containing Mr. Cole's own account of his spiritual experiences, together with a memoir, afterwards added, of his dying sayings) I extracted the passages given above. And I wish I was at liberty to publish more: or rather that the very respectable and judicious person who favoured me with a sight of those choice papers would himself give them to the public, and condescend to be the editor of them. I should ask his pardon for the freedom I take in venturing to print even the few lines here quoted, without having first solicited his permission, did I not believe that he infinitely prefers the glory of God and of the gospel to any punctilios derivable from the scruples and delicacies of ceremonious complaisance.

(c) Isa. lv. 1. (d) Matt. vii. 7, 8. (e) Rom. x. 10.

imputed righteousness, on which he has caused you to trust. As, on the one hand, nothing can warrant and animate your joy; so, on the other (to use the expression of a good man, now with God), "Nothing can effectually kill sin, but a clear beholding of Christ's righteousness." Cleave to this sure and steadfast anchor, and you will finally rise superior, both to the waves of affliction, and to the mud of your own lusts and corruptions.

4. Make it your predominant object of ambition to walk in the light of God's countenance. If you are blessed with his smile, no matter though the whole creation were to frown.

5. But whether you walk in light or darkness, in comfort or distress, remember that you have nothing but the name, the covenant, the person, and the work of Christ, to rejoice in and to depend upon. We, says the apostle, are the circumcision, who worship God the Spirit (f), and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh.

6. Know whence all your spiritual and eternal exaltation arises. Not from yourselves, in any respect, nor in any degree. Free-will, until sanctified by regeneration, is a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint. And works, "done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are," as our Church justly pronounces them to be, "sinful and displeasing to God." (g) Nay, even the best works we can perform after conversion fall immensely short of what God's law requires, in point both of matter and of manner, of quantity and quality, of number, extent, purity, and weight. What, then, would become of us, if it was not for Christ's righteousness? St. Paul himself, with all his matchless retinue of holy works and useful labours, must have sunk, even from the scaffold of martyrdom, into the nethermost hell. Blessed, therefore, be the free grace of God, for that precious word of infallible promise, in thy righteousness shall thy people be exalted!

7. What is it which made, and will for ever continue to make, Christ's righteousness so infinitely meritorious and efficacious? The divinity of his person. All the created beings in the universe, whether angelic or human, unfallen, fallen, or restored, would never, by their utmost endeavours united, be able to furnish out and make up a righteousness of sufficient value to claim the favour of God upon the footing of justice and merit, or to present any one of the chosen seed blameless before the burning eyes of infinite sanctity. Such power belongeth only to the righteousness of the God-man Jehovah incarnate. Nothing but that all-perfect and everlasting merit, which is the complex result of his obedience and of his sacrifice, can exalt and retrieve us to the dignity and felicity of heaven.

The divinity of Christ can hardly receive stronger proof from Scripture than that which our text supplies. For the whole two verses, which have been the subject of our meditation this morning, are a solemn address to the Messiah; not as man and Messiah, but, in his highest capacity, as God with God, or as the eternally and the only begotten of the Father. Let us give the text a short review, and we shall immediately perceive that it is neither more nor less than a devotional application, explicitly directed to the second person of the Trinity: an application formed in the strictest terms of worship, even of worship absolutely and properly divine; and which cannot, without the most gross and damnable idolatry, be offered to any being inferior to God himself.

Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound of salvation by thee: They shall walk, O Jehovah, in the light of thy countenance; in thy name shall they rejoice all the day; and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted.

Now, what would you think of the man that was to offer such an address as this to the highest archangel in heaven? And what was David, if he could solemnly and deliberately pen this address to a created intelligence; and cause it to be publicly sung by the Levites and chief singers of Israel, and even leave it on record for the seduction of posterity? And at a time, too, when the Jewish nation were particularly careful to execrate and shun every thing that had the least tendency to idolatry? Either Christ is truly God, or David was the sacrilegious worshipper of a false one.

If, therefore, any of you should be beset by the cunning craftiness of men who lie in wait to deceive; should you meet with such as tell you that Christ is not Jehovah, or very and eternal God; recollect, if no other passage of scripture, yet these two verses, and their context; which will, alone, at any time, suffice to put to flight the sophistry of the aliens.

Can we be exalted in the righteousness of a creature? Would God the Father accept, and command us to trust in, the atonement of a finite being? By the same rule, we might (with the impudent Papists) trust in the supposed merits of the Virgin Mary, or of St. any body else. And by the same rule, we might descend a step lower, and (with the still more impudent Pelagians) trust in our own supposed merits, and burn incense to the withered arm of our own blasted free-will. In short, there is no end to the horrible impieties, which flow from trampling the divinity and the righteousness of Christ under foot.

Moreover, if Christ was not God over all, blessed for ever, each individual of mankind who trusts in the Messiah's merits would come within the circuit of that tremendous malediction, denounced by the lips of Him who is able to save and to destroy. Thus saith Jehovah, Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from Jehovah: for he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh, &c. Jer. xvii. 5, 6. Faith in Christ would be the most damning sin under the cope of heaven, and God's law would pronounce us accursed for relying upon him, if he were not as absolutely Jehovah as the Father. And I must add, that this awful text concludes equally strong against Pharisees of all sorts and sizes, who trust either in angels, or in departed spirits, or in their own wretched selves, for any part of salvation, whether little or much. Christ alone is to be trusted in for pardon, for justification, for everlasting life, and for the whole of our safety and felicity, from beginning to end. Whence it is immediately added, in the above chapter of Jeremiah, Blessed is the man that trusteth in Jehovah, and whose hope Jehovah is. For he [i. e. the man that trusts and hopes in Jesus only] shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green; and shall not be careful in the year of drought, neither shall cease from yielding fruit.

I perceive the elements are upon the sacramental table. And I doubt not many of you mean to present yourselves at that throne of grace, which God has mercifully erected in the righteousness and sufferings of his co-equal Son. O beware of coming with one sentiment on your lips and another in your hearts! Take heed of saying, with your mouths, "We do not come to this thy table, O merciful Lord, trusting in our own righteousness;" while perhaps you have in reality, some secret reserves in favour of that very self-righteousness which you profess to renounce; and think that Christ's merit alone will not save you unless you add something or other to make them effectual. O be not so deceived; for God will not thus be mocked, nor will Christ thus be insulted with impunity. Call your works what you will, whether terms, causes, conditions, or supplements; the matter comes to the same point, and Christ is equally thrust out of his mediatorial throne, by these or any other similar views of human obedience. If you do not wholly depend on Jesus, as the Lord your righteousness (h); if you mix your faith in him with any thing else; if the finished work of the crucified God be not alone your acknowledged anchor and foundation of acceptance with the Father both here and ever; come to his table, and receive the symbols of his body and blood at your peril! Leave your own righteousness behind you, or you have no business there. You are without the wedding garment; and God will say to you, Friend, how camest thou here? If you go on, moreover, to live and die in this state of unbelief, you will be found speechless and excuseless in the day of judgment: when the slighted Saviour will say to his angels concerning you, Bind him hand and foot, and cast him into outer darkness; for many are called, but few chosen (i).

On the contrary, you who can truly say "We do not come to Thee, trusting in our own righteousness," but feel and confess ourselves to be "unworthy of so much as gathering up the crumbs under thy table;" in thee alone do we seek to be justified, and in thee alone do we (k) glory; let such "draw near with faith, and take this holy sacrament to their comfort." The Lord enable you to bring your sins and your duties, and yourselves and your all, to the great Propitiation! May he wash us in his own blood, clothe us with his own righteousness, and seal us a holy people to himself by his Spirit! then shall we be acceptable guests at his table below; and ripen fast for the house of glory above: while this is all our plea and all our song—Lord, I am not worthy to come under thy roof, nor that thou shouldst come under mine; but the (l) Lamb that was slain is worthy; and my every particle of hope centres in him, in his covenant, in his obedience, cross, humiliation, and exaltation. For the sake of his agonies, take away my iniquities. For the sake of his righteousness, receive me graciously. And in the mantle of his imputed merit may I be (m) found living, dying, at the judgment-bar, and to all eternity.

JOY IN HEAVEN OVER ONE REPENTING SINNER:

The substance of a discourse preached in the parish church of St. Luke, Old-Street; on Sunday Morning, October 29, 1775.

Ye are come unto the Innumerable company of angels, and to the spirits of just men made perfect. Heb. xii. 22, 23.

SERMON VIII.

Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance. Luke xv. 7.

REPENTANCE is one of those graces without which there can be no salvation. It is an essential pre-requisite to spiritual peace on earth; and absolutely necessary as a preparative for the eternal happiness of heaven. The reason is evident: viz. because every man is a fallen being. We must therefore, by the effectual working of God's good Spirit, be made sensible of our fall; or we shall never feel our need of redemption and restoration from it, through the alone covenant-grace of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

(h) Jer. xxiii. 6.

Not that either repentance, or faith, or any of their practical fruits, are in the least respect causal, or conditional, or meritorious of pardon, happiness and eternal life. Every grace and every good work are the free gifts of God. From him only "all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works, do proceed (n)." He it is who "grants us true repentance and his Holy Spirit (o)." Consequently, we cannot possibly, in the very nature of things, merit (i. e. earn) or entitle ourselves to his favour, by any grace we exercise, or by any duty we perform. His gifts lay us under infinite obligations to him instead of empowering us to merit anything from him. They do not render him a debtor to us, but render us unspeakable and everlasting debtors to him.

Therefore, when we say that no man can be ultimately saved without such and such qualifications; we do not mean that those qualifications have any influence in obtaining our salvation (for inherent grace and eternal glory are already obtained, and infallibly secured to all God's elect, by the obedience and blood of Christ): but that those qualifications (as faith, repentance, and holiness of heart and life) are essential branches and indispensable evidences of this absolutely free salvation.

The argument may be illustrated thus. No person can attain to full maturity of manhood, until he has passed through the intermediate stages of infancy, childhood, and youth. And yet it would be very absurd, were we to say that a state of manhood is merited by the previous states of youth, childhood and infancy!—So, in order to the consummation of our recovery unto God, it is antecedently necessary that we believe, repent, and resemble Christ in holiness. Yet faith, repentance, and sanctification, do not merit the kingdom of heaven, though we cannot reach that kingdom without them. According to the established order of grace, we must be endued with those spiritual gifts before we can receive the gift of glorification to crown the whole. Just as, according to the established course of nature, we must be children before we can be full grown men.

In this only sense then it is that the several graces of the blessed Spirit are so many pre-requisites to final salvation. All the links of the gospel chain are inseparable:

but each rank in its own order, and the concatenation is strictly regular. Inherent grace is the dawning of eternal glory: and eternal glory is the perfection of inherent grace. They are parts of one magnificent and undivided whole. Grace is the earnest of glory; glory is the full-possession of grace. Grace is the first fruits: glory the unbounded harvest. And he that has the former shall as certainly have the latter.

All religions, except that of Christ Jesus, concur to place self-righteousness as the ground or condition of obtaining the divine favour. Paganism, Popery, corrupted Judaism, Mahometism, Arminianism, differ they ever so much in some respects, most cordially agree in representing man as a helper, if not as a principal, in his own salvation. It is the gospel alone, whose proclamation runs by grace [not by grace considered as a sanctifying principle communicated to us, but by grace considered as it is in God; viz. by his own unmerited, unconditioned, sovereign goodness] are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast (p).

It is this that recommends as well as distinguishes the religion of our Lord; which had been no gospel to the lost and to the fallen, but for the unmingled freeness, or absolute gratuitousness, with which all its blessings are bestowed. As Dr. Arrowsmith somewhere remarks, the mediatorial riches of Christ would have been so many dead commodities, "if it were not for needy, undone sinners, who take them off his hands."

I remember a just observation of good Mr. Hervey's: that in the days of our Saviour's residence on earth, "the levee of that prince of peace consisted almost entirely of the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind." Hence it was asked by his enemies, with an air of insult and contempt, have any of the rulers or of the pharisees believed on him? But this people [ὁ οχλος σρος. this mob, this riff-raff, who follow him, and] who know not the law are accursed (q).

Very few rulers, or people of eminent rank and station, few scribes, or men of distinguished parts and erudition, few pharisees, or seemingly rigid moralists, attended the ministrations, and were attached to the person, of Him who came to seek and to save them that are lost. No consideration can be more mortifying to human pride than this infallibly certain truth; that harlots and publicans and sinners, i. e. many of those who were the meanest in rank, and whose antecedent lives had been of the most profligate stamp, were the very people who thirsted for his redemption, and composed his visible retinue. These were made partakers of his great salvation: and not one that trusted in his name, though vile as vileness itself, was ever sent empty away. So true is his own gracious declaration: All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh unto me I will in no wise, nor on any account, cast out. (r)

Consult the first verse of the chapter whence I have read you the text, and you will perceive what kind of persons they chiefly were who frequented the ministry of God manifested in the flesh: Then drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners to hear him. We never go to Christ until his Spirit has beat us off from every other confidence, and driven us out of every other refuge. Under our first serious impressions we usually try a variety of self-righteous expedients for our own relief. We have recourse to moral reformation, good resolutions, vows, long prayers, frequent church-goings, monthly sacraments; accompanied perhaps by a train of abstinences, austerities, and rigorous mortifications. While we do these things with a view to spin from them a justifying righteousness for ourselves, we are as absolute enemies to the gospel of Christ, and as far from the kingdom of God, as the Devil and his angels. We must come, not as pharisees, but as publicans; not as scribes, but simply as sinners; if we would come, so as to be graciously received.

And be it carefully noticed that they who were savingly led to Christ experienced his renewing power, together with his forgiving grace. Though none were rejected for their past immoralities (how numerous, enormous, and aggravated soever), yet the reigning dominion of vice was from that hour cancelled in them that believed. Thus for instance, the extortioner of Jericho was no sooner converted than his rapacity and oppressiveness were exchanged for benevolence, justice, and liberality. The language of his heart, of his lips, and of his subsequent practice was, Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold (s). Look also at the harlot of Magdala. Though a slave to the impulse of no fewer than seven devils, during her unregenerate state; effectual grace no sooner causes her to believe in Jesus for salvation than a sanctifying change ensues. She goes in peace, and sins as a prostitute no more (t).

And the scribes and pharisees murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them. Pharisees always did, and always will murmur at the gospel, and at them that preach it. They murmured at Christ himself: and no wonder if their successors murmur against us. They can no more abstain from carping at the Christian scheme of grace, than some dogs can help barking when they hear the sound of a trumpet. This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them, said the Arminians of Judea: "This Messiah, as he calls himself, is a downright Antinomian. You may know him by the company he keeps. He associates with the vilest of mankind; and doubtless he himself is as bad as they." So reasoned the pharisees concerning Him who did no sin, but who went about doing good. And his own lips have taught us to expect that they, whose predecessors called the master of the house Beelzebub, will not be very candid and complaisant to them of his household (u).

True it is that Christ received sinners and ate with them: that he received them with the most beneficent welcome into the expanded arms of his compassion, and even admitted them to a state of intimate fellowship and friendship. And what he then did he still does; and will go on to do, until the whole fulness of his mystical body is gathered in by grace and perfected in glory. He receives sinners in a threefold respect: (1.) As the donation of his Father who elected them to salvation. (2.) At the hand of the Holy Spirit, in effectual calling. (3.) He receives their souls at the hand of angels in the hour of death.—To which may be added that he will receive them in body and soul united, when he himself shall descend to change the living and to raise the dead.

Christ was not insensible of the calumnies with which the pharisees laboured to stain his character, for extending his mercy to the helpless, the unworthy, and the abandoned. He spake this parable to them: saying, What man of you, having a hundred sheep, if he lose one, doth not leave the ninety-and-nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? Christ is a faithful and watchful shepherd. He will not suffer so much as one of his sheep to be finally lost. If an individual saint wander from the fold, Christ goes after that soul; and never ceases from his labour of love, until that soul is found. If you or I happen to lose any thing on which we set a value, we may find it or we may not; our search may issue in the recovery of the lost object, and it may all prove fruitless and unsuccessful. Herein is a very wide difference between God's seeking and man's seeking. God never seeks in vain. An earthly shepherd may lose many a sheep, and lose them beyond retrieval. But Christ never lost a sheep which he did not seek: and never sought a sheep which he did not find.

And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders rejoicing. He does not suspend the return of the sheep on the sheep's own free-will (which would be very sheepish policy indeed); nor stand expostulating and giving the sheep what Arminianism would call "a gentle pull" by the fleece: but actually lays hold on the wanderer; takes it up in his arms; layeth it upon his shoulders by main strength; nor lets it go until he has actually and finally brought it home. As all who seek his favour, and an interest in his righteousness, are sure to find both one and the other; so all whom he seeks are sure to be found of him.

And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours; saying, Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost. Our Lord himself applies and explains this part of the parable in the words with which I began:

I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety-and-nine just persons who need no repentance.

Those therefore whom in the preceding verse Christ terms his friends and neighbours; and whom he calls upon to rejoice with him on account of every conversion which his Holy Spirit accomplishes below, are (1) the elect angels, and (2) the glorified souls of departed saints.

I firmly believe, upon the warrant of the text, that as often as divine grace converts a single sinner to Christ, the pleasing event is immediately known in heaven; and our great High Priest says in effect to the radiant throng that encircle his throne, Rejoice with me, for another of my lost sheep is found.

Indeed there is nothing in heaven but joy. The peculiar presence of Deity most eminently manifested there, is an endless and ever-increasing source of blessedness, both to the spirits of the just, and to the seraphs that never fell. Where God is possessed; where Christ is seen; where the adorable Trinity pour forth their plenitude of glory unclouded on the delighted, undazzled view; where saints, the children of redemption, are the melodious songsters; and angels, the first fruits of creation, are the enraptured musicians; where the grand employ is praise, and Jehovah himself is the exceeding great reward; surely there the cup of joy must overflow; and only the blest inhabitants themselves can tell how blest the inhabitants are.

Is there then any thing that can heighten the celestial triumph? that can add to the felicity of those who stand in the divine presence, and enhance even their transcendent joy? There is: and we have just heard what it is. It is the regeneration of a fallen soul. It is the renewal of a sinner below. As our Lord expresses it at the 10th verse, There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. No sooner is every fresh conversion made known on high than additional joy is there. The memorable day is, if I may so speak, marked as a festival in the calendar of heaven. Beatified saints exult, angels clap their wings, and the whole united choir raise their voices, and strike their golden harps for joy that a soul is born of God and made free of the Jerusalem which is above.

Such exalted hosannas would not resound, on these occasions, among the inhabitants of the skies, if the doctrine of final perseverance was untrue. Tell me, ye seraphs of light; tell me, ye souls of elect men made perfect in glory, why this exuberance of holy rapture on the real recovery of a single sinner to God? Because ye know assuredly that every true conversion is (1) a certain proof that the person converted is one of your own elect number: and (2) that he shall be infallibly preserved and brought to that very region of blessedness into which ye yourselves are entered. The contrary belief would silence your harps, and chill your praises. If it be uncertain whether the person who is regenerated to-day may ultimately reign with you in heaven, or take up his eternal abode among apostate spirits in hell; your rejoicings are too sanguine, and your praises are premature. You should suspend your songs until he actually arrives among you: and not give thanks for his conversion until he has persevered unto glorification.

But there are no "election-doubters," no perseverance-deniers in the kingdom of heaven. The happy spirits there are as orthodox as the sun is bright. When a sinner repents, they rejoice over him. Knowing that he could not have repented if he had not been elected: and that as surely as he was elected, so surely shall he be glorified.

It is this which occasions the jubilee above. It is this, which raises the harmonious concert high; which gladdens the shining hosts already saved; and puts a new song into their mouths, even accumulated thanksgiving unto God. They rejoice when they perceive the Redeemer's interest advanced, and the empire of the cross extended when the communion of saints is enlarged, and when God's secret purposes of mercy have their open accomplishment in a sinner's visible accession to the kingdom of grace. For they are confident of this very thing, that he who hath begun the good work in that sinner's heart will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ (x): and, consequently, that every man or woman upon earth, who repents after a godly sort, is an heir of the grace of life, and shall be their companions in blessedness to all eternity.

It is observable that our Lord does not say, in general terms, Joy shall be in heaven over sinners that repent: but joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth; i. e. over each penitent in particular. To show how dear the soul of a returning prodigal is to God; and with what eclats of triumphal joy the news of a conversion is received by the angels and the saints in light. For this, they sing their thanks in strains sweet as perfect love can dictate, and high as admiring gratitude can wind them up.

Should it be inquired, "How the spirits of those who have died in the Lord are able to know, and therefore to rejoice at, the penitence of their fellow creatures on earth? I answer, that there is no occasion for our having recourse to, what some popish writers term, The glass of the Trinity; as if glorified saints literally saw all things in God, as in a looking-glass, or reflecting mirror. Such a conceit savours more of childish fancy than of solid reason and scriptural authority. I rather suppose that the departed spirits of believers receive their information of what passes in this lower world from the angels of God; who are watchful observers of sublunary events, and, as they were represented in Jacob's vision, are continually (y) ascending and descending, i. e. passing and repassing from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven; charged with the performance of the divine commands, and acting as the instruments and commissioners of Providence.—Hence they are termed angels, or messengers; which is a name, not of nature, but of office.

These holy and powerful beings are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister unto them [i. e. unto those of mankind] that shall be heirs of salvation (z). Numerous detachments of them are constantly, though invisibly, employed on earth as guardians of the elect, and sometimes as executioners of vengeance on the wicked. They carry up the glad tidings of a sinner's repentance, and communicate the intelligence to their companions above. By this means, probably, joy is in heaven over the sinner that repenteth. Soon as the information circulates through the Church triumphant, the universal hallelujah, which it occasions, is similar to the angelic hymn sung at the Messiah's birth: Glory be to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men!

But "What is that repentance which induces the benevolent celestial choirs thus to rejoice over the sinner who repents?"

The words μετανοεω and μετανοια, as they stand in the text now under consideration, seem to include something more than the word μεταμελεια always imports. (a) μεταμελεια literally and naturally signifies, an anxious and painful apprehension, arising from consciousness of preceding guilt. In this sense, an unregenerate and unreformed person may repent of having acted criminally, when he finds that his crimes are likely to be followed by consequences fatal to his interest and happiness. But the repentance here spoken of, is μετανοια: i. e. a change of mind, or regeneration, truly so called. That new birth and new heart which are the gift of God, and the work of his Spirit. Where these take place, sorrow for sin, hatred of sin, war against sin, and renunciation both of sinful self, and of righteous self, are the blessed and certain consequences. The inward principle of evangelical repentance is regenerating grace, or the habit of holiness, supernaturally infused by the Spirit of God. The actings of evangelical repentance, or the experimental and practical ramifications of it, are those just now described. No man can spiritually repent until he is born of God: and every man who is born of God repents spiritually. When the Lord turns and looks upon us, in effectual calling, we are then turned, and look with mournings unto Him whom our sins have pierced.

Thus the first clause of the text is clear and obvious in its meaning. The saints above, and saints on earth, constitute, in fact, but one Church. St. Paul viewed them in a still closer connection, and styles them both one family (b). Nay, they form one mystic body: part of which (like Jacob's ladder) is on earth, and the other part in heaven. Hence they have but one common interest: and the efficacious drawing of a soul to Christ, by the Spirit and grace of God, is cause of triumph and rejoicing to those above. Jehovah himself is the converter of sinners. Acts of repentance, of humiliation, and of trust in the Mediator's righteousness, are the effects of that conversion. Attending angels are glad spectators and witnesses of the whole: and, on their return to the seat of the blessed, they diffuse the grateful intelligence, and all heaven resounds with acclamations to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb that was slain for us men and for our salvation.

The latter portion of the text seems to carry some embarrassment in it, and to have perplexed most of the commentators who have undertaken to explain it. That joy

(a) I am fully aware, that μεταμελεια and μετανοια are occasionally reciprocated, both in the sacred and in secular writings. I only mean to shew that St. Luke in the text has made use of the most comprehensive and expressive terms, by which that repentance which occasions joy in heaven could be described.

(b) Ephes. iii. 15

shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth is very intelligible, on principles of Scripture and of sound metaphysics. But that this joy should be more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance, involves a two-fold difficulty. For,

1. Are there any persons upon earth so just, so holy, and so good as to need no repentance? Certainly not. Nor did our Lord intend to convey such an idea. Christ, though perfect, was not a perfectionist. He truly said, concerning himself, that he always did those things which were pleasing to the Father (c): but he knew the deprecation of human nature too well to affirm as much concerning any other man. He utterly denied sinless perfection, as predicable of any earthly being, himself alone excepted. The purest action of the holiest believer in the world needs, more or less, to be repented of. The great and good Bishop Beveridge did not go a jot too far in confessing to God, and in leaving that confession on record, "I cannot pray, but I sin: I cannot preach, but I sin: I cannot administer, nor receive the holy sacrament, but I sin. My very repentance needs to be repented of: and the tears I shed want washing in the blood of Christ."

Incarnate truth, who taught us to pray for the forgiveness of our daily trespasses, can never be supposed to intimate that any of us may be so far advanced in grace as to have no daily trespasses to be forgiven. But, if we do not need repentance, we cannot need forgiveness: the necessity, both of forgiveness on God's part, and of repentance on our's, arising from our continued sinfulness in his sight. So that a man must be entirely sinless, and perfectly holy, ere the use and the exercise of repentance can be superseded. But there is not a just man upon earth, who doeth good and sinneth not (d). If, therefore, we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us (e).

(1.) By the ninety and nine just persons, who need no repentance (a certain number for an indefinite one), may be meant the Jews in general; and more especially the Pharisees. These might be styled just, or righteous persons, not because they were so in reality; but because they looked upon themselves to be such, wore the form of godliness, and carried their self-righteousness so far as even to dream that they needed no repentance. The Pharisees were perfectionists to a man. They held that it was possible to yield an unerring obedience to the whole law of God: and it necessarily followed that repentance was not only needless, but absurd and contradictory, in men who had reached the very pinnacle of rectitude, and who had no remaining iniquity to repent of.—Taking the passage in this sense, it ought to be (what it very fairly may) rendered thus: Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth (f); not over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance: who are so extravagantly carried away by the delusions of self-opinion as to forget that they need repentance for every thing they do.—The contrast is beautiful. One repenting sinner stands opposed to ninety-nine legalists; and outweighs them all in the divine estimation. The former occasions joy in heaven. The latter, though so greatly superior in point of number and of exterior attainments, yet occasion no joy at all among the denizens of glory. On the contrary, were the blessed susceptible of grief, they would weep at that proud blindness which induces unrepenting sinners to prefer a cobweb to a coronation-robe, by establishing their righteousness instead of embracing the righteousness of Christ.

(2.) The words will bear yet another interpretation, and may be read as follows: Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, or is newly brought to God, more than over ninety and nine just persons, δτινεις β χρειαν εχουσ μετανοιας, who have no need of regeneration. For though believers need the influence of the Spirit to sanctify them more and more; they do not need the Spirit's influence to regenerate them over again. A soul once born of the Holy Ghost is never unborn from that day forward. The power of indwelling grace exerts and displays itself with increasing strength and brightness: but regeneration, or the infusion of spiritual life, neither needs nor can admit of repetition. It is a divine act, which, having once passed upon the soul, stands good for ever, and is physically incapable of reiteration. All subsequent revivals, whether in a way of holiness, support, or consolation, are but expansions of the original principle, occasioned by the Holy Spirit's repeated breathings on the spark which he primarily inspired, and which nothing can totally extinguish. As many, therefore, as are evangelically just persons, or exalted to a state of justification before God and are moreover born again (g) of that incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth for ever; may be truly said not to need regeneration: as being already the renewed sons of God. But,

(3.) Why may not the passage admit of a still more elevated sense? What forbids us to understand by those just persons who need no repentance, the spirits of the righteous who have dropt their mortal bodies, are associated with angels, and shine in the immediate presence of God and the Lamb? These are completely sanctified, and therefore need no repentance. As every spot of sin is exterminated, so every tear is totally wiped away. They bear unsullied the image of God's holiness; and they experience, without alloy, a plenitude of celestial happiness. Well may repentance cease, where faith itself is absorbed in sight.

II. But why more joy in heaven over a repenting sinner than over a whole multitude of regenerated people, or even the whole army of glorified souls? I apprehend that this is spoken entirely after the manner of men: among whom the first transports of joy for the retrieval of a lost valuable sometimes resemble the swellings of a mighty river which overflows its banks, and impetuously carries all before it; whereas calm and unintermitted possession usually occasions that evenness of placid and settled-satisfaction which rises no higher than to the margin of the channel, and glides in a smooth, regular, complacent stream.

This point is finely illustrated toward the close of the present chapter in that tender and beautiful parable of the prodigal son: whose reformation and return gave rise to a spring-tide of parental and domestic rejoicing. Not because the father and his family had more affection for the reclaimed spend-thrift than for the other son, who had not wandered from home, nor dissipated his wealth: but because the repenting debauchee, who had been spiritually dead, was alive again, and he that had been morally lost, was found.

We may elucidate the turn of phrase now under consideration by another case, which I suppose occurs in the course of almost every believer's own experience. The continued possession of the highest spiritual blessings is not after a while attended with that exuberance of gladness and sweet surprise, which accompanied and distinguished their first access to the soul. When the legal bondage of a convinced sinner is reversed, and he receives beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness (h); when the love of God is, for the first time, clearly and feelingly shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost (i), and his perception of divine favour assures him that he is passed from death unto life; then is he like unto them that dream (k). His lips teem with praise, and his heart expands with joy. He is quite engrossed by the glorious objects which ravish his delighted view, and he only lives, thinks, speaks, and acts for God. Was the fervour of this (l) first love to continue without abatement all the days of his pilgrimage, there would be very little difference between the joys of grace and those of glory. The happiness of saints on earth would almost equal the felicity of angels, and of souls in heaven.

This, therefore, I take to be the meaning of the text: that, though the spirits above reflect, with adoring and incessant gratitude to God, on the innumerable conversions which his powerful grace hath already wrought; yet the continued additions which grace daily makes to the happy number keep their benevolent thanksgivings in perpetual exercise, and they rejoice in a special manner over the sinner that was last converted to Christ. This view of things seems to coincide with that theory which supposes the joy of the blessed to be in continual advance; and to rise by infinite progression to higher and higher degrees of still increasing felicity. A conjecture which gives us the noblest and most enlarged idea which the human mind can well entertain, of the bliss which God has prepared for them that love him!

1. To what has already been observed on the subject, let us add a word or two concerning the nature and effects of that repentance which occasions joy among the angels of God, and is indissolubly connected with the salvation of the sinner himself.

While men continue strangers to that μετανοια, or mental change, of which the text speaks, they heartily love, and eagerly pursue, the imaginary pleasures of sin. The understanding of a natural man is so darkened as to mistake that for happiness which is in fact essential misery. The darkness of his understanding necessarily perverts his will, so that he inevitably chooses evil in preference to good. A perverted will poisons the affections. And corrupt affections, if incurbed by providential restraints, never fail to teem with the baneful fruits of practical immorality and licentiousness.

But no sooner is this very sinner changed by efficacious grace, or endued with repentance unto life (m); than his understanding, clouded before with the darkness of spiritual ignorance and unbelief, becomes light in the Lord (n). He sees that the favour and the resemblance of God constitute the supreme happiness of an immortal soul; that God's favour can flow to sinners through the channel of Christ's redemption only; and that God's resemblance can be re-communicated to the fallen by no other efficiency than the interior operation of the Holy Ghost, causing old things to be done away, and making all things become new (o).

(g) 1 Pet. i. 23. (h) Isa. lxi. 3. (i) Rom. v. 5.

(k) Psa. cxxvi. 1. (l) Rev. ii. 4. (m) Acts xi. 19.

This supernatural illumination of the understanding (which seems to be the initial point of regeneration, or the first effect of converting grace on the mind) conciliates the will to holiness. The soul chooses God for its portion, loves him as its happiness, and ardently aspires to that sanctification which qualifies for heaven.

The affections are now centripetals; or, through the power of divine attraction, tend to God in Christ, and repose in him as the centre and source of love, the Alpha and Omega of rational and refined desire. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire in comparison of thee (p).

A sinner, thus enlightened and thus renewed, cannot but feel sorrow and remorse for all his past and present deviations from the law of God. The depravity of his nature, and the transgressions of his life, fill him with serious, poignant, perpetual humiliation. Being led by grace to the fountain of living waters, he deeply laments his having so long endeavoured to hew out unto himself broken cisterns which can hold no water (q): and wonders how he could be so blinded and so hardened through the deceitfulness of sin (r) as to seek for satisfaction in the ways of death; and madly dream that his happiness would improve in proportion as he strayed from God.

Above all, when he finds that the expiation of his guilt, and his redemption from the damnation of hell, could be effected at no less expense, than by the miraculous incarnation and most bitter death of God's co-equal Son;—oh, how powerfully does this induce the soul to (s) sorrow after a godly sort! what carefulness and concern does it work in the heart! what self indignation! what fear of God! what vehement desire of forgiveness! what zeal for holiness! what revenge and abhorrence of sin! These, these are the properties of genuine repentance. These, these are the evidences of our engrafture into Christ. Joy is in heaven over such repentance as this. God the Father acquiesces with complacency in the soul that is thus brought to his mercy-seat. The glorified Redeemer sees the reward of his mediatorial obedience unto death, and is satisfied.

The Holy Spirit smiles on his own work, hastens to comfort the sinner he has subdued, and goes on to accomplish the sanctification he has begun.

Every sigh which the penitent breathes is treasured up: and every tear he sheds is noted down. His prayers are consecrated, and wafted to the throne by the incense of Immanuel's intercession. And at the destined time he shall ascend on the wings of angels, to his seat in paradise: where kindred spirits who rejoiced at his conversion here will congratulate his happy arrival there.

2. Remember, that evangelical repentance is a very different thing from merely outward reformation. King Herod (t) reformed his conduct in many particulars; but he does not appear to have experienced that regenerating influence alluded to by our Lord in the text. A man may reform without true repentance; though no man can truly repent without moral reformation. Reformation whitewashes the house: regeneration takes the house to pieces, and rebuilds it from the ground. Reformation varnishes the outside of the vessel; regeneration melts the vessel down and casts it into a new mould.

3. Gospel repentance can never agree with self-righteousness. He alone is the Scripture penitent who feels that he has no goodness, not so much as a righteous thread of his own, wherein to stand before the Judge of all. Repentance, like faith, renounces itself, nor dreams of its ever being able to enter into the composition of that wedding garment which entitles the wearer to a seat at the marriage supper of the Lamb. Pharisees roll themselves up in the mantle of their supposed good works, as a spider entrenches itself in a web of its own spinning: but where repentance is wrought, the hail of the law sweeps away the refuge of lies (u), and drives the ejected sinner to the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ. Until you see that you cannot be saved by the moral law, and that you never did, nor ever can perform your duty either to God or your neighbour, in the manner, and with the extent which the law requires; as the Lord liveth, you have not yet experienced what Bible repentance means.

4. If you repent indeed, you will repent practically, by labouring to depart from iniquity, and by ordering your conversation aright. Though we are not saved for our holiness, yet holiness and good works are inseparable attendants on that grace of God which brings salvation. Any repentance which leaves us short of this, is counterfeit and nothing worth.

5. We may, perhaps, indirectly infer, from the passage we have been considering, that angels and saints in glory are acquainted with each other. If not a single conversion obtains on earth, which is not known among the inhabitants of the upper world; and if those dignified spirits express a friendship for every repentant sinner, by rejoicing over him, and by giving thanks to God on his behalf, does it not seem more than probable that social knowledge, intercourse and harmony, constitute no small portion of that felicity which is at God's right hand for ever?

6. Observe, too, that angels are present with us when we know it not. Not only the Deity himself, but also his ministering spirits, are about our bed, and about our path, and spy out all our ways; though our eyes are withheld, that we cannot discern the millions of immaterial beings who throng our atmosphere. There is, therefore, no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves (x). As the eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good, so his angels, likewise, disperse themselves at his command, beholding and noticing whatever is done among men.

7. If repentance and conversion be so amiable in the estimation of these holy, unembodied spectators, what ineffable abhorrence must they conceive when witnesses to the commission of sin! Hence the Jews had a proverb, When an Israelite sins the angels weep. And St. Austin has a similar observation: "Quoties bene agimus, gaudent angeli, et tristantur demones. Quoties à bono deviamus, diabolum lætificamus, & angelos tuos suo gaudio defraudamus." i. e. As often as we do well, angels exult and Satan grieves; as often as we commit evil, we make Satan glad, and defraud the angels of their joy. Striking reflection! strongly calculated to impress us with detestation of vice, and incite us to the pursuit of virtue! Greatly superior to that topic, beautiful as it was, whence the heathen poet derived an argument against the prevailing immoralities of Rome:

*Sed luna videt, sed sidera testes

8. Observe and imitate the amiable benevolence which glows in angelic bosoms. The peers of heaven are certain that their own salvation is secure. They know that they were loved and elected of God from all eternity; and that, through the efficacy of his confirming grace, they shall never be suffered to deviate from his image, nor to lapse into condemnation. Was their continuance in happiness at all dependent on the conversion of man, self-interest would sufficiently account for those strains of sympathetic joy with which they celebrate the repentance, or initial salvation, of Adam's revolted sons. But, if the whole human race were to perish, the dignity of the unfallen angels would still remain unimpaired, their safety unshaken, and their glory unobscured. It is love, therefore, ardent and refined as their own exalted natures; it is benignity, pure as æther, and disinterested as the shining of the sun, which induce those beneficent intelligences to adopt our concerns, and consider human happiness as an addition to their own.

Yet, what is the benevolence of angels themselves, when compared with the philanthropy manifested by Jesus Christ! To rejoice at the salvation of sinners, comes easily within the compass of created friendship. But to merit that salvation, by such a series of sufferings as no mere creature could have undergone, nor will ever be able fully to comprehend and acknowledge, was the matchless effect of infinite compassion, and of kindness properly divine.

Impressed, softened, and assimilated by the force of these examples, may our bosoms kindle with the fire of celestial affection, and the arms of our charity be expanded wide, like the arms of Jesus when he hung upon the cross! Let every man seek another's welfare (y); rejoicing with them that rejoice, and weeping with them that weep (z). Who of us is most angelic? Or (which is a still more important question), who among us has drunk deepest into the Spirit of Christ? He that is most mild, most liberal, most benevolent, most tender-hearted, most forgiving, most glad of another's felicity, most actively subservient to the temporal and spiritual wants of men. He that is readiest to every good word and work, who not only improves, but seeks, all opportunities of promoting the glory of God, the interest of religion, and the happiness of his neighbour.

9. As angels are invisibly dispersed over the planet we inhabit, and expatiate in the atmosphere which surrounds us, so I cannot doubt that they bear an especial part in the solemnities of our public worship, and note with peculiar attention whatever passes in the house of God

We are expressly assured, by an unerring pen, that the mysteries of man's redemption and restoration are things which the angels desire to look into (a). Though they themselves, having never fallen from their primitive rectitude, do not stand in need of an atoning sacrifice, and a righteousness imputed; yet they wish to be more and more conversant with, in order that they may more and more admire, the covenant of grace, as carried into a complete execution by the correspondent work and sufferings of Christ.

There is a remarkable passage which gives us to understand (b), that the principalities and powers in heavenly places know, by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God; or, that the various ranks of angelic beings rise gradually into clearer and more enlarged acquaintance with the divinely-concerted plan of human salvation: partly by observing the tenor of God's gracious dealings with the souls he regenerates; and partly by attending to those sublime truths which Christ's faithful ministers dispense when they preach his gospel in the congregation of the saints. I question whether there be an individual minister upon earth who declares the whole counsel of God with power, and with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven (c), but listening angels are a part of his auditory, and sometimes reap instruction from the lips of a mortal man. Even the private conversations of God's people, when they speak together concerning what he has done for their souls (d), and build up each other on their most holy faith (e), as companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ (f); at such seasons of religious fellowship, do not hovering angels join the company? and may they not derive real improvement, as well as matter of rejoicing, from the spiritual experiences of saints?

10. But there are multitudes of persons (and perhaps more than a few now under this very roof), who never yet occasioned joy in heaven among the angels of God; but, by the unbelief and hardness of their impenitent hearts, have gratified the angels of the bottomless pit, times and ways without number. Yet, even you shall be received, if you come as sinners to the sinners' Friend. May God's spirit bend the gospel bow, and wing an arrow to your hearts! Which of you is willing to make joy in heaven this morning? Over what repenting soul shall the angels of God triumph? For whom shall Gabriel sing, and Raphael strike his harp? All heaven shall exult on your account, if you close with Christ as your wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

11. I would hope that some penitents are here; some, in whom that gracious word has had its accomplishment. They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them: I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters, in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble; for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born (g). Come, then, to the Son of God, for the merit that saves. Look to the Spirit of grace for the influence that sanctifies. The lower you fall at the feet of Christ crucified, the louder praises are angels singing for you above. Be glad, therefore, and of good courage. God will never be exceeded by angels in loving kindness and in tender mercies: He will be very gracious to thee at the voice of thy cry: when he shall hear it, he will answer thee (h).

12. Are any backsliders hearing me to-day? any who, having formerly known the good ways of God, are now become careless and forgetful of the things belonging to their peace? May this be the set time for your revival and return! God, your Redeemer, says, Awake, thou that sleepest; and arise from the dead, i. e. come out from among your evil companions, renounce your sinful connections, revert to the people and to the ordinances of God, and Christ shall give thee light (i): He will restore to thee the comforts of his Spirit, and the joy of his salvation, and thou shalt again sing in the ways of the Lord, that great is the glory of the Lord (k). Stay, O stay no longer from thy happiness! He who received thee once will receive thee anew, and angels shall rejoice over thee afresh, if the cry of thy heart be this, I will go and return to my first husband, for then it was better with me than now (l).

13. As joy is in heaven on account of one sinner that is born again by spiritual regeneration, into the kingdom of grace below, great must be the joy when a regenerated soul, loosed from the pains and dishonours of its earthly prison, is born, at death, into the kingdom of glory above. Every saint at his departure out of the body is carried off, and carried up, by angels, into Abraham's bosom (m): admitted to the sight of Christ, and introduced to the fellowship and familiarity of spirits that never fell, and of spirits completely restored from their fall. Who can describe the joy which obtains in heaven on such felicitating occasions as these! The glorified soul himself rejoices that the imaginary bitterness of death is past, and that he is safely arrived at the house not made with hands. Saints, who were antecedently landed on the shores of immortality, welcome their blood-bought brother to his throne. Angels who had been spectators of his conversion upon earth, and who lately acted as vehicles to convey him to glory, congratulate his admission into the mansions of bliss.

With profoundest reverence be it added, that all the three persons in the Godhead rejoice, when the infallible designs of eternal love are glorified in the actual and ultimate salvation of a chosen sinner. As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so will the Lord thy God rejoice over thee. Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hands of the Lord; and a royal diadem in the hands of thy God. (n). The Lord hath taken away thy judgments, he hath cast out thy enemy: the king of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee; thou shalt not see evil any more.—The Lord thy God, in the midst of thee, is mighty. He will save, he will rejoice over thee with joy; he will rest in his love. He will joy over thee with singing (o).

14. Still higher will be the joy in heaven when the whole assembly of the elect, without one absentee, shall meet, and reign, and shine, and sing together, and

High in salvation and the times of bliss.”*

But I must let the curtain drop. Who can paint what eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath entered into the heart of man to conceive? May free grace give us at last to know by triumphant experience what this blessedness means!

15. In order to that most desirable end, let those of us who have not yet repented, beg of God to grant us, and to work in us, the exceeding great and precious grace of effectual calling. Let those in whom repentance is wrought beseech the Holy Ghost to deepen it day by day; and enable us in every part of our lives and conversations to bring forth fruits suitable to repentance (p). In this case, angels will rejoice over us whilst we live, and when we die. Happy prelude to our endless rejoicing with them in the heaven of heavens!

Thither, O Saviour of sinners, may thy blood and righteousness bring us. Thither may thy Holy Spirit guide us, and thy intercession keep us. Even unto Mount Sion, and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem and the innumerable company of angels: to the general assembly and church of the first-born, who were written in heaven; and to God the judge of all; and to the souls of just men made perfect; and to thyself, the Mediator of the new covenant (q). In the hour of death smile and shine upon us. Revive us with an application of those comfortable words, The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be thy everlasting light, and thy God thy glory (r). Yea, seal us to that place prepared for us before the foundations of the world; and concerning which thou hast told us (s), The glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

THE EXISTENCE AND CREED OF DEVILS CONSIDERED,

WITH A

WORD CONCERNING APPARITIONS.

*A discourse preached in the parish church of St. Olive, Jewry, on Sunday Afternoon,
October 29, 1775.*

And the Lord said unto Satan, whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said; I from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.—Job 1. 7.

My name is Legion: for we are many.—Mark 7. 9.

SERMON IX.

Thou believest that there is one God. Thou doest well. The devils also believe, and tremble.

ONE grand motive which induced St. James to write this epistle was to stife and repress a most dangerous error which, even in the apostolic times, began to gain ground among too many reputed followers of Christ.

This error was, that a mere naked assent to the truths of Christianity, considered as a doctrinal system, without having the heart affected, and without having the life sanctified, would be sufficient evidence of their salvation, and prove them children of God.

Against this most dangerous delusion the blessed apostle James drew his pen. And the principal drift of this epistle is, not to counteract St. Paul (for all the divine writers speak one uniform, harmonious language): but merely to show the delusion which the Gnostics, who were the Antinomians of that age, were under; and to prove that something more weighty, and more substantial than mere head knowledge, is requisite to stamp us heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ.

Hence we find the apostle, at the 14th verse, asking, What does it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and hath not works? Can faith save him? Observe with what caution St. James expresses himself. He does not say, “what will it profit a man to have faith without works?” for he knew that to be impossible. But the words are, What will it profit a man to say that he hath faith, without works? There is a vast difference between believing, and saying we believe. The man who professes himself a believer must offer something more solid than his own ipse dixit, than a mere verbal profession, if he wishes to be credited by those to whom that profession is made. Was I to affirm that I am possessed of a neat hundred thousand per annum, not one of you would believe me. And why? because I have nothing to show for it. I have no writings to produce as my authentic vouchers. By the same rule, when a man comes to you or me, and says, I have faith; it is very natural for us to ask, Where are our works? If thou hast faith, thou hast it to thyself before God. Faith is a hidden principle, until rendered visible by a holy life and conversation. What does it profit a man barely to say that he has faith? It profits a man much to have faith; for if he has faith, he will also have a life correspondent with the holiness of that leading grace. Indeed a man can never be holy till he has faith. To them, says Christ, who are sanctified by faith that is in me.—There is no such thing as real holiness without faith; and there is no such thing as true faith without holiness. These two always go together; and none but a visionary self-deceiver, or an intentional hypocrite, would ever wish to put them asunder. Can faith, that is, can a bare profession of faith save him, or prove him to be in a saved state? Far from it. Profession will only sink us deeper into condemnation at last, unless God give us to feel and to possess those graces to which our lips lay claim. Here a Pharisee may step in, and ask, But will not works save us? Indeed they will not. Will not faith and works together save us? No. Faith is the evidence, not the cause, of salvation: just as works are the evidences, not the cause, of faith.

I observed, at another end of the town this morning, and I will repeat the observation here: That the religion of Jesus Christ stands eminently distinguished, and essentially differentiated, from any other religion that was ever proposed to human reception, by this remarkable peculiarity: that, look abroad in the world, and you will find that every religion, except one, puts you upon doing something, in order to recommend yourself to God.

A Mahometan expects to be saved by his works. A Socinian thinks to go to heaven by his works. A Papist looks to be justified by his works. A Freewiller hopes for salvation by his works, compliances, endeavours, and perseverance. A Pagan, if he believes that there is a future state, expects to be happy hereafter, by virtue of the supposed good he does, and of the evil he leaves undone. A mystic has the same hope, and stands on the same sad foundation. It is only the religion of Christ, which runs counter to all the rest, by affirming that we are saved, and called with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to the Father's own purpose and grace, which was [not sold out to us on certain conditions, to be fulfilled by ourselves, but was] given us in Christ, before the world began (t). It was long ago remarked by a good man, that "It is the business of all false religions to patch up a righteousness, in which the sinner is to stand before God." But it is the business of the glorious gospel to bring near to us, by the hand of the Holy Spirit, a righteousness ready wrought; a robe of perfection ready made; wherein God's people, to all the purposes of justification and happiness, stand perfect and without fault before his throne.

You may object, "if that is the case, if we are saved and justified entirely by a righteousness imputed, to what purpose are those good works which the Bible every where inculcates, and which the chapter whence the text has been read, so particularly enforces the practice of?" I answer, that as robes and a coronet do not constitute a peer, but are ensigns and appendages of his peerage (for the will of the sovereign is the grand efficient cause which elevates a commoner to noble rank); and as the very patent of creation is only an authentic manifesto, not causal, but declarative of the king's pleasure to make his subject a nobleman: just so, good works do not make us alive to God, nor justify us before him; nor exalt us to the dignity and felicity of celestial peerage: they are but the robes, the coronet, and the manifesto, shining in our lives and conversations; and making evident to all around us that we are, in deed, and in truth, chosen to salvation, justified through Christ, and renewed by the Holy Ghost.

I need not apprise you that the generality of those who are dead to God, either think, or pretend to think, that we who preach, and you who believe, absolute salvation by the finished atonement and the finished obedience of Jesus Christ, rested on by faith alone; are "opening the flood-gates to licentiousness, and annihilating the necessity of good works."

I would wish you to notice the inconsistency of those objections with which worldly people assail the gospel of the grace of God (u). One while, they tell us that we are righteous overmuch, and are more godly than we need to be. At another time we are for no good works at all, but make void the law through faith. Now, these two cavils effectually, and primâ facie, demolish each other, like two equal contrary forces in natural philosophy. Would it not be very absurd if I was to say of a lady that she is literally as sraight as an arrow, and as crooked as a rainbow?

They who are acquainted with themselves, with the love of Christ, and with the holiness of the moral law, know and feel, that so far from doing too much, they can never do enough for God. This knowledge and persuasion effectually cut up the two incoherent objections above mentioned. On one hand, we cannot, even in speculation, be negligent of good works: since we consider, and are zealous for them as the grand visible indications of our appointment to eternal glory.—On the other, a sense of those immense deficiencies which attend our best obedience operates as a most powerful inducement to the unintermitted performance of as much good as we can. Not that we are hereby justified. For as I have often asked (and I shall continue to reiterate the question as long as I can speak for God), where is the man that ever fulfilled the law of God? Let us only bring ourselves to the test of the second table, whose precepts are all summed up in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Since the fall, no man ever did this but Jesus Christ.

(t) 2 Tim. i. 19.

(u) Acts x. 21.

As I was going through Holborn the other day, I saw a house on fire. The mob were assembled, and the engines were playing. I felt, with great tenderness, for the immediate sufferers. Yet it instantly occurred to me, that I was not so deeply concerned as when I lately saw my own house in a similar danger. What was the reason? Because I do not love my neighbour as myself. And was there nothing else to exclude me from justification by my own righteousness, I should know, from this circumstance alone, that it is utterly impossible for me to be accepted of God, and entitled to heaven, through my defective conformity to the moral law.

In the prosecution of his argument, St. James puts a very obvious case: a case which, I am afraid, happens almost every day. If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace! be ye warmed and filled! notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body: what does it profit? Intimating that as a string of smooth canting words, unaccompanied by substantial relief, conveys no service to a distressed petitioner, and is no decisive proof of benevolence in the speaker; so an empty, unactive profession of faith, without a heart and life devoted to God, and to the good of mankind, will stand us in no stead at all. The apostle himself makes the application: even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. Are we to infer from this that works cause us to live in the sight of God? No. It would sound very odd in your ears, and with very good reason, if I was to affirm that I am therefore alive because I have the honour of preaching before you this afternoon: no. My preaching does not make me alive. It only shews that I do live. Since if I did not live, I could neither move, nor speak, nor act. In like manner, holy works do not endue us with life.—They only prove us to be spiritually alive, if the Spirit of God has enabled us, from right principles, and to right ends, thus to bring forth fruit to his honour and praise.

The goodness of the fruit does not make, but discover and declare, the goodness of the tree: since if this were not good, it could not produce good fruit. The purity of a stream does not make the fountain pure, but proves it to be so. All that we can possibly say and do for God, contribute not one jot or tittle to the acquisition either of spiritual or of eternal life, but only make known that he has infused into our souls the breath of supernatural regenerating grace, by the powerful ministration of the Holy Ghost.

A man may say, adds the apostle, thou hast faith and I have works. Show me thy faith without thy works: as much as to say, I defy thee to do it: faith can only be shown by the good works which it produces. Therefore, I will show thee (and every true believer says the same), I will show thee my faith by my works: I will adduce these, to demonstrate the reality of that.

Thou believest that there is one God. Thou doest well: this is very right, so far as it goes: but remember that the devils also believe this, together with a great deal more, and tremble. The faith of a deist (which is all ultimately resolvable into this solitary article, I believe that there is one God) is at best but a small part of the devil's creed; and, if it proceed no farther, will leave the soul infinitely short of everlasting salvation.

In the text there are three objects of enquiry:

I. Who are the devils here mentioned?

II. What it is that they believe, and how far their faith goes?

III. In what respects their faith differs from the faith of God's elect, or from that faith which the Holy Spirit breathes into every converted heart?

I. By the devils here referred to, we are doubtless to understand that whole body of apostate spirits whose names were not in the book of life, and who were therefore permitted to fall from that state of holiness, dignity, and happiness, in which they were originally made.

Our text styles them devils, δαιμονια. probably from their depth of skill, and from the exquisite subtlety of their knowledge. At what precise point of time the angels and these among the rest, were created; and whether their creation was successive, or simultaneous, cannot perhaps, be exactly ascertained from Scripture: which only informs us at large that within the first six days the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the hosts of them. St. Austin thinks that the angels were called into being, when God said, Let there be light. And it seems extremely certain, from a passage in the book of Job, that the angels were created before our part of the universe, or that terraqueous globe which we inhabit, was completely formed into its present state. For we read that no sooner was this portion of our own solar system moulded into its present scheme, than angels admired the fabric, and blessed the Builder. Whereupon are the foundations of [the earth] fastened? or who laid the corner stone thereof? When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy (z). Who were those morning stars? Who were those sons of God? The angels of light; styled morning stars, from their purity, their dignity, their excellency and glory; the sons of God, because they were of God's own immediate creation.

It is likewise plain that the fall of a vast number of these unembodied spirits was antecedent to the fall at least, if not to the creation of man. For we read in the only authentic account of the origin of evil anywhere extant, that one of these apostate spirits was the being who, in a borrowed form seduced the mother of the human race.

Should it be asked, "How came any part of those angels, who were created in such a state of natural and moral excellence, to make shipwreck of their holiness, of their majesty and of their joy?" I answer, that the origin of evil, whether among angels (with whom evil seems, strictly, to have originated), or among men, is the most difficult question, perhaps, and the most mysterious part of the divine conduct that ever yet presented itself to human investigation. Clouds and darkness are the seat of its residence; though wisdom, goodness, and justice, were certainly (in a manner unknown to us) the motives to its permission.

It becomes us probably, on such an occasion as this, to repress the sallies of imagination, and to clip the wings of idle curiosity. It may be that we cannot answer the question in better words than in those of our Lord, Even so, Father! for so it seemeth good in thy sight. We may perhaps venture to surmise that, according to our present views and apprehensions of things, the divine perfections could not have been manifested in equal glory and to equal advantage, if nothing but absolute and uniform good had universally and immutably prevailed. I was greatly pleased some days ago with the remark of a pious and learned friend, who, in the course of our free conversation on this subject, observed, that "Had evil never been permitted, how could the justice of God have been glorified in punishing it? How could the wisdom of God have been displayed in over-ruling it? How could the goodness of God have been manifested in pardoning and forgiving it? And how could the power of God have been exerted in subduing it?" Here, probably, is our ne plus ultra on this subject, until we ripen into that fulness of knowledge which awaits us at God's right-hand. Until our dis-imprisoned spirits rise into a superior state, it becomes us to confess our ignorance and incompetency, and to address the uncreated Cause of all things, in those words of (I think) good bishop Hooper, a few moments before his martyrdom, "Lord, I am darkness, but thou art light!"

Should it be enquired, What particular crime it was which drew on the fallen angels that indignation and wrath, that tribulation and anguish, which we read will be their portion? we are not perhaps altogether in the dark as to that. For where St. Paul observes, that (a) a bishop should not be a novice, [νεοφυτος, newly converted, or lately implanted into Christ], but a person of gravity, and wisdom, and long experience in the ways of God; the reason assigned is, lest a raw, unfledged bishop, being lifted up with pride, should fall into the condemnation of the devil. Whence it seems, that pride and self-admiration were the immediate sins which rendered Satan and his angels obnoxious to the vengeance of the Almighty.

St. Jude likewise, in the 6th verse of his Epistle, gives us some insight into the nature of the sin committed by those degenerate spirits. The angels, says he, who kept not their first estate (την ε' αυτων αρχην, their own proper and original principality), but left their own habitation; who were not satisfied with that rank in the scale of being, and with that degree of knowledge, dignity, and bliss, assigned them by creating Wisdom, but left their own station and deserted the post in which their Maker placed them; he has reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, to the judgment of the great day. Whence we may soberly conclude that the original sin of the apostate angels was a compound of pride on one hand, and of murmuring on the other.

Discontent is the daughter of pride. Every discontented heart is a proud heart. Instead of being angry with Providence for not making us greater than we are; the meanest person of us all, if he rightly knew himself and God, would fall low at his footstool and adore him for condescending to bestow any thought upon us, or to take any care of us whatever. As I once heard a valuable person remark, "God is often better to us than our fears; and always better to us than we deserve."—We should be perfectly at ease, under every possible combination of circumstances, if we could but give credit to infinite Wisdom, for doing all things well (b).

Some there are in the world who sagely laugh at the very mention of devils. These illuminated rationalists cannot bring themselves to believe that there are any such beings. Let me therefore just drop a cursory hint as to the scriptural evidences, and the philosophic reasonableness, of the article now in question.

(1.) There is nothing unscriptural in that doctrine which asserts the real and literal existence of degraded and malevolent unembodied spirits, who retain, amidst all the losses and horrors inseparable from their fallen state, a very extensive portion of knowledge, subtlety and power. The Bible is so far from denying this that, from the first to the last of the inspired books, it gives us a large account both of these spirits themselves and of their various operations. Yea, the Bible is the only source whence any thing certain can be gathered concerning their existence, their history, and their activity.

(2.) There is nothing unphilosophical in the scripture account of these nefarious agents. The whole universe consists of matter and spirit. The positive existence of matter (though it be incapable of absolute demonstration, strictly so called, yet) will not admit of a moment's reasonable doubt: and with regard to spirit, we must commence Atheists at once ere we can deny the real existence of that. God the Father is an unembodied spirit. God the Son, prior to his incarnation, was an unembodied spirit. God the Holy Ghost is an unembodied spirit. Angels are unembodied spirits. The glorified souls of the departed elect are disembodied spirits.

Moreover, by the same rule that there are good unembodied spirits, why may there not be evil unembodied spirits? Where is the absurdity of this belief? (I now consider it merely in a rational point of view). If it be Atheism to deny the existence of good unembodied spirits; then is it not totally unreasonable to deny the existence of bad unembodied spirits?

We know that there are good embodied spirits and bad embodied spirits upon earth, viz. good men and women, and bad men and women. Now, what is a man, or a woman? an immaterial ray, if I may so speak, united to a machine of dust; a deathless spirit, implunged in a mass of dying matter. And why may not that spirit exist when the matter is dropped? That matter which is so far from ennobling, that at the best of times it hangs as a dead weight upon the incarnated angel within!

I will go still further, and declare it as my steadfast and mature belief, not only that there are unembodied spirits, but also that, upon some special occasions, unembodied spirits and disembodied spirits have been permitted, and may again, to render themselves visible and audible.

There is nothing absurd in the metaphysical theory of apparitions. I do not suppose that one story in a hundred of this kind is true. But I am speaking as to the naked possibility of such phenomena. And this I am satisfied of, that if a spirit (like mine or your's for instance), even while shut up in a prison of flesh, can render itself and its operations perceptible to other spirits through the medium of the senses; and if the bodily powers, quick and acute as they are in some men, be at best but very incommensurable engines of mental action, and (on the sum total) rather clog and impede and embarrass both the faculties and the exertions of the soul, which yet can do such great things, even while in connection with so feeble and depressing a vehicle as now hangs about us; where is the unreasonableness of believing (yea, how great is the unreasonableness of not believing) that a soul, disimprisoned and disentangled from this burden of the flesh, is (so far from losing the powers it had) abundantly more at liberty to make itself perceived than when it was connected into one compositum with a material habitation?

As I have ventured, with that intentional humility which becomes me, to set before you my judgment concerning the doctrine of apparitions; permit me a moment longer to digress from the immediate subjects of our text, while I remind you of two very remarkable Scripture examples quite in point to the case in hand.

(1.) Eliphaz the Temanite gave the following relation of a spectre which he himself both saw and heard (c). In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. Then a spirit passed before my face. The hair of my flesh stood up. It stood still, but I could not (distinctly and perfectly) discern the form thereof: (I can only say in general terms, that) an image was before mine eyes. There was silence (deep and solemn, all around, while the spirit spake); and I heard a voice, saying, Shall mortal man be more just than God? shall a man be more pure than his Maker? Or, as others render it, Shall mortal man be just before God? shall man be pure in the presence of his Maker? No: nothing can constitute us just, in his eyes, but the imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness. Nor can any thing restore us, inchoatively on earth, and completely in heaven, to the purity of God's image, but the omnipotent agency of God's sanctifying spirit.

(2.) Carry back your views to our Lord's transfiguration on Mount Tabor (d), and you will read of not one only, but two persons, who descended for a while from heaven to earth, appearing visibly to, and conversing audibly with, the Son of God and three of his disciples.—As Jesus prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment became white and glittering. And behold there talked with him two men, who were Moses and Elijah: who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem.

From such holy, from such happy, from such glorified beings as Moses and Elias; I revert, for the present, to those malignant spirits of whom our text speaks; to the devils who believe and tremble. Spirits of a very different cast from those above! Spirits who are bound down, under the chains of Divine providence, and now imprisoned at large, in the atmosphere that surrounds our globe, till the great audit comes, when they shall be turned into hell, together with all who forget God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

II. I now proceed to the second enquiry: viz. What it is that these devils believe? and how far their faith goes?

To which I answer, in general, that the devils are incomparably more orthodox than nineteen in twenty of our modern divines. Do you think there is such a being as an Arian devil? or a Socinian devil? or a Sabellian? Is there an Anti-Trinitarian among the devils? or an Arminian, or a Pelagian? No. They endeavour to seduce men into these heresies: but they are too well informed to be speculatively heterodox themselves.

They believe the existence of God, and that God is one. So the text may be rendered: Thou believest, ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς εἷς ἐστίν, that God is one in nature and essence: the devils believe as much; and that in the unity of this Godhead there is a co-existence of three distinct, eternal, consubstantial, and equal persons.

Satan and his angels believe also, and tremble in believing, that the second of the Divine persons assumed the nature of man; and by the perfection of his obedience and atonement, secured the justification and completed the redemption of every elect sinner.

They know, too, that the covenant-office and business of the Holy Ghost is to quicken, to convert, and bring to eternal life, all those who are elected by God the Father, and sprinkled with the blood of Jesus Christ.

They know that the Bible is the unerring word of God: that every syllable of it is true: and that a time shall come when they themselves shall be arraigned at the Messiah's bar, and receive sentence for all the evil they have done, and for the evil which they have prevailed on men to do. They believe this, and tremble: φρισησι, they are all in horror, commotion and confusion. The term is borrowed from that violent, convulsive fermentation, which agitates the ocean when it is wrought and lashed into all the turbulence and rage of total tempest. Thus do these once dignified, but now degraded spirits, believe with all the certainty of demonstration, and tremble with all the horrible magnificence of angelic fury and despair. They wait, with anxious dread, the enunciation of that sentence which they know they must receive from the lips of that incarnate God whose crucifixion was brought about through their instigation. They asked him, in the days of his flesh, Art thou come to torment us before the time (e)? And they still tremble at the sure expectation of what they are to suffer, when they have filled up the measure of their iniquities, and the destined season of their torment is come.

What was observed a few minutes ago concerning the orthodoxy of devils, holds, I doubt not, equally true of every human soul now in hell. When the departed spirits of unregenerate men do (figuratively speaking) open their eyes in torments; they, at the same time, open their eyes on the truths of God. There is not an Arian, a Socinian, a Sabellian, a Pelagian, or an Arminian, weltering in that lake of fire. As there are no heretics in heaven, so there are none in hell. It is only on earth that men have the dreadful prerogative of out-sinning the very devils themselves.

Do not however mistake me, as though I meant to pass sentence of condemnation on any of my fellow-creatures. Whether the souls of such men as Arius, Socinus, and Arminius; who certainly trampled the gospel system under their feet, and were the artful and indefatigable instruments of disseminating the most pernicious errors; I say, whether the departed souls of such heresiarchs and heretics as these are saved or lost (which is among the secret things that belong to God); I will venture to declare that Arius is not an Arian now. Sabellius is not now a Sabellian. The two Socinuses are not now Socinians. Pelagius is no longer a Pelagian, nor Manes a Manichean. Arminius is not an Arminian, nor does Roëllus any longer dispute the eternal generation of the Son of God.

III. Let us consider in what respects does the faith of levil, differ from the evan- gical faith of the saints, or from that faith which is of the (f) operation of God?

(d) Luke ix. 29—31

Much every way: but chiefly in these.—

(1.) The faith of the devils is only a mere assent of the understanding, unaccompanied by any cordial consent of the will and affections, to the truth: a faith without regard to Christ, or any concern for the glory of God. They discern the traces of infinite wisdom shining in the gospel plan; but they feel nothing of Christ's suitableness and loveliness. They speculatively see, but it is only to hate and blaspheme (and, if it were possible to counteract) the covenant-designs of the Trinity respecting the salvation of sinners.

Sorry I am to observe that we have some professors among ourselves who are for shutting out all feelings of grace for Christian experience. I dare do no such thing. On the contrary, I am persuaded that if a cold, dry assent to the written word be that faith which is connected with salvation, all the devils in hell are and must be children of God. But I cannot bring myself to have so good an opinion of Satan and his legions. Nor, consequently, can I suppose that faith to be saving which has nothing to do with spiritual feelings.

If once the feeling, or inward perception, of God's Spirit, as a (g) convincer of sin, and of righteousness, and of sanctification, were to be excluded from faith, there would presently be an end of all vital religion, and the power of godliness would take its flight from that day forward. What is conviction of sin? It is no conviction to me, unless I feel myself convinced of my sinfulness and inability. What is conviction of Christ's righteousness? No conviction at all to me, unless I feel the necessity and value of that righteousness. What are the comforts of the Holy Spirit? No comforts at all to me, except I feel them. Unfelt consolation is a contradiction in terms.

Hence our (h) Church teaches us to pray, that by the light of the same Holy Spirit who taught and illumined the disciples in the day of Pentecost, we, too, may have a right judgment in all things pertaining to God; and be enabled evermore to rejoice in his holy comfort. But how can we rejoice in the comfort of the Holy Ghost unless we feel and perceive his visitations? Where is the enthusiasm of believing that the blessed Spirit of God can make my soul feel, no less vividly, than the impressions of outward objects can make my soul perceive, through the organs of sensation? Putting Scripture quite out of the question, I am bold to assert that no churchman can reprobate religious feelings without reprobating the Church at the same time. For in the 17th Article upon election, or predestination unto life, the Church roundly affirms, that the godly consideration of our election and predestination in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and to such as feel in themselves the workings of the Spirit of Christ. May we feel these workings more and more, mortifying the deeds of the flesh, and drawing up our minds to high and heavenly things!

(2.) The faith of the devils is faith without repentance. Though they saw something of the glory of God before they fell; yet they do not repent of having fallen. My meaning is, they do not repent of having offended God; though the fear of punishment, resulting from self-love, may make them wish they had not sinned.

(3.) Their's is a faith without love. Their language to the Almighty is, Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. Whereas the cry of those who are endued with the faith of God's elect (i) is, Like as the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so longeth my soul after thee, O God (k).

(4.) The diabolic faith is an Antinomian faith: a faith without holiness, a faith without good works. Whereas the faith of God's people is a faith inseparably connected with holiness, and infallibly productive of practical obedience. Whoever has St. Paul's faith, will and must have St. James's works.

(5.) The faith of devils is a faith without desire. But that faith which the Holy Ghost works in the hearts of his people, causes them earnestly to desire the favour, the presence, and the image of God in Christ. Nothing will satisfy a renewed soul but communion with God, and conformity to him.

(6.) The faith of devils is a faith without reliance. Though they know the mercy of God to be immense, and though they see the merits of Jesus Christ to be all-sufficient; yet they have not one grain of reliance, nor wish they to rely either upon the one or upon the other. Whereas they who (l) believe through grace are enabled, in some degree, to trust the goodness, the covenant, and the promise of God: to trust the blood, and obedience, and mediation of Christ; to trust the grace, the power, and faithfulness of the Holy Ghost. They trust a little, and wish they could trust more. They build a little, and wish they could build higher and deeper, on the merits of Christ. They not only give their assent to the history of his obedience and sufferings; but rely upon them, and take shelter under them, as the sole procuring cause of pardon and salvation.

(l) Acts xviii. 27.

(h) Collect for Whitsunday.

(i) Titus i. 1.

(7.) While the devils believe against their wills, and wish they were not forced to believe so much; the saints believe with their hearts unto justification, and are ever crying Lord, increase our faith!

(8.) The faith of the infernal spirits does not look to the influences of the Holy Ghost. Whereas that faith which the Holy Ghost inspires, as it comes from him, so it leads to him; and causes the soul to see, and to feel, and to rejoice, that all its strength, all its holiness, and all its happiness, are treasured up in the faithful hands of that holy, blessed, and adorable Comforter.

To conclude. What learn we from the whole subject?

1. That those objections which are commonly brought against the doctrines of grace, and against the good old Church of England doctrine of predestination in particular; as if those doctrines carried an implication of arbitrariness and cruelty and injustice in God; all fall to the ground, when we consider how vast a body of apostate spirits, much our superiors in natural excellency, and of an incomparably higher order than ourselves, were permitted to fall still lower than we, and are all absolutely passed by, or reprobated, without the election of so much as one of them to eternal blessedness. Thus God spared not the angels that sinned. No sooner did they transgress than their punishment commenced; and Satan, with his rebellious hosts, fell like lightning from heaven (m). Now, if God could pass by millions and millions of angels, sparing not one of the whole number; who dares take divine sovereignty by the throat, and say, concerning its dealings with men, "What doest thou?" Has not the potter power over the clay, to make, of the same lump, one vessel unto honour, and another to dishonour (n)? certainly he has I hope, and believe, that thousands of those who at present are not enlightened into the Bible and Church of England doctrine of predestination; nay, who look upon it as if it was a Jezebel, fit only to be thrown out of window and trampled under foot; I hope the time will come when even these shall experience the blessings with which God's electing love is fraught.

2. Bless the Trinity for distinguishing grace: astonishing it is, that he who is God by nature, as being the everlasting Son of the Father, should, by consent of the two other divine persons, vouchsafe to take our nature upon him, when he passed by the non-elect angels and left their nature alone. Well might those of the elect, unfallen angels, who announced the Messiah's birth, sing Glory to God in the highest, and on the earth peace, good-will towards men: lost, guilty, feeble, hell-deserving men to the exclusion of revolted seraphs! O sinner, sinner, who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou which thou didst not receive (o) from the sovereign, discriminating bounty of free-grace? Men are taken and angels left! Nor does the Father of spirits incur the least shadow of injustice by doing what he wills with his own; or by withholding from any of his creatures, whether angelic or human, that grace, holiness, and happiness which he owes to none. Are you or I unjust in not giving to a person what we do not owe him? Surely not. And is God unjust who taketh vengeance? God forbid (p). O ye potsherds of the earth, who presume to cavil at the divine decrees, strive no longer against your Maker, nor madly run on the thick bosses of his Luckler! Remember that you are no more qualified to arraign the glorious mystery of predestination, and to comprehend the whole of God's designs, than the purblind mole, peeping from the top of its little cavern, can survey, judge, and pronounce of the universe at large. Fall down therefore at the footstool of the Omnipotent; and acknowledge, without limitation or reserve (what thou wilt surely and clearly discern in a future state), that God is holy in all his ways, and righteous in all his works. Be content to know no more of his motives and purposes than himself has condescended to reveal.

Wait the great teacher, death; and God adore
Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell;
Aspiring to be angels, men rebel.<sup>b</sup>

3. If the faith of the devils is a faith without works, it follows that such faith is unprofitable and dead, being fruitless and alone. For as the body without the soul is dead, so faith without works is dead also. Where there is life there will always be some degree of motion. And the believer who is truly such, cannot help shewing that he believes, by living unto God, and by doing the works which he enjoins.

On the contrary, as a body literally dead is totally motionless and incapable of transacting any worldly business, and its being in such a state of absolute inactivity convinces us that its death is real, though it may still retain the shape and form of a man: so we may pronounce that person to be spiritually and religiously dead, who is motionless and inactive in the ways and works of God: notwithstanding such person may profess to be alive, and among some may even have a name to live. Faith without holiness is no more gospel-faith than an image of wood or stone deserves to be termed a man.

4. I need not apprise you that you are

(n) Rom. ix. 21.

(o) 1 Cor. iv. 7.

called upon, by the voice of Providence, to perform a good work this afternoon. The barren faith of devils, I am persuaded, will not satisfy you and me. We are for proving by the good works we do that grace is a lively, benevolent, operative principle.

Since the first institution of that parochial school for which your bounty is now solicited, no fewer than five hundred and twenty-seven young persons have been admitted. Of those, one hundred and sixty have been apprenticed: fourteen fitted for the sea service: and upwards of three hundred have gone to domestic services, or been otherwise decently provided for. On the present establishment, there are now sixty children of both sexes, who are maintained and taught, chiefly by means of those voluntary contributions which are raised by good people from time to time. Such of you as are alive unto God through Jesus Christ, need no arguments from the pulpit to stir up your pure minds, even by way of remembrance. You do not, you will not, you cannot forget that Christ has made the poor his own receivers-general. I should therefore be guilty of offering an insult to all your fine feelings as men and Christians should I press this matter farther, by detaining you with petitions and remonstrances. They who possess a better faith than that of which the text speaks, will, as lovers and imitators of Christ, rejoice while and as often as they have opportunity to do good unto all men; and especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

You know not, but many of these young people, whom you are now going to assist (nay all of them, for any thing we can tell to the contrary), may have their names in the Lamb's book of life; may be useful members of society through the support afforded them, and in the world to come, through the free grace of God, reign in life everlasting.

That they and you their benefactors may to all eternity sing and rejoice together, ascribing the whole of your salvation to the covenant mercy of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is my heart's desire, and my prayer to the tri-une God.

MORAL AND POLITICAL MODERATION RECOMMENDED.

In a discourse delivered at St. Mildred's in the Poultry, London, Friday December 13, 1776. Being the day appointed for a general Fast.

SERMON X.

Let your moderation be known unto all Men.

Phil. iv. 5.

It was a favourite and frequent remark of king Henry VII., that when Christ came into the world, peace was sung: and when he went out of it: peace was beweathed. From the justness of which observation may be inferred the manifest impropriety of a Christian minister's taking too deep and too acrimonious a part in matters of merely civil concern.

Few men indeed have been more prone to dabble in politics than some divines. And it must be added that in general few men have acquitted themselves more lamely upon that subject than those reverend dabblers with untempered mortar. For one Dean Tucker, who draws a sensible pen on the occasion, a hundred ignorant and mercenary scribblers emerge from their concealments to darken counsel by words without knowledge.

The truth is, that those of the clergy who mostly content themselves with paddling in the shallows of a superficial morality, step much beyond the line both of their ability and of their proper department, when they attempt to fathom the deep water of politics. For it is well known that (in past ages at least) politics and morality have had but very slender connexion with each other.

As to those of us who deem it our duty to preach the gospel, and to know nothing among our people but Jesus Christ and him crucified, we, of all persons in the world, should religiously abstain from whatever may conduce to cherish the seeds and fan the fire of civil discord. Shocking it is when they who profess to experience, and to preach, the love of Christ, can so far prostitute the dignity and design of their sacred calling as to offer fulsome incense at the shrine of aggrandized authority, or seek to exasperate differing parties against each other; instead of labouring to preserve unity of spirit, to strengthen the bond of peace, and to promote righteousness of life.

Such bad men in black pay very little attention to that solemn vow which they took at the time of their investiture with the holy order of priesthood: when they pledged themselves to God and man that they would "lay aside the study of the world and of the flesh; and maintain and set forwards as much as in them lieth, quietness, peace, and love, among all Christian people."

Our direct business is with the polity of an invisible and better country; even of a kingdom which is not of this world. On one hand, we are to sound the trumpet, not of secular, but of spiritual, alarm: and on the other, to proclaim unto them that mourn and to them that believe in Zion,

"The joyful news of sin forgiv'n.

Of hell subdu'd, and peace with heav'n."

Hence it is my stedfast opinion, that pulpits were built to answer far nobler and more important purposes than those of political declamation: and that an occasion must be very singular indeed to warrant the substitution of discussions so exceedingly remote from the letter and spirit of our heavenly commission. To those therefore who, as ministers of Christ, entangle themselves with the affairs of this life, may that question be fairly accommodated, What dost thou here, Elijah?

There may arise, however, a coincidence of circumstances so uncommon in themselves as to admit of some short deviation from this general rule. Among these, I deem myself authorized to number that occasion on which I have the honour of addressing you at present. We are assembled for a purpose intimately connected with matters of national consideration: namely, to humble ourselves at the footstool of uncreated Majesty; to deplore our own sins, and the sins of our people; and to supplicate the blessing of heaven on our king and country, the two prime objects of our earthly love.

Things standing thus, I find myself constrained for once briefly to start from my usual sphere. With a view to make my political moderation known to as many as condescend to hear me this day, and in order to rectify a few mistakes which have been industriously and unjustly circulated, I request leave to premise some necessary particulars declarative of my civil creed. For notwithstanding my religious and political honesty have on more worldly occasions than one apparently stood in my way, yet, through the good hand of God upon me, it is my invariable rule to be strictly and inviolably transparent, even though it were to my own hindrance. We live at a time when virtue of every kind is (for the most part) literally and solely its own reward. And an exceeding great reward is most certainly and inseparably connected with it. For who can describe the sweetness of that moral joy which results from the testimony of conscience, that, in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have our conversation in the world? With this simplicity, I observe,

1. That as I am, in the literal sense of the word, an Englishman, so I wish to be such in the best sense of it. Next to the gospel of Christ, I love and revere the constitution of my country. Consequently,

2. I am not a republican. On the contrary, I am a royalist on principle. I have a most cordial and profound veneration both for the office and for the person of the king: and hold myself obliged, if necessity required, to lay down my life in their just defence. Every pulse I have sincerely and strongly beats for the present moderate episcopacy in the Church; and for constitutional monarchy in the state.

Here, if I might be allowed a few moments' digression, I would observe that the notion of a pure republic is a mere idea and no more. A commonwealth, truly and strictly so called, never yet subsisted, and never can subsist, except in the brains of a few speculative men, and in such writings as those of Plato, and Sir Thomas More. The many were always stately governed by the few: and always must be, while men are men; i. e. while Providence distributes wisdom, wealth, and power, with unequal hand. A whole nation can no more be civil governors than a whole Church can be clergymen, or all clergymen bishops. I once asked the most respectable republican in this kingdom, whether a single instance can be produced of a genuine republic in the whole compass of ancient or modern history? I knew the answer must be in the negative; and so it was. There were, I confess a few short periods when the Athenian administration approached the nearest, perhaps, of any other to an entire democracy: but, even then, it fell extremely short of the name. In our own country, when the House of Commons, after the execution of Charles I. assumed the sovereign power; was England, even during the short continuance of that self-created authority, a real Republic? Nay, verily. The three nations were three kingdoms still. They were governed by a multitude of kings instead of one. Though without the name and the splendours, the long parliament (until Cromwell tripped up their heels) possessed and exercised all the powers of the most absolute royalty: and he that has the substance need care but little for the shadow. Look at those nominal Republics which are now subsisting in several parts of Europe. Ask an inhabitant of Holland, of Genoa, of Venice, Geneva, or of the Swiss Cantons, whether the government there is completely popular? No such thing. They are not Republics, but Oligarchies. And Oligarchy is, usually, a species of the most grievous and insufferable tyranny.

3. In my opinion, every true Englishman is a constitutionalist: or, one who considers that happy mixture of the regal, the aristocratic, and the popular rights, established in this kingdom, to be one of the best and noblest efforts of human wisdom and justice that ever did honour to the human understanding and to the human heart. Yet, let it be observed, that the persons who compose that most august threefold body are not (as some have inaccurately affirmed) the constitution itself, but the natural and sworn guardians of it.

4. Though the constitution does not consist of the three estates, but the three estates derive their very being and importance from the constitution, still the health and safety of the constitution depend on the preservation of that just balance and mutual counterpoise of power which this wise distribution of authority was calculated to effectuate and maintain. If, in some remote age, the regal influence should absorb either the aristocratic or the representative branch of the legislature, or both; on the other hand, should the higher or the lower house of parliament be, in some future period, sufficiently powerful and wicked (as the commons in the last century were) to annihilate the just prerogatives of the Crown, or the just privileges of the other parliamentary estate; the constitutional balance will be broken: the several weights, by being thrown into one scale, will preponderate too much one way; and the sacred ark of generous and equal liberty will kick the beam. In the former case, posterity would be subject to the will of an individual tyrant: in the latter, to the still more terrible yoke of many.

5. I believe that the spirit and privileges of the English constitution are analogous to the vital fluids in an animal body: which ought, by a liberal and impartial circulation, to warm and invigorate not only the head and heart, but the meanest and remotest limb. Yea, every single hair is entitled, in its measure, to partake of the common supply.

A motley empire, made up of slaves and freemen, could not, from the very nature of so heterogeneous a combination, continue long in this condition. Like the mongrel image in Nebuchadnezzar's vision, it would soon fall and be broken. Despotism has ever proved an insatiable gulf. Throw ever so much into it, it would still yawn for more. Were liberty to perish irretrievably from any part of the English world, the whole would soon be deluged by the black sea of arbitrary power.

Moreover, Tua res agitur, paries quum proximus ardet: "When your next neighbour's house is on fire, your own is in danger."—Some years ago, a gentleman in Nottinghamshire who had injured one of his feet, by paring a nail to the quick, laughed on being told that there was danger of a mortification. "Be it so," said he; "the foot is a long way from the heart." But, as distant as it was, the ascending mortification put a period to his life not many weeks afterward. It holds as true in the body civil as in the body natural, that if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it.

6. The English constitution is a system of qualified liberty. What is liberty? 1. Not an inflammatory turbulence of conduct; nor an unlimited freedom or indecency of speech; nor a blind red-hot attachment to party. Party, as one well defines it is, "The madness of many for the gain of a few." Whereas true liberty consists in the legal safety and good order of each, for the advantage of the whole. 2. Liberty is not licentiousness, or a power of committing evil with impunity; but the privilege of doing all the good we can; and of enjoying, without molestation, and without fear, as much personal happiness as is consistent with the written law of God, the unwritten law of conscience, and the welfare of society at large.

Now I would no more reprobate the true modest constitutional liberty, merely because some mistaken zealots may, occasionally, abuse it to licentiousness, than I would reject the scripture-doctrine of grace, because a few men of corrupt minds may possibly pervert it to Antinomianism.

If you wish to know, clearly, what is comprized in the idea of English liberty, two or three hours' reading will, at any time, thoroughly inform you. Peruse Magna Charta, publicly signed by king John; and afterwards confirmed, with still greater circumstances of solemnity, by Henry III; though execrably violated by both. To this, add a persual of the Petition of Right; very solemnly, but not very sincerely, ratified and recognized by Charles I.—Then run over the Bill of Rights, which received either the hearty, or the dissembled, concurrence of William III. And, lastly, make yourself acquainted with the coronation oath, taken by our succeeding monarchs. Whatever reaches fully to this fourfold standard is constitutional freedom. All below this united mark is not liberty; and all beyond it is, in legal construction, licentiousness.

Can any thing be more reasonable, and more easy, than for an Englishman to devote about three hours, out of a whole lifetime, to the knowledge of the constitution of his country? How astonishingly and how deplorably general is our political ignorance as a nation; though most of us affect to value ourselves on the excellency of our civil fabric! Like the Jews of old, too many Britons profess to worship they know not what: and too many others set but a slight esteem on a constitution which they would almost worship, if they knew its worth. How inexcusable is English ignorance, when the short labour and trivial expense of so few hours' attention would dissipate the mental cloud, and turn the darkness into day!

7. Intimately associated with civil, is religious, liberty.

This consists, (1.) In that natural and indefeasible right which every reasonable man has from God (and which no human authority can lawfully take away or abridge). of thinking for himself, of determining for himself, and of decently declaring his ideas concerning all and every thing that relates to sacred matters. (2.) In worshipping God, both privately and publicly, according to the dictates of his own conscience; and that as safely, and as fearlessly as St. Paul preached in his hired house at Rome, viz. ακολυτωσ, without impedient, and no man forbidding him.

Every species of positive penalty for differing modes of faith and worship is at once anti-christian and impolitic, irrational and unjust. While any religious denomination of men deport themselves as dutiful subjects to the state, and as harmless members of the community, they are entitled to civil protection and to social esteem; whether they be Protestants, Papists, Jews, Mahometans, or Pagans. In this respect, among many others, the British legislature, for near a century past, have eminently made their moderation known to all men. And Judge Blackstone, in a treatise which does equal honour to his country and to himself, has lately observed that, "undoubtedly, all persecution and oppression of weak consciences, on the score of religious persuasions, are highly unjustifiable upon every principle of natural reason, civil liberty, or sound religion. But" (as he justly adds) "care must be taken not to carry this indulgence into such extremes as may endanger the national Church.—There is always a difference to be made between toleration and establishment.

"Certainly our ancestors were mistaken in their plans of compulsion and intolerance. The sin of schism, as such, is by no means the object of temporal coercion and punishment. If, through weakness of intellect, through misdirected piety, through perverseness and acerbity of temper, men quarrel with the ecclesiastical establishment, the civil magistrate has nothing to do with it unless their tenets and practice are such as threaten ruin or disturbance to the state. He is bound indeed to protect the established Church: and if this can be better effected by admitting none but its genuine members to offices of trust and emolument, he is certainly at liberty so to do: the disposal of offices being matter of favour and discretion. But this point being once secured, all persecution for diversity of opinions, however ridiculous or absurd they may be, is contrary to every principle of sound policy and civil freedom. The names and subordination of the clergy, the posture of devotion, the materials and colour of the minister's garment, the joining in a known or an unknown form of prayer, and other matters of the same kind, must be left to the option of every man's private judgment (7)."

If we consider this branch of Christian moderation merely in a civil view, nothing will be found more politically wise. The remark of a late (7) philosopher must ever hold good: that "The true secret for the discreet management of Sectarists is to tolerate them." By which means they are rendered less considerable, and of course less formidable. The more the children of Israel were oppressed in Egypt, the more they multiplied and grew.

Let us now take a survey of moderation, not as a public, but as a private virtue: or rather as a Christian grace, inspired by the Holy Spirit into the hearts of those who are born of God; and shining in the tempers, words and works of his elect, regenerated children.

St. Paul addressed not only the text, but this whole Epistle, to the saints in Christ Jesus at Philippi; and whom he declares to have been partakers of the same grace with himself. To these, whose names were in the book of life, and whose evident justification by Christ's righteousness entitled them to rejoice in the Lord always, he delivers that amiable precept, Let your moderation [το επιεικες υμων, your lenity, candour, tenderness, equity, and condescending meekness] be known unto all men.

The lovely constellation of graces, comprised in this expressive term, are what the apostle means by our participating the mind that was in Christ: even that wisdom from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated; full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy. It includes those effects of the blessed Spirit's influence, which are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, and crucifixion to the flesh with its affections and lusts.

Would you see the import of this significant word exemplified to the life? Consult the following character, or moral portrait of the Messiah; whom as Man and Mediator God the Father thus prophetically described: (8) Behold my servant, whom I sustain; my elect, in whom my soul delighteth. I have put my Spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment [or, make known my gospel and purposes of grace] to the Gentiles. He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the streets [i. e. He shall be all mildness, affability, and patience. No boisterous wrath, nor tumultuous noise, shall discolour any part of his behaviour. Though reviled, he will not revile again; nor threaten when he suffers. He will avoid every appearance of ostentation, and be as humble as he is good. No fierce opprobrious language shall issue from his lips. Not the smallest rising of malevolence shall violate his purity of heart. Invincible calmness shall dignify his conduct, and candour dwell upon his tongue]. A bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench. He shall bring forth judgment unto truth. May we derive from his fulness, and, like him, thus make our moderation known unto all men! That (to use the words of a good man long since with God), "As paper receives from the press letter for letter; as wax receives from the seal mark for mark; and as a mirror reflects face for face, so we may receive from Christ grace for grace; and have in ourselves a measure of every virtue that shone so bright in him!"

By viewing the features of some persons you may know from what family they sprang; and by observing the moral walk of religious professors you may discern to whom they belong. As many as are led by the Spirit of God; they are the sons of God. All who have God for their Father, and Christ for their Saviour, have, sooner or later, the Holy Ghost for their Sanctifier; and their sanctification by him is the effect and evidence of their adoption. By nature the children of God themselves bear the image of the earthly Adam: but in the very moment of their conversion by insuperable grace they begin to bear the image of the heavenly. The seal of divine influence is set upon their hearts; and their lives thenceforward correspond to the transforming efficacy of that sacred impression. Being melted down by penitence and conviction of sin, they are cast afresh, and (t) delivered into the gospel mould, where they are shaped and fashioned into vessels of honour fit for the master's use. Like the scion, they are severed from the sinful stock on which they grew; and, being inserted into Christ the true vine, they bring forth fruit to God.

As when a river is turned into a new channel the stream forsakes its ancient bed and pursues a course unknown until then, so the soul of man, when its native captivity to sin and death is turned as the rivers in the south, flows back to God, from whom it ran before; nor ceases to flow until it has gained the ocean of infinite good.

This is the inseparable effect of union and communion with him. The glorious liberty of the children of God is a liberty from the darkness of unbelief, and from the bondage of moral corruption into the light of faith, the fire of love, and the law of righteousness. That question in the prophet, Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? admits of a favourable solution. The converting Spirit of God does that for us which we could never do for ourselves. He makes the Æthiopian in a moral sense, fair as the driven snow, and renders the spotted leopard spotless, in comparison of what he was. The vessels of iniquity become vessels of glory; and the soul that once cleaved to the dust of sensuality, and lay dead in trespasses and sins, is quickened from above, and made to sit in heavenly places with Christ Jesus. When the citadel of the human heart is taken by grace the enemy's colours are displaced; Satan's usurped authority is superseded; the standard of the cross is erected on the walls; and the spiritual rebel takes the vow of willing allegiance to Christ his rightful sovereign. The strong holds of sin, on one hand, and of self-righteousness on the other, are battered down; and the soul, from that blessed moment made free indeed, cries out, Other lords have had dominion over me; but the darkness is past, and the true light now shines: the snare is broken, and I am delivered.

From this experience of the divine power in our own hearts, we cannot but adopt the celestial anthem, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men! Our moderation becomes known to all; and some of the practical effects produced by, and connected with, that spirit of holy moderation are these that follow:

Where lust, that fiery serpent, was wont to crawl, divine love kindles her hallowed flame and raises the affections as on eagles' wings to heaven.

Where unbelief, blind and sullen as the mole, lay wrapt in malicious gloom, loving darkness rather than light, and seeking to undermine what she had not eyes to see; faith diffuses the brightness of celestial day, and leads the willing soul to him who bought her with his blood.

Where insensibility, thoughtless as the bird that hastens to the snare, and gay as a victim crowned for the slaughter, sported on the precipice of destruction, and danced on the verge of death; serious conviction fixes her keen but salutary weapon: and filial fear keeps the avenues of the converted person's heart, and the actions of his life, in powerful but sweet restraint.

Where envy pined, where malice hissed, where slander sharpened her tongue, and pride, that bloated snake, lifted her swelling crest: universal charity throws wide her arms, humility stoops to the tenderest offices of beneficence; and dove-like meekness smiles with benignity in her heart, and the law of candour upon her lips.

Where intemperance mixed the intoxicating bowl, and lawless riot pushed the superfluous glass; seeking to drown every thought of eternity, and to sink the poor remains of human dignity in the poisonous

(t) St. Paul expresses this idea very finely, in Rom. vi. 17. But God be thanked, that [though] ye were the slaves of sin, yet in consequence of your regeneration from above] ye have, from the heart, obeyed that mould of doctrine into which ye were delivered.

draught : there religious moderation marks out the limits, mindful of that more than golden rule, Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.

Where profaneness, assuming the mask of wit, spawned the irreligious jest, and solicited the hellish laugh ; prostituting perhaps even the language of Scripture to the purposes of licentious mirth, and playing on the very words of the Holy Ghost ; trifling with sacred subjects at which angels tremble, and lightly mentioning that adorable Name at which angels bow ; there, from the moment of conversion, grace introduces a total change. The renewed sinner abhors himself, as in dust and ashes, for all that he has done ; and can never sufficiently adore, admire, and revere that infinite goodness, which instead of turning him into hell has turned him to God, and made him a living monument, not of deserved vengeance, but of unmerited mercy. His heart, which until then was a sink of impurity and profanation, is transformed into a house of prayer ; and his mouth, once the seat of blasphemy, is consecrated into an altar of praise.

Where avarice sat brooding, tenacious as death, and insatiate as the grave ; unfeeling as marble, and deaf to the cries of distress as the adder that stops her ear ; discreet liberality unlocks the heart, and well directed beneficence extends her hand to bestow. The language of the soul is similar to that of Zaccheus : Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor ; and if I have taken any thing from any man, by false accusation, I restore him four-fold. The true believer, like his adorable Saviour, goes about doing good, and seeking whom he may relieve.

Where discontent, like a wild bull in a net, raged and struggled, turning the rod of affliction into a serpent, and charging Providence with folly ; reclining patience kisses the hand that smites, and, knowing that infinite wisdom and goodness have mingled the draught, not only receives, but even relishes, the cup ; while celestial hope casts her anchor on the inestimable promise of Him who says, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee ; and who has immutably declared that all things, without exception, work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to his purpose. Thus does the follower of Christ, in the communicated strength of the Holy One, take up his cross ; content to bear it as long, and to carry it as far, as God's unerring will shall please :

But knows what man calls fortune is from God.”

Where sacrilegious impiety once robbed Jehovah of his own day, and profaned the Sabbath, either by rioting and excess, or by travelling, or by the transaction of worldly business, or by making it an opportunity of recreation and idle amusement ; thus rendering the best of days subservient to the worst of purposes, either of atrocious guilt, or of criminal insignificance ; either basely selling, or unprofitably squandering, those precious, those irretrievable, hours which should be appropriated to the glory of God, and to the spiritual improvement of the soul ;—there, religious regard to divine appointment, and love to the gracious Appointer, constrain the Christian to keep the Lord's day holy to the Lord, and to cultivate an habitual, increasing fitness for the enjoyment of that Sabbathism, that everlasting rest, which remaineth for the people of God.

In a word, where impiteny, armed with ten-fold brass, stiffened her neck, and withdrew her shoulder from the yoke of obedience ;—the once obdurate sinner, being made willing in the day of God's power, cries out, with vanquished Paul, Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do ? Tears of contrition flow like water from the smitten rock ; repentance strikes her conscious breast ; and devotion darts her aspiring eyes to heaven.

May those of us who have hitherto been unconcerned about the great work of conversion beg of God to shew them the things belonging to their peace, ere death makes them wise indeed ; wise, perhaps, too late !

And may such of us as are awakened by grace to the experimental knowledge, love, and imitation of Christ, be led farther and deeper into acquaintance with God, and communion with his Blessed Spirit : gaining day by day brighter evidences of our election to eternal life, and more substantial marks of our interest in the covenant of grace. Pray for the full assurance of faith, for the feeling of God's favour to you in Christ Jesus, and for the knowledge of salvation by the forgiveness of sins.

There are indeed seasons of darkness and distress, wherein God's dearest people may be tempted to fear that their mark is not the mark of his children ; and to say, with them in the Psalmist, We see not our tokens. But let not the doubting believer think himself an alien because he doubts : nor let him imagine that because he sees not his tokens, he therefore has no tokens to see. A broken and a contrite heart is an infallible token for good. For justification, fly to the righteousness of Jesus. If you cannot wrap yourself in it, yet throw yourself upon it, and he will not cast you out. For sanctification, commit yourself in the diligent use of means to the power and faithfulness of the eternal Spirit, who has inviolably promised and covenanted to write his law upon the hearts of his people. He will not send you empty away, nor permit you to seek his face in vain.

To seek his face with fasting and supplication and mourning, is the duty, and I trust will be the grand business, of us all this day. And reason enough we have to prostrate ourselves before the God of armies and the King of kings : for, even as individuals, and much more as a nation, our iniquities are increased and our trespasses are grown up unto the heavens.

“What land so favoured of the skies ?

And yet what land so vile !”

Sin is the source of all the temporal evils which we are met to deprecate. Mr. Soame Jenyns has justly reminded us that, “If Christian nations were nations of Christians, all war would be impossible and unknown among them.” Be it then our prayer, on this solemn, this interesting occasion, that as the far greater part of the inhabitants of our island are nominal Christians, and have been baptized with water into the outward profession of the gospel; God would please to make us Christians indeed and in truth, by baptizing us with the Holy Ghost, and with the mystic fire of his sanctifying love. We might then hope soon to see the day when war shall be made to cease ; when our swords shall be beat into ploughshares, and our spears bent into pruning hooks. Phosphore, redde diem ; May our loved and honoured sovereign quickly behold his empire resembling a city that is at unity with itself ! Until that most desirable period shall arrive, let our moderation as Christians, and our loyalty as subjects, be known unto all men, by every word of our lips, and by every action of our lives : ever mindful of this grand scriptural maxim, that we cannot truly be said to fear God, unless we also love the brotherhood, and honour the king.

I shall only detain you a moment or two longer by observing that you have now an opportunity of adding another good work to those in which you have already been engaged. When Cornelius fasted and prayed, he crowned those duties with shewing mercy to the poor : and an angel was sent to him from heaven, acquainting him that his prayers and his alms-deeds were ascended as a memorial before God. The Ethelburga Society, who are at the expense of supporting a Sunday evening lecture, and of maintaining a charity-school for the education, board, clothing, and apprenticing, of no fewer than fifty-two children of both sexes, request your benevolent contribution, to assist them in the support of this noble and eminently useful institution. I beseech you therefore, brethren, rightly to improve the present season of national humiliation, by duly considering these awful words of God with which I shall conclude :

Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not ? Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge ?

Behold, in the day of your fast, ye find pleasure, and exact all the things wherewith ye grieve others. Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness. Ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high.—Wilt thou call this a fast and an acceptable day unto the Lord ? Is not this the fast that I have chosen ; to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke ? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house ? when thou seest the naked that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thy own flesh ? Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thy health shall spring forth speedily. Thou shalt call, and the Lord shall answer ; thou shalt cry, and he shall say Here I am : if thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity. And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul ; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon-day. And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought : and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water whose waters fail not.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CONVERSION OF MATTHEW,

RECORDED IN LUKE V. 27, 28.

“After these things he [i. e. Jesus] went forth, and saw a publican named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom : and he said unto him, Follow me. And he left all, rose up, and followed him.”

DIVINE grace is the same thing in all ages ; and, when conferred in an equal degree, has the same effect in all persons. The reason of this is evident : namely, because the spiritual and moral depravity that flows from original sin being as great now as it was the day Adam fell, the very same efficacy of grace is still requisite to subdue it that was requisite from the beginning. The primary disease continuing, the primary remedy is as absolutely necessary now as it was at first.

Besides, the blessed Spirit of God, who is the moral physician of souls, and the author of all that is heavenly and spiritual in the human heart, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever : and so are his ordinary operations. Sin and grace are things unalterable in their nature : the revolution of ages makes no difference. Man is as much a fallen creature at present as he was four or five thousand years ago : nor can less suffice to his renewal now than was necessary to his renewal then.

This exertion of supernatural grace upon the soul in regeneration is what divines mean by effectual calling. All mankind without exception, God's elect as well as the rest, are by nature dead in sin, and alienated from the love of Christ and heavenly things: nor is the human will, though free enough to sin, free to spiritual good, until the arm of the Lord, or almighty power from on high, is revealed in the soul, and regenerates it after the image of God. In the article of first conversion man is nothing, and grace does all.

What has been hitherto observed is a natural introduction to that concise but comprehensive piece of sacred history now under consideration. "After these things," i. e. after the Son of God had been preaching to the pharisees; and, among other miracles, had wrought a supernatural cure on the person of a bed-ridden paralytic; "after these things he went forth" by the sea side, as we learn from St. Mark; "and saw a publican named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom:" επι το τελωνιον, at the custom-house, or tax-office, erected for the payment and receiving of the toll imposed by the Roman government on all that passed and repassed the sea, or lake of Galilee. In this place, and to receive this toll, sat Levi, or Matthew: the same who was honoured with a subsequent call to the apostleship; and who wrote the gospel which at this day bears his name.

Methinks I see the busy officer with his book of entry before him, receiving and noting down the payments of the thronging passengers: when lo, in the midst of the hurrying employ, the Son of God comes by. Matthew perhaps at first looks up; and, mistaking the Lord of life for a common passenger, holds out his hand expecting to receive the usual tax. But the blessed Jesus had a design in coming which Matthew little thought. He came to make the publican a saint and an apostle. Our Lord's going that way was casual and accidental to outward appearance: but the true reason of his going was to call and convert a sinner whose name was in the book of life. Matthew was one of the sheep of Christ, given him by the Father, and marked out for glory, and who was therefore to be called by grace from the darkness of unbelief, and from the servitude of sin, into the light of faith and the liberty of holiness. And now the blessed moment was come. The time of love before appointed, the season in which he was to be savingly turned to God was arrived, and the efficacious grace of the Holy Spirit made its way into his heart when Christ accosted him with that unexpected, but resistless word, "Follow me."

pliance. It is most absurd in theory, and evidently false in fact, to suppose that when God speaks internally he may speak in vain. So far is this from being true, that no word of his shall fall to the ground, nor return again empty, but assuredly accomplish the end for which it was sent. No one who entertains a becoming idea of the great God will venture to deny the freeness, the efficacy, and the independency of his operation; and that when he will work, in vain do the potshards of the earth set themselves in array against him.

But, though the event is thus infallibly secured, and, when the influence of grace is savingly exerted, conversion as the effect must necessarily and surely follow (since it is simply impossible that the purpose and the agency of an all-wise and all-powerful Being should be defeated and miscarry); yet this infers no sort of violence on the human will, since all God's dealings with his rational creatures in a way of grace are wisely and wonderfully suited to the faculties with which he has thought proper to endue them. In regeneration the will of man is not forced but renewed; it is not compelled, but amended and set right; in consequence of which it spontaneously directs its future motions to God, heaven, and things divine.

When our Lord said to Matthew, "Follow me;" though an invisible power accompanied the word to the heart, as the plumage wings an arrow to the mark, yet there was no compulsion on Matthew, he was not forcibly compelled, but by grace willingly and effectually inclined to follow the Lord that called him. He was not dragged, but drawn, and, being drawn, he ran.

From this view of the case, I cannot for my own part but be of opinion that the laboured attempts of some learned men to reconcile the efficacy of God's grace with the liberty of the human will, are to the full as needless as the methods they have frequently taken to do it are unscriptural and dangerous. For to make a shew of reconciling what were never at variance is needless; and to represent the divine will as depending on that of man, is fundamentally subversive of those high and great apprehensions of the Deity which even the religion of nature dictates. We know that every reasonable creature is endued with a will, or faculty of disliking, on one hand, and of desiring on the other. By virtue of this essential power, the will chooses that which is most agreeable to it, and delights in what it chooses.

But then this choice is determined to do good or evil, according to the moral and spiritual state in which a man is. In a state of unregeneracy, his will and desire are carried toward that which is evil: since as is the fountain such is the stream; and the man himself being morally corrupt, his faculties and his actions must be so too. In a state of grace, the bias and inclination of the will are to that which is spiritually good, the man himself being formed anew, and sanctified by the Holy Spirit, his faculties and the prevailing tenor of his actions must of course bear the impress of heaven, since as is the tree so is the fruit.

Hence it appears that, in the work of converting sinners to himself, God is so far from impelling them as machines, or dragging them blindfold and against their wills into happiness (though I do not see where would be the injury of even that); but this is so far from being the case, that the eyes of our understanding are then, and not till then, opened to discern where our happiness lies, and in what our real interest consists: even in the knowledge, love, and resemblance of the only true God, and of Jesus Christ whom he hath sent; and this is no sooner discovered to the soul than the will from that moment chooses and aspires after the divine favour, the divine image, the divine presence, and the divine glory.

Here you see is not the least encroachment on human freedom. The will continues free or enforced at the very time that grace is all in all. Here is sovereign efficacy without violence; and invincible energy without compulsion. There is no force (but that of love); and there needs no other. The soul that has once had but a distant glimpse of the ravishing beauty and goodness of God, the infinite excellency of holiness, the exceeding greatness of the Redeemer's kindness, the fulness of his merit, and the immense riches of the salvation procured by him; the soul that has once seen and tasted these needs no compulsive force in order to love him who is the fountain of good, and to aspire after that good of which he is the fountain. The transcendent power of the sacred Spirit by which his influence is made invincibly effectual to conversion, is no more inconsistent with liberty of will (truly understood) than the shining of the sun is inconsistent with the liberty of seeing.

Was there but this single instance of converting grace on record in Scripture, this (I mean the instantaneous conversion of Matthew, mentioned in the passage before us) would be sufficient to put the point out of all doubt. He was a person who sustained the character, and discharged the office, of a publican, or tax-gatherer for the Romans; an employ above all others odious to the Jewish nation, and at the same time infamous to a proverb. We may suppose that it was a principle of covetousness and attachment to the world which induced Matthew, who, as both his names declare, was an Israelite by birth, to engage in a way of life which could not fail of rendering him hateful to his countrymen, who considered every publican, and more especially if he was a native Jew, as a tool to foreign tyranny, and a betrayer of his country. Notwithstanding the odium and detestation he was sure to incur, Matthew previous to his conversion accepted of the office, and in all probability was as avaricious and oppressive in the execution of it as the rest of his hireling brethren. To see such a man, and in the very midst of his actual employ wrought upon at once by a word speaking; so wrought upon as instantly to leave all, rise up and follow that blessed, but despised person who had not where to lay his head; all this evidently shows that a conversion so speedy and so total, and of such a person too, could be effected by no less power than that which is omnipotent, and may vie with the greatest miracles which the Son of God performed.

It is true indeed there was something extraordinary in the call of Matthew. He was called not only to be a follower of Christ, but (ultimately) to be an apostle likewise; and it was this that justified his forsaking all secular employment, that he might be more at liberty to attend his Divine Master, and then to diffuse his gospel. But I apprehend that with regard to the conversion of Matthew as a Christian, the grace and power by which it was brought about, were neither more nor less than must be exerted by the good Spirit of God, in order to the conversion of any person whatever.

Besides, it is more than probable that Matthew's call to the apostleship was subsequent to that call of which the text speaks. For aught appears to the contrary, this history simply relates to his conversion as a man, not to his mission as a public minister, for (except in the single instance of Judas) Christ made men believers before he sent them forth as preachers. It would seem that when the Son of God said "Follow me," a call to faith and sanctification was chiefly meant; which graces are equally necessary to the salvation of one as well as another. Hence our Lord declares, concerning all his people without exception, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me;" and St. Paul exhorts us to be "followers," or imitators "of God, as dear children;" for it is certain that the Saviour of sinners says in effect to every sinner he saves, "Follow me" in holiness, in love, in every good word and work: and that grace which stands connected with everlasting life, never fails of inducing those who partake of it "to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in the present world;" to be ornaments to the gospel they profess, and to walk in the blameless footsteps of him who hath redeemed them unto God by his blood, and by whose power and grace they are called to glory and virtue. We are not indeed required, like Matthew, to renounce our temporal vocations, and bid adieu to that lawful state of life and honest labour in which Providence hath placed us, for we may rise up and follow Christ without doing that. Nay, it is our indispensable duty to be industrious and diligent in our civil employments; and he that worketh not should not eat; the drones should be driven from the hive. Religion is so far from being a plea for idleness, that idleness is absolutely incompatible with true religion. "Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called," says the apostle: i. e. let every man continue in the same secular calling, and carry on the same lawful business after conversion that he did before. The reason why St. Matthew was in the literal sense made to forsake all, and throw up his employ as a custom-house officer was, as I observed but now, that, by being at perfect liberty to attend on the personal ministry of Christ, he might be thoroughly qualified both to preach the gospel afterwards, and to write that evangelical history of what he had seen and heard. But this affects not us. The case of the apostles as such was peculiar to themselves. We can have no such motives to forsake all; and he must be a madman who now thinks he has. There are other ways of forsaking all. We are to forsake all, not in a secular, but in a spiritual, sense. Forsake iniquity, forsake the love of the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life; forsake all dependence on our own righteousness; forsake all sinful connections, all unscriptural doctrines, and unscriptural practices; nay, in point of affection, forsake even all things, and give up our hearts to God. This is the forsaking to which we are called. Thus rise up, and follow Christ. Pray for grace to make you happy in the love of God, and holy in all manner of conversation and godliness. Beg of the blessed Spirit to raise you up from the death of unbelief and sin, to the life of faith and righteousness, and to make you follow him in the regeneration. So shall we immediately, on our dismissal from the body, follow the Son of God into the glories of his kingdom, and lift up our heads with joy when flesh and heart fail.

Nor shall death finally detain our mortal part. If, by grace, we have these evidences of our belonging to Christ; these marks of our interests in his merits, and of our renewal after his image; he will say to our sleeping dust, in the morning of the resurrection, "Awake, and follow me;" follow me, first, into the blessedness of the millenary state, and thence to heaven. Then shall he call, and we shall answer; he shall seek us, and each shall say, "Here I am." We shall hear the voice that shakes the earth and wakes the dead. We shall forsake the grave; rise up from the tomb at our Lord's command; leave all our imperfections behind us; and follow him: follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes, and be for ever with the Lord.

In the mean while, let us examine ourselves whether we be in the faith; whether we have reason to trust that the power of converting grace hath begun to work effectually upon our hearts. In a word, whether we have ever experienced, in a spiritual sense, any thing similar to what the text relates. Though we are not called to be apostles, yet all who shall appear with Christ in glory are called to be saints. And what is a saint? One who is hallowed, or set apart, by divine grace, for the use and service of God: one who is made a partaker of that faith which relies, singly relies, on the blood and righteousness of Christ, for justification with God: and who is a subject of that holiness without which none shall see the Lord: one who leaves all things, so far as they consist not with faith and good conscience; who counts all that earth can give but dross and dung, when compared with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, and with the privilege of being found in him; who rises up into the moral likeness of God; and follows the Lord that bought him in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. Such persons have fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ: they have a manifest interest in the favour of the former, and in the merits of the latter. Walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comforts of the Holy Ghost, they are built up into temples of God; their grace, their peace, their joy, are multiplied.

After surveying this picture of a saint, next look into your own heart, and see if you can discover any resemblance of it in yourself; any corresponding features, any traces of the divine image there. For as face answers face in a glass, so the experience of one saint is in general nearly similar to that of another. Some indeed may have a stronger likeness of their heavenly Father than others: but every true believer does, in a greater or less degree, resemble God. Bring yourself therefore, now, to the test of God's word. Try your state and experience by the touchstone of the text. Has Christ ever said to you by the still small voice of his good Spirit, "Follow me?" If he has, you do follow him: for his will is effectual, and his command is ever accompanied with power. But is the unbeliever, the impenitent, the unholy, a follower of Christ? Surely no. He only is a follower of his who resolves the whole praise of his salvation into the grace of God and the atonement of the Cross, who is grieved at heart for all that he has done against Jesus; and whose desire is,

Hereby you may know whose image and superscription you bear. These are the outlines of that divine resemblance, in a restoration to which consists the dignity and the happiness of man. Let this then be your prayer: "Try me, O God, and search the ground of my heart: prove me and examine my thoughts. Look well if there be any wickedness in me, any root of bitterness yet undiscovered; and lead me in the way everlasting. Show me the true state of my soul. Bring me out from every false refuge. Strip off every deceitful covering, every covering that is not of thy Spirit. Forbid that the anchor of my hope should be cast, or the house of my dependence built, on any but Christ, the rock of ages. Forbid that I should rest short of that repentance which is thy gift, and is connected with life eternal: and forbid, O forbid, that I should sit down without aspiring to that conformity unto thee in righteousness and true holiness, abstracted from which repentance is false and faith is dead."

Such are the breathings of the soul that is born of God. If this, O man, be not the language of thy inmost heart, thou art far from Christ, thou art yet in thy sins: thou hast not forsaken all; thou hast never been made to rise up and follow the Lamb of God. But if this is thy wish and thy prayer, I am bold to say that it is the echo of effectual grace; and that God hath begun that good work in thee which shall be carried on to the day of Christ, and be found with honour and glory at his appearance. That Spirit of regeneration, who hath drawn the outlines of his sacred image upon thy soul, will go on to improve the imperfect draught, until he hath touched it with the perfect likeness of his blessed self. What he hath begun in this life shall be completed in the article of death. The dawn of grace, the morning of consummate sanctification, when thou art taken up to shine at God's right hand.

Until then, look incessantly unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of faith. Even while the penitent sense of thy past offences and of thy remaining imperfections humbles thy soul, and overwhelms thy conscience with a holy blush; let glowing gratitude, aspiring love, and unlimited confidence in the blood of sprinkling, exalt thy heart, and wing thy affections to the throne. And beware of ascribing any part of thy conversion to yourself: for the work was God's, and so should be the glory. Do not rob God by putting free will for free grace; but remember that you never had rose up and followed Christ, if he had not by the effectual call of his Spirit said to your heart, "Follow me." For it is no thanks to you, but to him. If you love him, it is because he first loved you.

Man's will was never yet before-nand with God. "Herein is love," says the apostle; "not that we loved God, but that God loved us, and sent," &c. Under such impressions, David's devout aspiration will be the counter-part of your's; "Make me to go in the path of thy commandments, for therein is my desire. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire in comparison of thee!" Prelude this to that still more triumphant song which the spirits of the just are now singing before the throne of God and the Lamb; "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever."

LIFE A JOURNEY.

"They went forth to go into the Land of Canaan; and into the Land of Canaan they came."

Genesis xii. 5.

God having decreed to put Abram's posterity into possession of the country since called Palestine, commanded that patriarch to leave Chaldea, his native land, and to set out with his family for the place whither Providence should lead him.

Abram, who had obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, was not disobedient to the heavenly vision: but, as the inspired penman informs us, he took Sarai, his wife, and Lot, his brother's son, and all the substance they had gathered, and the souls, or persons, which they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan they came. The same unchangeable God who had promised to bring them into that land, actually brought them into the land he had promised: and they not only sat out for Canaan, but arrived safely there, according to the purpose and promise of him who had bid them go.

Now, since Abram is distinguished in Scripture as father of the faithful; or as one whose steadfast unsuspecting confidence in the promises was singularly eminent; and whose faith for that reason stands on record as a pattern to the people of Christ in all succeeding generations; since he was likewise a type of the Church collective, which consists of and takes in all true believers, from the beginning to the end of time; and as the land of Canaan to which Abram travelled is represented in Scripture as a figure of heaven, that better country, to which all God's elect people are bound, and to which they shall all be led: for these reasons we shall, I apprehend, put no force on the words of that text which stands as a motto to this essay, nor strain them beyond their due meaning, if (beside their literal signification as a history) we consider them in a spiritual light, as importing the safety of those who, in consequence of being called forth from a state of nature by converting grace, are enabled to set their faces Sionward, and to enter on a journey to the kingdom of God. The chief business, therefore, of the present attempt shall be to shew that, to every real Christian, the present life is only a journey to a better; and that all they who do in earnest set out for the heavenly Canaan, the Jerusalem which is above, shall certainly get safe to their journey's end, and not one of them perish by the way.

When a merchant sends out his fleet on a trading voyage he is not sure of the event. His ships may arrive at the desired haven, and return with the wished increase; or they may founder on their passage, and both cargo and crews be lost.—Or, when a person takes a far journey, he has no assurance of safety. He cannot pre-discern what is before him; nor whether he shall come back to his house in peace or no. Such is the uncertainty of earthly transactions with regard to our foreknowledge of them. We cannot tell what a day, what a moment, may bring forth. The issue of things lies hid in the womb of futurity, till Providence and time make manifest the determinations of God, by bringing those determinations to pass.

Not so clouded are the better things which relate to a better life. The feeblest seeker of salvation by the blood of the Lamb, and the meanest hungerer after the kingdom and righteousness of Jesus, may be assured before-hand that the kingdom shall be his. The inseparable blessings of grace and glory are styled the sure mercies of David (Acts xiii. 34.) τα οσια Δαβιδ τα πιστα, the sacred [i. e. the inviolably certain, and] the faithful things of David, i. e. of Christ: or, more conformably to the original passage in Isaiah, the sure benefits of David: meaning, the infallible certainty of those benefits (such as pardon, justification, sanctification, final preservation, and eternal happiness), which are secured to the Church by virtue of that unalterable covenant subsisting between the Father, the Spirit, and Christ the anti-type of David, in behalf of all who shall be made to believe through grace.

This everlasting covenant of peace and salvation, entered into with God the Son, by the other two divine persons, St. Paul had in view, when he says, God, willing to show more abundantly to the heirs of promise, the immutability of his counsel [βεβλης, of his decree], confirmed it with an oath, that by two unchangeable things [namely, his decree and oath], wherein it is impossible for God to falsify, we might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us, Heb. vi. 17, 18.

Now, as Abram literally sat forward from the land of his nativity so, in a figurative sense, does every person who is effectually called by grace. By nature, we are insensible of our sinful state, and ignorant of our extreme danger; impenitent, and unbelieving; and (which argues the utmost blindness and depravation) self-righteous, though unholy. This is a compendious map of the natural man. He is a native of Mount Sinai; born under the covenant of works; fondly expecting to be justified by the deeds of the law; though he has broken the law, more or less, in every particular.

From this legal state of insensibility, impenitence, unbelief, self-righteousness, and bondage to sin, every child of God is delivered, by the effectual operation of the Holy Ghost; through whose almighty agency, we are caused to turn our backs on the blind road we were pursuing before, and to steer a different course. No longer insensible of our real condition, we feel that every step we took was leading us farther and farther from God and happiness in heaven. Ignorant no longer of the danger to which we were obnoxious by reason of original and actual sin, we have recourse to Christ alone as the way, the truth, and the life. No more impenitent, we bewail the depravity of our hearts, and the transgressions of our hands: we love the rectitude we hated, and hate the sins we loved. Retrieved from absolute unbelief, we feel the necessity of Christ, and throw ourselves upon the grace of God in him, for deliverance from the wrath to come. No longer habitually self-righteous, we not only most willingly submit to, but most thankfully embrace, and most devotedly rest upon, and triumph in, the righteousness of Christ, as the sole procuring cause of our acceptance in the Father's sight. And no longer quite unholy, we pant after inward conformity to the divine image, and outward conformity to the divine law: thoroughly sensible that without holiness no man can see the Lord; and that faith, without works, is dead.

Whosoever is brought thus far, is more than half-way to the kingdom of heaven. He has made, through grace, a good progress on the road to Sion; and shall go on, from strength to strength, till he appear before the God of gods in glory.

When this happy change is effected, and the converted person begins to evidence his new birth by forsaking his old companions in sin, and by leading a new life; different people will pass different censures upon his conduct. One will without ceremony dub him a new-fashioned Methodist. Another will set him down for an old-fashioned Puritan. A third will roundly pronounce him a madman, that has lost his senses by being righteous over-much. A fourth, who has more politeness and less ill-nature than the rest, will say to him, I wonder how a person of your good sense in other things, can be so precise. You will hurt your (u) nerves, and damp your spirits. There is no occasion for all this ado. Take a cheerful glass! Give the rein to your appetites! and make a merry life of it, though it be a short one.

Thus will multitudes endeavour by various methods, to call the traveller back, and to divert him from his Christian course. But he still holds on his way: answering as he passes, We shall see whose life will be merriest in the end.

Yet let not the follower of Christ cause the way of truth to be ill spoken of, or bring an evil report on the good land, by needless rigour and by affected severity. Do not sullenly reject the gifts of Providence, under a pretence of superior sanctity: but use them without abusing them. If you have them not, be not anxious after them. If you have them, enjoy them in the fear, and to the glory, of God. There is a sober, restrained sense in which a true believer may say with the poet,

“The blessings thy free bounty gives,
Let me not cast away;
For God is paid when man receives:
To enjoy is to obey.”

Receive gratefully. Distribute cheerfully. Enjoy innocently. Give thanks incessantly. When you set out for heaven, do not set up for a monk: nor look upon those things as criminal which the word of God does not declare to be so. Gnat-strainers are too often camel-swallowers: and the Pharisaical mantle of superstitious austerity is very frequently a cover for a cloven foot. Beware then of driving too furiously at first setting out. Take the cool of the day. Begin as you can hold on. I knew a lady who, to prove herself perfect, ripped off her flounces and would not wear an ear-ring, a necklace a ring, or an inch of lace. Ruffles were Babylonish. Powder was anti-christian. A ribband was carnal. A snuff-box smelt of the bottomless pit. And yet under all this parade of outside humility, the fair ascetic was——. But I forbear entering into particulars. Suffice it to say, that she was a concealed Antinomian. And I have known too many similar instances.

Take heed however, O believer in Christ, of verging to the opposite extreme. Beware of a supine, lukewarm, libertine spirit. Watch unto prayer, guard against negligence. Advance not to the uttermost bounds of your liberty. It is a just remark, which I have somewhere met with, that the best way to be secure from falling into a well is not to venture too near the brink. Swim not with the stream, if the tide roll downward; neither follow a multitude to do evil. It is the duty of a Christian not to be ashamed of being singularly good: especially in an age like this, when so many are not ashamed of being eminently bad. Better go with a few to heaven, than to go with much and polite company to hell. He that fears men, and seeks to please men at the expense of gospel truths, or of good morals, is not an honest man, much less a servant of Christ. And though in matters of mere indifference you are not absolutely bound to abridge your liberty as a Christian, nor is it meet that you should affect to be good any more than to be wise, above that which is written; yet if you find (as in some instances, you probably will) that even things in themselves indifferent prove a snare, an entanglement, and a hinderance to you, in running the race that is set before you; pluck out those things, be they what they may, and cast them from you: though they be useful as a right hand, or tender as a right eye. In a word, endeavour to hit the just medium; so as neither to make too much haste, nor too little speed: neither to loiter, nor to run yourself out of breath.

If the believer's journey should prove a long one, i. e. should he live to be advanced in years, he must expect to meet with diversity of paths. The face of the country will not always be the same. Even with regard to temporal things, perhaps, he may experience a vicissitude of ups and downs. Sometimes the road will go rough, sometimes smooth. To-day it may be he is high on the mount; to-morrow low in the valley. Now his way is carpeted with moss: anon it is planted with the pricking briar and the grieving thorn. But remember, O child of God, that both one and the other is thy Father's ground; that thou art still in the land of Providence, and that the land of Providence is also a land of grace to them who are strangers and pilgrims upon earth. So likewise in a spiritual sense, when faith is in lively exercise, we may be said to travel through a rich, level, open country; where all is easy, lightsome, and pleasant. Soon perhaps may faith sicken (sicken it may, but, blessed be God, it cannot die) and hope may flag its wing: fear may set upon thee, as a strong man armed, and the overshadowings of doubt may for a while eclipse thy comforts. In that case, let the believer still go forward as well as he can. The way will mend, and the prospect brighten, in God's good time. And in the mean while that precious promise will be fulfilled, Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as is thy day, so shall thy strength be. Deut. xxxiii. 25 If thou canst not go on, sit down: but let it be by the way-side. Wait : but let it be at Jacob's well. Ply the ordinances of God, and the God of ordinances will come to thee and bless thee. When poor Hagar, overwhelmed with distress of mind and quite exhausted with fatigue of body, threw herself on the ground unable to walk a step farther, an angel was sent to point her to a fountain which she knew not of, and to give her the oil of joy for mourning, and a garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. Godly sorrow ever was and ever will be the peculiar care and the tenderest object of Almighty love.

ago than the very last month that ever was (viz. in the month of August, 1775) actually said to a lady of quality, “Do not tell me of St. Paul, madam: it would have been happy for the Christian church, if St. Paul had never wrote a line of his Epistles.”

Travellers need not be told that the weather is not always uniformly the same. At times, the affections of a saint are warm, sublime, and strongly drawn up to God and divine things. Anon, his affections may gravitate, grow numbed and cold ; and, like an eagle that is pinioned, be scarce able to creep where once they used to fly. Yet be not cast down. You may, like Samson, be shorn of your locks for a season, but they will grow again, and your strength shall return as heretofore. Remember that comfortable frames, though extremely desirable, are not the foundation of your safety. Our best and ultimate happiness is grounded on an infinitely firmer basis than any thing in us can supply. The immutability of God, the never failing efficacy of Christ's mediatorial work, and the invariable fidelity of the Holy Ghost, are the triple rock on which thy salvation stands. Whence that of the apostle : The foundation of the Lord [i. e. the decree, or covenant of the Lord] standeth sure ; having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And again : Though we believe not [though we may occasionally reel and stagger and faint] yet he [faith's unchangeable author and immoveable supporter] abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself. Was he to deny his decree, he must deny himself : for his decree is himself decreeing. But he cannot do this. He cannot forego his covenant : for his covenant is himself covenanting. He cannot reverse his promise : for his promise is himself promising. Consequently, every believer is safe and can never be ultimately left or forsaken. As surely as effectual grace stirred thee up to undertake the heavenly journey, so surely shall glory crown thee at the end of thy pilgrimage.

Contentedly, therefore, embrace thy lot, knowing that the whole disposal thereof is of the Lord. Be the weather fair or foul, let the calm prevail, or the storm rage ; be thy mind cheerful or benighted ; be thy path dreary with gloom or radiant with sun-shine ; commit thyself in patience and well-doing to God, as to a gracious Creator and an All-wise Disposer. A traveller is not the worse for being weather-beaten. It teaches him to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. Besides, he is at the worst of times sure of invisible support ; and every difficulty he encounters by the way will be infinitely overbalanced when he gets home to his Father's house. For the utmost sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us.

In point, likewise, of affluence and fortune, all the travellers to Canaan are not alike. Some of them are literally rich, and increased in goods. While others have but a small allotment of temporal wealth, barely enough to carry them to their journey's end. The former may be said to be drawn in state to heaven : the latter to trudge it on foot.

I say some are drawn thither in state ; for every coach does not take that road. But so we at last get safe to the new Jerusalem, no matter whether we ride or walk. It will be all one by and by. As in death, so in heaven, the rich and the poor who are partakers of saving grace, will meet together, and then where will be the difference between those who came with a grand retinue, and those who travelled pilgrim-like, with a scrip at their side and a staff in their hand ?

On earth, when two persons are literally going to the same place ; and the one is either well mounted or seated in an expeditious carriage, and the other goes on foot ; the foot-passenger must needs make the slower progress of the two. But in spiritual things this case is often reversed. The humble foot passenger frequently outstrips the rapid horseman, or the stately charioteer, and is seen not seldom to make swifter advances in the knowledge of God and in the way to heaven : just as Elijah out-ran Ahab's chariot to the entrance of Jezreel. And thus that observation of the apostle is verified : Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom ? Yes, he has, and some too who are opulent ; for we read that even Cæsar's household, the very court of Nero, was not wholly destitute of saints. But since much wealth too often proves a snare, and an incumbrance to the Christian racer, let him lighten the weight, by dispersing abroad and giving to the poor : whereby he will both soften the pilgrimage of his fellow travellers, and speed his own way the faster.

A passenger to Zion, like most other passengers, must expect to meet with different kinds of company on the road ; different in some respects, though bound to the same place. I suppose that there are scarce ten persons in any civilized nation, whose religious and metaphysical ideas are in every punctilio exactly alike, any more than their faces. Examine the countenance of any man and you will see some peculiar cast, some turn of features which distinguishes that countenance from every other. Now, opinions are in some sense the features of the mind: and there will always be a diversity of mental features, during the present dispensation of things. The elect will never perfectly resemble (x) each other till they perfectly resemble Christ in glory. Hence appears not only the illiberality but also the absurdity, of being at daggers drawn with other people on account of differences merely extrinsic and circumstantial—Narrow as the way is which leadeth unto life, it is yet broad enough to admit persons of divided judgment in things indifferent. There may be several paths in one and the same road; and shall I be so weak, or so malicious, as to suppose that a professing brother is not in the way to everlasting happiness, only because he does not walk arm in arm with me, and tread in my particular track? I grant that there is but one road to heaven; namely, an interest in the atonement and righteousness of Christ; for no man cometh to the Father, but by him. I believe however, and feel myself unutterably happy in believing, that this only avenue to eternal rest admits of much greater latitude than bigots of all denominations are aware of. Let therefore the travellers to the city of God bear in mind that amiable exhortation of Joseph to his brethren, See that ye fall not out by the way.

When persons undertake a journey to a distant unknown country, it is not unusual to have recourse to a guide. During their passage to Canaan, good people may, by mutual exhortation, reproof, and instruction in righteousness, be occasionally guides to each other. But the two grand stated guides of the Redeemer's Church are the Spirit and the word of God: to which may be added in humblest subordination to these two, the ministers of God. Generally speaking, these three guides do best together. A minister without the written word, would bid fair to be a false guide, a mere will-of-the-whisp, a dancing meteor, who would only set you astray. And the word itself, without the Spirit, is but as a dial without the sun, a dead letter, and a book that is sealed. Therefore the way for us not to lose our way is to receive nothing from man but what bears the stamp of Scripture; to beg of God that he would shine upon the dial, that we may consult it profitably and know whereabout we are, i. e. that he would make us understand the Scriptures by the saving light of his blessed Spirit; and then to look upon no influence, impulse, suggestion, or direction, as the certain voice of God in the soul, except it harmonize and coincide with that sacred Scripture which himself inspired.—Thus wonderfully and wisely are the means of salvation connected! The word of God directs us to the Spirit of God; the Spirit of God makes that word effectual; and the true ministers of God act in the most absolute subserviency to both.

Nor are the Christian travellers guided only, but guarded likewise. And a guard is requisite: for the highway of holiness is infested with robbers. Though the celestial road is inclosed from the common, and made a distinct way of itself, yet it lies through an enemy's country, and the Canaanite is still in the land. Satan will study to annoy those whom he cannot devour. The world will try various arts, both of menace and allurements. And indwelling depravity, from whose remains we are never wholly delivered in the present life, will on all occasions be ready to revolt from the obedience of faith, and to bring us into subjection to the law of sin. The foes without, though vanquished, are not slain: and original corruption, that beast within, though wounded, is not dead; nor motionless, though chained.

Happy is it for God's regenerate people that they do not go through the wilderness defenceless and alone. If they did they might well fear, with David, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul. But they are under the escort of a truly invincible armada. Providence is for them without; and grace within. Though they appear as strangers and pilgrims upon earth, they are no less than kings in disguise; kings and priests unto God. His own inviolable faithfulness is their portion; and his angels, principalities, and powers, think it an honour to guard them: for those exalted beings are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister unto them that shall be heirs of salvation. Hence in that grand writ of protection recorded in the 91st Psalm, we read, He shall give his angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways: they shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou hurt thy foot against a stone. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder, the young lion and the dragon shalt thou tread under thy feet. The gates of hell may assault, but they shall not prevail. They

(x) This puts me in mind of a candid and judicious remark made by a valuable Christian brother of a different denomination from myself, in a letter with which he favoured me some years since. "I have seen a field here, and another there, stand thick with corn. A hedge or two has parted them. At the proper season the reapers entered. Soon the earth was disburdened, and the grain was conveyed to its destined place: where, blended together in the barn or in the stack, it could not be known that a hedge once separated this corn from that. Thus it is with the Church. Here it grows as it were in different fields; severed it may be by various hedges. By-and-by, when the harvest is come, all God's wheat shall be gathered into the garner without one single mark to distinguish that once they differed in the outward circumstantial of modes and forms."—To these truly evangelical and truly benevolent sentiments, I deem it my honour and happiness to subscribe, with hand and heart.

may endeavour to intercept the believer on his passage to Canaan; but God, who put it into his heart to go, will be his guardian even unto death.

There is no convenient travelling without proper accommodations and a competent supply of provision. Deprived of these, the healthiest would become languid, and the most robust would faint by the way. For this reason, the God of all kindness has, figuratively speaking, furnished the road to his kingdom with houses of rest and refreshment, where his redeemed may occasionally turn in and renew their strength. The good things of his Providence may be considered as the temporal accommodations vouchsafed by his bounty for the comfort and support of our mortal part: and the stated means of grace are the spiritual accommodations designed to quicken, strengthen, and sustain the soul unto life eternal. When outward ordinances are made effectual to this end through the Holy Spirit's influence, of which they are the ordinary channel, then is it that God's travellers can pursue their way rejoicing, and sing as they go, The King of Sion has brought me into his banqueting-house, and his banner over me was love. In secret prayer, in public worship, in reading the Scriptures, in sitting under the word preached, and in compassing the altar of the Lord; his saints catch some delightful glimpses of their heavenly Father's countenance, and lay up a stock of experiences and consolations for faith to feed upon afterwards, and in the strength of which they travel many days. Summer-experiences, viewed in the retrospective, are what the soul can sometimes reflect on with comfort during the cold and darkness of wintry deserts: just as the pot of manna reserved in the ark reminded Israel of the months and years that were passed: and remained as a token for good, long after God had ceased to rain on his people the bread of heaven, and to feed them with angels' food.

Nor does his goodness only spread a table for us in the wilderness, by the bounties of his providence, and by the consolations of his presence. He even deigns, perhaps at times, to soften the toils of our warfare, and to sweeten the fatigues of our journey, by shewing us, as in perspective, the city to which we are hastening; and by giving us, in the full assurance of faith, a taste of Canaan's grapes on our way to Canaan's land. Faith is the mount, and gospel-promises and gospel-ordinances are the pleasant windows whence (like Moses from the top of Pisgah) we survey that good land which is afar off. The nearer we approach to heaven, the clearer, frequently, are our views of it.

*Divinely fair and full in sight,
The shining turrets rise!*

I mean, if and when the light of God's spirit shines upon faith's eye and illuminates the gospel windows. For the keenest human eye can discern no object, and the most transparent windows in the world can transmit no prospect, if light be totally excluded.

Sin, temptation, weakness of faith, or sense of guilt, may sometimes spread a mist between a child of God and his view of glory. But there are also intervals of assurance, seasons of holy rejoicing, when faith is high on the wing, when hope trims her lamp, and when seraphic love (like the ascending Tishbite's fiery chariot) wraps the elevated soul to heaven. The happy traveller emerges from the dark, deep, narrow lanes, where his feet were embarrassed with mire, and where the boughs met over his head, and all prospect of the adjoining country was shut out. He mounts the hill. The sky brightens, and the prospect widens. All is light, and cheerfulness, and joy. During these golden moments this is the triumphant song: God is my Father. Christ is my righteousness. The Spirit is my sanctifier. The Messiah loved me, and gave himself for me. He died for my sins: he rose again for my justification: and because he lives, I shall live also."

Under such comfortable anticipations of the glory that shall be revealed, when faith pierces within the veil, whither Jesus our fore-runner is gone before, the believer cries out, "O how amiable is even this distant prospect of thy dwelling, thou Lord of hosts!" Or in the language of the spies of old, We have seen the land; and, behold, it is very good. When shall we drop these mortal bodies? when shall we get through the desert? when shall we go up and take possession? when shall we receive the end of our faith, even the full salvation of our souls? How long, O Lord, holy and true! why tarry the wheels of thy chariot? Make haste, my Beloved, to fetch me away; and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart on the mountain of spices!

Fear not, thou that longest to be at home. A few steps more, and thou art there. Soon, O believer, it will be said to thee, as it was to her in the gospel, The master is come and calleth for thee. When that word is pronounced, when you are got to the boundary of your race below, and stand on the verge of heaven and the confines of immortality; then there will be nothing but the short valley of death between you and the promised land: the labours of your pilgrimage will then be on the point of conclusion, and you will have nothing to do but to entreat God, as Moses did, I pray thee let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain and Lebanon. Or with David: O send out thy light and truth, that they may lead me, and bring me to thy holy hill, and to thy dwelling-place!

Dread not the interjacent valley; it is but the shadow of death; and what is there in a shadow to be afraid of? Dark as it may seem, it will brighten as you enter; and the farther you go, the brighter will it prove. When soul and body, like two bosom-friends who have travelled long and far together, come to the parting-place, where (like Abraham and Lot) they separate, and each goes a different way, one to the grave, and the other to heaven; when death, your last enemy, is subdued (for he is not destroyed entirely until the morning of the resurrection dawn); when you have got to the extremity of the vale, and have actually breathed your last; you will find your equipage waiting for you on the other side, to take you from the body and to set you down at the throne of God. Angels of light, those chariots and horses of fire, attend on every expiring saint; and not only as guides, shew his disembodied spirit the way to heaven, but likewise guard him during the passage: and it is probable, act as vehicles to convey him thither; just as Lazarus was (y) carried by angels into Abraham's bosom.

Having thus traced the Christian in his spiritual journey, from nature to grace, and from grace to glory; let me, for the present, leave him there: and address myself to those who, as well as myself, are still detained in the wilderness, and whose tour is not yet finished.

The readers of this address, and indeed the whole world at large, may be distributed into two kinds of people; of those who are travelling to Canaan, and of those who are going the direct contrary way. There are but two roads: the broad, which leadeth to destruction; and the narrow, which opens into life. Travellers all mankind are; and travellers at a very swift rate. The grand point is, Where art thou travelling to?

Are you desirous of knowing whither thy footsteps tend; and toward what country thy face is set? Consult the way-marks. Look at the directing posts. Have recourse to the Scriptures of truth. But study them on your knees, i. e. in a spirit of prayer, and with the simplicity of a little child.

Suppose, for instance, we consult John xvi. 8? where Christ thus describes the office of the Holy Ghost, and the effects which his converting influence has on the human mind. "When he is come," when the blessed Spirit visits and renews the chosen and redeemed world, "He shall convince the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment."

i. e. He shall (first) feelingly demonstrate to them their absolute sinnership, and their total helplessness; working in them a deep sense and real hatred of self and sin: he shall (secondly) lead them to rest on Christ, and on his righteousness, alone for justification; and he shall (thirdly) spiritualize their desires, refine their tempers, sanctify their lives, and make them ready to every good word and work.

Now, has God the Spirit done these things for you? Has he wrought, or begun to work this three-fold conviction in your soul? If he has not, nor so much as kindled a groaning desire of it in your breast, I dare not give you the right hand of fellowship. I dare not salute you as one of my fellow-travellers to the kingdom of God. No. You are yet in Egypt. And you will quickly be in hell, except the Holy Ghost take you by the hand, and take you by the heart, and lead you in Christ to Zion.

But, if you have ground to hope that this work of grace is experienced by you in some degree; if, on looking at your soul in the gospel-glass, you can discern the traces of faith, love, repentance, and sanctification there; you are in the number of them who have set forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan you shall come. Two things are particularly needful for you to observe: 1. That the world will endeavour to turn your feet out of the narrow way. If the wicked are so muzzled by Providence, that they cannot bite; they will snarl at least. If they cannot do you real injury, they will probably pelt you with scandal, and sneer at you for being, in their opinion, righteous overmuch. But let not this discourage you. Regard it no more than a traveller would mind a little dust upon his shoes. Imitate the blind man in the gospel: who the more he was exhorted by the multitude to hold his peace, cried out so much the more, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me. 2. Beware of sin. Shun the remotest appearance of evil. Think it not enough to be for the main in the right way; but endeavour to walk steadily and erectly in that way. Though a truly converted person cannot fall, so as to turn back finally, and perish everlastingly; yet, without due attention, and watching unto prayer, he may kill his peace and joy in believing, and forfeit that inward testimony of the Holy Spirit, that felt fellowship with God, and that sweet tranquillity of conscience, without which living scarcely deserves the name of life. It is a sad thing when a saint is overturned on the road, by being off his guard.

i. e. He [viz. his soul] was carried away, or borne off by angels (Luke xvi. 22.) Thus, as in life, so at death, does every one of God's elect experience the utmost accomplishment of that promise; He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands shall they bear thee: acting as thy invisible shields on earth; and, at last, as thy chariots and retinue, which shall convey thee to heaven. Such honour have all the saints! Hallelujah.

Though he cannot lose his soul, yet a fall may break the neck of his comforts, dislocate his frame, and make him go halting to his journey's end. "The devil," as one justly remarks, "is never better pleased than when he can roll a child of God in the dirt." Beg the Lord, therefore, to hold up your goings in his paths, that your footsteps slip not. Be it the language of your heart, and of your conduct, I have put off my immoral coat; how then shall I again put it on? I have washed my feet; and almighty grace forbid that I should any more defile them.

Yet, if you fall, be humbled; but do not despair. Pray afresh to God, who is able to raise you up, and to set you on your feet again. Look to the blood of the covenant; and say to the Lord from the depth of your heart,

Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee!
Foul, I to the fountain fly,
Wash me, Saviour, or I die

Make those words of the apostle your motto: "Perplexed, but not in despair; cast down, but not destroyed." It has been justly observed that "it is one thing to fall into the mire, another thing to lie in it." Away to the cross of Christ, and to the Spirit of God, for cleansing and for healing. Your Covenant Father will then sprinkle you from an evil conscience, and make you recover the time and the ground you have lost. And, when thus graciously restored, look upon sin as the bitterest calamity that can befall you: and consider those who would entice you to it, or be your partners in it, as the very worst enemies you have.

Soon shall we arrive where not only sin, but every temptation to it, and every propensity toward it, will cease for ever. As a good man once said on his death-bed, "Hold out, faith and patience! yet a little while, and I shall need you no longer."—When faith and patience have done and suffered their appointed work, the disciples of Christ shall ascend from the wilderness to paradise. With joy and gladness shall they be brought, and shall enter into the king's palace: singing, as they mount, "Lift up your heads, ye celestial gates! and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, that the heirs of glory may enter in. We are they, some of whom came out of great tribulation: but all of whom have washed our robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Stirred up by his effectual grace, we went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and, clothed with his righteousness and preserved by his power, into the land of Canaan we are come." Even so. Amen.

A SHORT ESSAY ON ORIGINAL SIN.

By one man's Disobedience many were made sinners.—Rom. v. 19.

SELF-knowledge is a science to which most persons pretend; but, like the philosopher's stone, it is a secret which none are masters of in its full extent. The mystic writers suppose that before the fall, man's body was transparent, analogous to a system of animated chrystal. Be this as it may, we are sure that, was the mind now to inhabit a pellucid body, so pellucid as to make manifest all the thoughts and all the evil workings of the holiest heart on earth, the sight would shock and frighten and astonish even the most profligate sinner on this side hell. Every man would be an insupportable burden to himself, and a stalking horror to the rest of his species. For which reasons among others,

*Heaven's Sovereign saves all beings but himself
That hideous sight, a naked human heart.*

The most enlightened believer in the world knows not the utmost of his natural depravation, nor is able to fathom that inward abyss of iniquity which is perpetually throwing up mire and dirt; and which, like a spring of poison at the bottom of a well, infects and discolours the whole mass. Let the light of Scripture and of grace give us ever such humbling views of ourselves, and lead us ever so far into the chambers of imagery within, there still are more and greater abominations beyond: and, somewhat like the ages of eternity, the farther we advance the more there is to come.

The heart of man, says God by the prophet, is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked: who can know it?—In me, said the apostle, that is, in my flesh, abstracted from supernatural grace, dwelleth no good thing.—And, says a greater than both, From within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness: all these evil things come from within, and defile the man (Mark vii). Is it possible that any who calls himself a Christian can, after considering the above declaration of Christ, dare to term the human mind a sheet of white paper? No: it is naturally a sheet of paper blotted and blurred throughout. So blotted and defiled all over, that nothing but the inestimable blood of God, and the invincible Spirit of grace, can make it clean and white.

Neither the temptations of Satan by which we are exercised, nor the bad examples of others which we are so prone to imitate, are the causes of this spiritual and moral leprosy. They are but the occasions of stirring up and of calling forth the latent corruptions within. If (as David speaks) our inward parts were not very wickedness, if we were not shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin, if enmity to God and holiness was not moulded into our very frame and texture; temptation and bad example would bid fair to excite out abhorrence, instead of engaging our compliance, conciliating our imitation, and operating with such general success. The truth is, we all have an inherent bias to bad, which readily falls in with the instigations that present themselves from without. Similis similem sibi querit. Inward and exterior evil catch at each other by a sort of sympathy, resulting from a sameness of affection, nature and relationship. It is the degenerate tinder in the heart which takes fire from the sparks of temptation. Hold a match to snow, and no inflammation will ensue. But apply the match to gunpowder, and the whole train is in a blaze.

How must such a heart appear if exposed to the intuitive view of an observing angel! And, above all, how black must it appear in the eyes of immense and uncreated purity, of the God who is glorious in holiness, and compared with whom the very heavens are not clean! Judge of the infinite malignity of sin by the price which was paid to redeem us from it, and by the power which is exerted in converting us from the dominion of it. For the former, no less than the incarnation and death of God's own Son could avail. For the latter, no less agency than that of God's own Spirit can suffice.

The hints already premised give us (as far as they go) the true moral picture of a fallen soul: and such would all the descendants of Adam appear in their own eyes, and feel themselves to be, did they, by the light of the Holy Spirit, see themselves in the pure unflattering glass of God's most perfect law.

This likewise is the view in which the Church of England represents the state of man by nature. "Man, of his own nature, is fleshly and carnal, corrupt and naught, sinful and disobedient to God! without any spark of goodness in him, without any virtuous or godly motion, only given to evil thoughts and wicked deeds. As for the marks of the Spirit, the fruits of faith, charitable and godly motions, if he have any at all in him, they proceed only of the Holy Ghost, who is the only worker of our sanctification, and maketh us new men in Christ Jesus (2)."

Strong as this painting is, it is no caricature. Not a single feature of our natural corruption is exaggerated or over-charged. You who read, and I who write; yea, every individual of mankind that now lives or shall hereafter be born; may with the Church of old plead guilty to the whole indictment, saying, We are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.

I have read of an English painter who after only once meeting any stranger in the streets, could go home and paint that person's picture to the life. Let us suppose that one whose likeness has been taken in this manner should happen to see unexpectedly his own picture. It would startle him. The exact similitude of shape, air, features, and complexion would convince him that the representation was designed for himself though, his own name be not affixed to it, and he is conscious that he never sat for the piece. In the Scriptures of truth we have a striking delineation of human depravity through original sin. Though we have not sat to the inspired painters, the likeness suits us all. When the Spirit of God holds up the mirror and shews us to ourselves, we see, we feel, we deplore, our apostasy from, and our inability to recover the image of, his rectitude. Experience proves the horrid likeness true; and we need no arguments to convince us that in and of ourselves we are spiritually wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind and naked.

But how came man into a state so different from that in which Adam was created? Few enquiries are so important; and no subject has given occasion to more various and extensive disquisition. Multitudes of conjectures have been advanced, and volumes upon volumes have been written concerning the origin of human ill.

That moral evil, in almost every possible branch of it; and that natural evil, as the consequence of moral; do actually abound all over the world, are truths too evident to be denied. That the matter of fact is so will not admit of a moment's dispute. But concerning the primary cause and inlet of these evils, men are not so unanimously agreed.

Some of the more considerable and judicious philosophers of heathen antiquity, particularly the oriental ones (from whom the opinion was learned and adopted by Plato), supposed that the spirits which occupy and animate human bodies were a sort of fallen angels who, having been originally spirits of very superior rank, were, for misbehaviour in a nobler state of pre-existence, deposed from their thrones, degraded into human souls, and shut up in mortal bodies. Of course those philosophers considered this earth as a place of banishment, and bodies as a kind of moving dungeon, where souls wander about like prisoners at large, obnoxious to a vast variety of pains and inconveniences; by way of penance for past misdemeanors, and as a means of gradual purification, prelusive to their eventual restitution to the happiness from which they had fallen.

Conformably to this view of things, Plato chose to derive σῶμα, the Greek word for body; from σημα, which signifies a tomb or sepulchre: on supposition that the body is that to a soul which a grave is to the body ; and that souls emerge from the body by death as a bird flies from a broken cage, or as a captive escapes from a place of painful and dishonourable confinement.

Not a few of the eastern sages pursued the idea of the pre-existence of souls to such a length as to suppose that the immaterial principles, which undoubtedly actuate the bodies of animalculæ, of insects, and of brutes, are no other than fallen spirits, reduced to a class of extreme degradation : that, in proportion to the crimes committed in their unembodied state, they were thrust into material vehicles of greater or of less dignity : and that, passing through a successive series of transmigrations from a meaner body to a nobler, they rise, by continual progression, from animalculæ to insects, from insects to birds or beasts, and from these to men ; till at last they recover the full grandeur and felicity of their primitive condition. All these supposed changes and removals from a humbler body to a higher were considered, by the philosophers who adopted this hypothesis, as so many stages both of punishment and of purgation ; by which, as by steps rising one above another, the imprisoned spirit grew more and more refined, its powers widened into greater expansion, and itself approached nearer to its original and its final perfection.

I must own that this was a train of conjectures extremely ingenious, and not a little plausible, when viewed as formed by persons who had not the light of the Bible to see by. And I believe that, for my own part, I should have fallen in with this system, as the least improbable, and the least embarrassed, of any other, had not the gracious providence of God assigned my birth and residence in a country where the Scriptures of inspiration kindly hold the lamp to benighted reason.

St. Paul, within the compass of two or three lines, comprises more than all the numberless uninspired volumes which have been written on the subject. By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin : and so [ἕως, in this way, or by this chain of mediums] death (διηλθεν) went through upon all men ; inasmuch as all have sinned. Rom. v. 12.

It is evident, hence, that previously to the first offence of that one man, who was the father of the human race, he was sinless, and, of course, happy and deathless. —Let us for a moment carry back our meditations to the garden of Eden, and endeavour to take a view of Adam prior to his fall.

The sacred oracles acquaint us that the first man was created spiritually and morally upright ; nay, that he was made after the image of God ; and was (in some respects, and with due allowance for the necessary imperfection inseparable from a creature) the living transcript of him that formed Him.

This phrase, the image of God, is to be understood chiefly in a spiritual, and entirely in a figurative, sense. It does not refer to the beauty and to the erect stature of the body ; but to the holy and sublime qualifications of the soul. The grand outlines therefore of that divine resemblance, in which Adam was constructed, were holiness, knowledge, dominion, happiness, and immortality.

But man, being thus made in honour, abode not as he was made. For reasons best known to that unerring Providence which ordains and directs every event, it was the Divine pleasure to permit an apostate spirit (whose creation and fall were prior to the formation of man) to present the poisonous cup of temptation : whereof our first parents tasted, and, in tasting, fell.

Whether any of the dismal effects which instantly ensued were partly owing to some physical quality in the fruit itself ; or whether all the effects which followed were simply annexed to that act of disobedience by the immediate will and power of God ; were an enquiry more curious perhaps than important.

So also is another question : which relates to the particular kind of fruit borne by the forbidden tree. Whether it was a pomegranate or a cluster of grapes ; an apple or a citron, Scripture has not revealed, nor are we concerned to know.

This only we are sure of, from Scripture, reason, observation, and our own experience ; that mankind, from that day forward, universally lost the perfection of God's image, that ἕια φύσις, and ὁμοιωσις τῷ Θεῷ, or divine nature, and likeness to God, as Plato calls it : and sunk into, what the same philosopher styles, το ἀθεον, a state ungodlike, and undivine. Our purity vanished. Our knowledge suffered an almost total eclipse. Our dominion was abridged into very narrow bounds : for no sooner did man revolt from his obedience to God than a vast part of the animal creation revolted from its obedience to man. Our happiness was exchanged for a complication of infirmities and miseries. And our immortality was cut short by one-half : a moiety of us (i. e. the body) being sentenced to return for a time to the dust whence it sprang. The immortality of the soul seems to be the only feature of the divine likeness which the fall has left entire.

Hence, even from Adam's transgression, proceeds that αραξία, or disorder and irregularity, both of being and events, diffused through the whole world. Hence it is that the earth brings forth weeds and poisonous vegetables. That the seasons are variable.

That the air is fraught with diseases. And that the very food we eat administers to our future dissolution, even at the time of its contributing to our present sustenance.

Hence, also, proceed the pains and the eventual death of inferior animals. All sub-lunary nature partakes of that curse which was inflicted for the sin of man. Whether these ranks of innocent beings, which are involved in the consequences of human guilt shall, at the times of the restitution of all things (a) be restored to a life of happiness and immortality, (which they seem to have enjoyed in paradise before the fall, and of which they became deprived by a transgression not their own); rests with the wisdom and goodness of that God whose mercy is over all his works. It is my own private opinion (and as such only I advance it), that Scripture seems, in more places than one, to warrant the supposition. Particularly, Rom. viii. 19—21, which I would thus render and thus punctuate: The earnestly wishful expectancy of the creation, i. e. of the brute creation; that implicit thirst after happiness, wrought and kneaded into the very being of every creature endued with sensitive life; virtually waits with vehement desire, for that appointed, glorious manifestation of the sons of God which is to take place in the millenary state: for the creation, the lower animal creation, was subjected to (b) uneasiness, not willing it, or through any voluntary transgression committed by themselves; but by reason or on account of (c) him who subjected them to pain and death, in hope, and with a view, that this very creation shall likewise be emancipated from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. What a field of pleasing and exalted speculation does this open to the benevolent and philosophic mind!

But I return to what more immediately concerns ourselves.

When Adam fell, he fell not only as a private individual, but also as a public person: just as the second Adam, Jesus Christ the righteous, did afterward, in the fulness of time, obey and die, as the covenant Surety and representative of all his elect people.

The first Adam acted in our names, and stood in our stead, and represented our persons, in the covenant of works. And, since his posterity would have partaken of all the benefits resulting from his continuance in the state of integrity; I see not the injustice of their bearing a part in the calamities consequent on his apostacy. We cannot but observe in the common and daily course of things, that children very frequently inherit the diseases, the defects, the poverty and the losses of their parents. And if this be not unjust in the dispensations of Providence (for if it was unjust, God would certainly order matters otherwise); why should it be deemed inequitable that moral as well as natural evil, that the cause as well as the effects, should be transmitted, by a sad but uninterrupted succession, from father to son?

Many of the truths revealed in Scripture require some intension of thought, some labour of investigation to apprehend them clearly, and to understand them rightly. But the natural depravation of mankind is a fact which we have proofs of every hour, and which stares us in the face, let us look which way we will.

Indeed we need not look around us for demonstration that our whole species has lost the image of God. If the Holy Spirit have at all enlightened us into a view of our real state, we need but look within ourselves for abundant proof that our nature must have been morally poisoned in its source; that our first parent sinned; and that we, with the rest of his sons, are sharers in his fall. So that, as good bishop Beveridge observes (in his commentary on the ninth of our Church Articles), "Though there be no such words as original sin to be found in Scripture, yet we have all too sad experience that there is such a thing as original sin to be found in our hearts."

Heathens themselves have felt and acknowledged that they were depraved beings; and depraved, not by imitation only, but by nature; or (as the Church of England well expresses it) by "birth-sin."—Hence that celebrated saying, so usual among the Greek philosophers, Συμφυτον ανθρωποις το αμαρτανειν, i. e. moral evil is implanted in men from the first moment of their existence. Plato goes still farther in his treatise "De Legibus:" and directly affirms that man, if not well and carefully cultivated, is ζωον αγρωστατον οπωςα φνει γη, the wildest and most savage of all animals. Aristotle asserts the same truth, and almost in the same words with Plato. The very poets asserted the doctrine of human corruption. So Propertius: Unicuique dedit vitium natura creato; i. e. "Nature has infused vice into every created being." And Horace observes, "that youth is cereus in vitium flecti;" or, "admits the impressions of evil, with all the ease and readiness of yielding wax."—And

(a) Acts iii. 21.

(b) So the word, ματαιοτης, here used by the apostle, may fairly, and without any straining, be rendered.—Πονητορ ματαιοις, substantive "pro γη, molestia. Προ, γη, vastator, vastitas, vastatio. Προ-ταιοτης pro γη, Αερυμνα." Mintert's Lexic. in voc.

(c) By him who subjected the brutal world to miseries, unprocured by any sin of their own; may be understood Adam himself: or rather, the most high God, whose will it was that the welfare, not only of mankind, but also of every thing that lives should be suspended on Adam's obedience.

why? Let the same poet inform us. Nemo vitis sine nascitur: "The seeds of vice are innate in every man."

Whence proceed errors in judgment and immoralities in practice? Evil tempers, evil desires, and evil words? Why is the real gospel preached by so few ministers, and opposed by so many people? Wherefore is it that the virtues have so generally took their flight? that — Fugere pudor, verumque, fidesque;

In quorum subiere locum fraudesque, dolique,
Insidiæque, et vis, et amor sceleratus habendi?

Original sin answers all these questions in a moment. Adam's offence was the peccatum peccans (as I think St. Austin nervously calls it), the sin that still goes on sinning in all mankind: or, to use the just and emphatic words of Calvin (Institut. l. iv. c. 15.) Hæc perversitas nunquam in nobis cessat, sed novos assiduè fructus parit; non secus atque incensa fornax flammam et scintillas perpetuo efflat, aut scaturigo aquam sine fine egerit: "The corruption of our nature is always operative, and constantly teeming with unholy fruits: like a heated furnace which is perpetually blazing out; or like an inexhaustible spring of water, which is for ever bubbling up and sending forth its rills."

So terrible a calamity as the universal infection of our whole species is and must have been the consequence of some grand and primary transgression. Such a capital punishment would never have been inflicted on the human race, by the God of infinite Justice, but for some adequate preceding offence. It is undeniably certain that we who are now living are in actual possession of an evil nature; which nature we brought with us into the world; it is not of our own acquiring, but was

"Cast and mingled with our very frame; Grew with our growth, and strengthened with our strength."

We were, therefore, in a state of severe moral punishment as soon as we began to be. And yet it was impossible for us to have sinned, in our own persons, antecedently to our actual existence.

This reflection leads up our enquiry to that doctrine which alone can solve the (otherwise insuperable) difficulty now started, viz. to that doctrine which asserts the imputation of Adam's disobedience to all his offspring. And which is, I. founded on Scripture evidence; and II. adopted by the Church of England; and III. not contrary to human reason. I will just touch on these three particulars.

I. God's word expressly declares that By the disobedience of one man many were constituted sinners; Rom. v. 19. They are in the divine estimation considered as guilty of Adam's own personal breach of the prohibitory command. Now the judgment of God is always according to truth. He would not deem us guilty unless we were so. And guilty of our first parent's offence we cannot be, but in a way of imputation.

By the offence of one [ἑνός παραπτώματος, by one transgression], judgment came upon all men, unto condemnation; Rom. v. 18. which could not be unless that one transgression was placed to our account.

By one man, sin entered into the world, and death by sin: and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. Rom. v. 12. Yea, death reigned, and still continues to reign, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression: v. 14. Infants are here designed by the apostle: who have not sinned actually and in their own persons as Adam did, and yet are liable to temporal death. Wherefore, then, do they die? Is not death the wages of sin? Most certainly. And seeing it is incontestibly clear that not any individual among the numberless millions who have died in infancy was capable of committing actual sin; it follows that they sinned representatively and implicitly in Adam. Else they would not be entitled to that death which is the wages of sin, and to those diseases by which their death is occasioned, and to that pain which most of them experience in dying. A majority of the human race are supposed to die under the age of seven years. A phenomenon, which we should never see, under the administration of a just and gracious God, if the young persons so dying had not been virtually comprehended in the person of Adam when he fell, and if the guilt of his fall was not imputed to them. Nothing but the imputation of that can ever be able to account for the death of infants, any more than for the vitiosity, the manifold sufferings, the imperfections, and the death of men.

II. This is the doctrine of the Church of England. "We were cast into miserable captivity by breaking of God's commandment in our first parent Adam." (Second Homily on the Misery of Man.)

"Original sin is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man." (Article IX.) The corruption, or defilement, is our's by inherency: we ourselves are the seat of it. But original sin can be our fault only by imputation, and in no other possible way.

"Dearly beloved, ye have prayed that our Lord Jesus Christ would vouchsafe to release [this child] of his sins." (Baptismal office). In the estimation, therefore, of our Church, every infant is not only chargeable with sin in the singular number; but with sins in the plural. To wit, with intrinsic defilement as the subject of an unholy nature: and with the imputed guilt of the first man's apostasy from God.

III. There is nothing contrary in all this to human reason, and to the usual practice of men.

There is not a single nobleman, or person of property, who does not act, or who has not acted, as the covenant-head of his posterity; supposing him to have any.

Even a lease of lives signed by a legal freeholder; and sometimes the total alienation of an estate for ever, are binding on (perhaps the unborn) heirs and successors of the person who grants the lease, or signs away the property.

A person of quality commits high treason. For this, he not only forfeits his own life, but also his blood (i. e. his family) is tainted in law, and all his titles and possessions are forfeited from his descendants. His children and their children to the end of the chapter lose their peerage and lose their lands, though the father only was (we will suppose) in fault.

Thus the honours and estates of all the heirs in England are suspended on the single loyalty of each present possessor respectively!

Where, then, is the unreasonableness of the imputation of Adam's crime? Why might not the welfare and the rectitude of all his posterity be suspended on the single thread of his integrity? And what becomes of the empty cavils that are let off against those portions of holy writ which assure us that in Adam all die?

But wherein did Adam's primary sin consist? Of what nature was that offence, which "Brought death into the world, and all our woe?"

The scholastic writers, whose distinctions are frequently much too subtle, and sometimes quite insignificant, seem to have hit the mark of this enquiry with singular skill and exactness.

They very properly distinguish original sin, into what they call peccatum originans, and peccatum originatum.

By peccatum originans they mean the ipsissimum, or the very act itself, of Adam's offence in tasting the forbidden fruit.

By peccatum originatum they mean that act considered as transmitted to us. Which transmission includes its imputation to us, in point of guilt; and that internal hereditary pollution which has vitiated every faculty of man from that moment to this. With regard to the latter, a very slight acquaintance with ourselves must convince us that we have it. And as for the former [viz. the article of imputation], it could not have taken place, if Adam had not sustained our persons, and stood or fallen as our legal representative.

Consider original sin as resident in us, and it is very justly defined by our Church to be that corrupt bias, "whereby man is very far gone [quàm longissimè distet, is removed to the greatest distance possible] from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit." (Art. IX). Upon which definition the life of every man is, more or less, a practical comment.

But, Honos erit huic quoque pomò. Many, and of the utmost importance, are the consequences deducible from this great Scripture doctrine. I shall briefly point out a few.

1. We learn hence that which the antient heathens in vain attempted to discover; viz. the door by which natural evil (as sickness, afflictions, sorrow, pain, death) entered into the world: namely the sin of Adam. Though the reasons why God permitted Adam to sin are as deeply in the dark as ever; what we do know of God entitles him surely to this small tribute at our hands, viz. that we repose our faith, with an absolute, an implicit, and an unlimited acquiescence, on his unerring wisdom and will: safely confident that what such a Being ordains and permits, is and must be right; however incapable we may find ourselves, at present, to discern and comprehend the full propriety of his moral government.

2. Hence, too, we learn the infinite freeness, and the unspeakable preciousness, of his electing love. Why were any chosen, when all might justly have been passed by? Because he was resolved, for his own name's sake, to make known the riches of his glory, i. e. of his glorious grace, on the vessels of mercy, whom he therefore prepared unto glory.

3. Let this, O believer, humble you under the mighty hand of God: and convince you, with deeper impression than if ten thousand angels were to preach it from heaven, that election is not of works, but of him that calleth. Not your merit, but his unmerited mercy, mercy irrespective of either your good works or your bad ones, induced him to write your name in the Lamb's book of life.

4. So totally are we fallen by nature, that we cannot contribute any thing towards our recovery. Hence it was God's own arm which brought salvation. It is he that makes us his people, and the sheep of his pasture; not we ourselves. The Church says truly, when she declares that "We are by nature the children of God's wrath: but we are not able to make ourselves the children and inheritors of God's glory. We are sheep that run astray, but we cannot of our own power come again to the sheep-fold.—We have neither faith, charity, hope, patience, nor any thing else that good is, but of God. These virtues be the fruits of the Holy Ghost, and not the fruits of man.—We cannot think a good thought of ourselves: much less can we say well, or do well of ourselves." (Hom. on the misery of man). We are, in short, what the Scripture affirms us to be, naturally dead in trespasses and sins : and no dead man can make himself to differ from another. Conversion is a new birth, a resurrection, a new creation. What infant ever begat himself? What inanimate carcase ever quickened and raised itself? What creature ever created itself?

Boast not then of your freewill : for it is like what the prophet saith of Nineveh, empty, and void, and waste. They that feel not this, resemble delirious persons in a high fever : who imagine that nothing ails them, while in fact they are at the very gates of death. Nay, mankind in their native state are more than at the gates of death. The traveller, in the parable, who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among robbers, is said to have been left half-dead : but the degenerate sons of Adam are, spiritually speaking, stark-dead to God. An un-renewed man has not one spiritual sense left : no hearing of the promises ; no sight of his own misery, nor of God's holiness, nor of the perfect purity of the law, nor of Christ as an absolute Saviour, nor of the blessed Spirit as the revealer of Christ in the heart ; no taste of the Father's everlasting love, nor of communion with him through the ministration of the Holy Ghost ; no feeling of grace in a way of conviction, comfort, and sanctification ; no hungerings and thirstings after spiritual enjoyments and sweet assurances ; no motive tendencies, no outgoings of soul after the blood, righteousness, and intercession of Jesus Christ. If we experience these, they are indications of spiritual life : and we may take those reviving words to ourselves, Flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven.

5. Beg the Lord to shew you the depth of your fall. Free grace, finished salvation, imputed righteousness, atoning blood, unchangeable mercy, and the whole chain of evangelical blessings, will then be infinitely precious to your heart.

6. Prize the covenant of redemption, which is a better covenant and founded upon better promises than that which Adam broke. The covenant of works said "Do, and live : sin, and die." The covenant of grace says, "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more." The covenant of works insisted on a perfection of personal obedience : the covenant of grace provided and accepts the perfect atonement and righteousness of Christ as ours.

This shews both the folly and wickedness of depending on our own works for salvation. Which soul-destroying delusion is founded on ignorance that the covenant of works was broken and annulled the very moment Adam fell. I mean annulled, as to any possibility of salvation by it : else it is still in full force as the ministration of condemnation and death to every soul that finally clings to it for pardon and eternal life. Man, unfallen, might have been saved by works. But there is no deliverance for fallen man, except by the free grace of the Father, and the imputed righteousness of a sacrificed Redeemer.—Therefore,

7. Let the sense of our original depravation, of our continued vileness, and the impossibility of our being saved in a legal way, induce us to prize the blood, obedience, and intercession of Jesus, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven. This is the inference drawn by the apostle himself from the doctrine I have been asserting. Therefore, says he, as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men [even upon all the elect themselves] unto condemnation ; so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men [upon all the elect, believing world] unto justification of life : for as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners ; so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. Rom. v. 18, 19.—And elsewhere St. Paul reasons in the same manner: All i. e. all God's elect, no less than others] have sinned and come short of the glory of God. What is the consequence? It is immediately added, being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. Rom. iii. 23, 24.

8. Hence likewise appear the necessity and value of effectual calling. Why does our Lord say, that except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God? Because we are totally sinful and corrupt by nature : as unfit for, and as incapable of, enjoying the glories of the celestial world, as a beetle is of being elevated to the dignity and office of a first minister of state.

9. Since such is the natural condition of man with regard to spiritual things ; take heed that you do not look upon election, justification, redemption, and regeneration, as mere technical terms, belonging to divinity as a system, or science. They are infinitely more. These and such-like terms are expressive of the greatest and most important realities : without the experience of which, we are condemned, ruined, lost.

10. The doctrine of original sin is the basis of the millennium. The earth, which is disordered and put out of course through the offence of man, will be restored to its primitive beauty, purity, and regularity, when Jesus shall descend to reign in person with his saints. 2 Pet. iii. 13.

11. Original sin accounts for the remaining imperfections, too visible in them that are born of God. The brightest saints below ever had, and ever will have, their darksides. Abraham, Noah, Job, David, Hezekiah, Jeremiah, Paul, Peter, John, were sanctified but in part. On earth, God's converted people are each a compound of light and shades. In glory we shall be all light, without any mixture of shade whatever.

12. Since the earth and its inhabitants are degenerated from their original state, let not believers be afraid to die.

"Death has no pang, but what frail life imparts; Nor life true joy, but what kind death improves."

By quitting its mortal cage, the heaven-born soul is delivered from all its sins and cares and pains; and kindles into perfection of holiness and majesty and joy. At the appointed time the body too will partake of complete redemption; and be delivered, totally and eternally delivered into the glorious liberty and dignity of the children of God.—Accomplish, Lord, the number of thine elect, and hasten thy kingdom!

AN ESSAY ON THE VARIOUS FEARS TO WHICH GOD'S PEOPLE ARE LIABLE.

"Within were fears." 2 Cor. vii. v.

FEAR is, properly speaking, that uneasiness of mind which arises from the apprehension of some impending evil.

Spiritually taken, fear, as it respects God for it's object, is of two kinds; legal and evangelical; i. e. law-fear, and gospel-fear.

Legal fear is a horror occasioned by the mere expectation of punishment, without any mixture of love to the punisher. Such is the fear of the apostate angels; and such the fear which agitates reprobate souls, when conscience is let loose, and when the thunderings and lightnings of God's fiery law set themselves in array against the haters of Christ.—On the contrary

Evangelical fear is peculiar to God's regenerate people: and consists in a melting humiliation for sin; accompanied at times, especially in secret prayer, with gracious groanings which cannot be uttered; with a degree of self-abhorrence, and of self-renunciation; with a longing for the favour, the resemblance, and the presence of God in the soul. And all this, not from a mere wish to avoid punishment; but likewise from a concern for having lost the image of God's holiness, for having crucified the Saviour of sinners, and for having grieved and been estranged from the adorable Spirit of grace. It is easy to observe that here is a strong mixture of love toward all the persons of the Trinity: and it is by this love (though perhaps weak as a burning thread, and small as a grain of mustard-seed) that evangelical fear is chiefly distinguished from legal. The latter is the unaffectionate awe of an indignant slave, who is forced to submit against his will, who hates the hand that strikes, who loves nothing but ease, and dreads nothing but the lash. While the sinner who experiences the fear which is evangelical, abhors sin for its own sake, as contrary to the nature and command of the blessed God; and abhors himself for sin's sake, and because he is the subject of that detested principle which sets him at so great distance from the moral likeness of infinite purity and excellence.

Concerning legal fear, we read that there is no fear [i. e. no fear of that kind] in love: for perfect love casteth out fear: meaning that the sense of God's love is no sooner shed abroad with full lustre and efficacy in the soul, than legal fear vanishes away, and continues extinct during the shine of God's Spirit on the conscience. Concerning evangelical fear we read, Blessed is the man that feareth always: who is tenderly solicitous to avoid anything and everything which may render him spiritually unlike that holy, glorious, and gracious Being, whom he ardently wishes to resemble and hold communion with.

But beside this filial, salutary fear, which is one grand mark of regeneration, a believer, while he sojourns upon earth, is liable to fears of a mixed heterogeneous kind, which seem to be partly legal and partly evangelical. To this head may be referred anxious doubtings, painful misgivings, and the evil surmising of remaining unbelief. These are occasioned, directly and immediately, by the imperfection of inherent grace below: and, remotely, by the permissive appointment of God, who has decreed that perfect happiness must be waited for till we get home to heaven. Were our graces complete, our bliss would be complete too: in which case we should no longer be men but angels. For a saint made perfect is an angel of the highest order, and a perfection of grace is glory itself.

In the meanwhile, it is even needful for the Christian traveller to be exercised with a thorn in the flesh; and to be at times in such a state as may convince him that earth is not his rest, or a mount whereon to pitch tabernacles of continuance; that he must carry his cross before he receives his crown: that he must combat before he conquers: and sow in tears, antecedently to his reaping in joy. I believe from Scripture, from observation, and from experience, that all God's people do, occasionally, pass under the cloud, and are baptized unto Christ in the cloud and in the sea of spiritual darkness and distress. Jesus himself, though he had no sin, was thus baptized. All thy waves and storms (said David, in the person of the Messiah, and addressing himself to God the Father) are gone over me. Even from my youth up, thy terrors have I suffered with a troubled mind.

No wonder, then, that the members should be sprinkled with those waters which were poured in torrents on the mystic head.

And let the suffering members of Christ's elect body remember, to their great and endless comfort, that even tormenting fears are perfectly consistent with the reality of grace. This was the Psalmist's state, and the Psalmist's experience: Though I am sometimes afraid, yet put I my trust in thee.

Hence it is evident that faith and fear, though not good friends, are, sometimes, very near neighbours: yea, that they often lodge in one house, i. e. in one and the same heart. Indeed, they seldom appear together: for when the one walks abroad, the other usually keeps close within doors. When faith is alert and active, fear hangs its head, and pines. When fear is lively, faith takes to its bed, and languishes. So strong is the antipathy of the two principles, that the sickness of one is the health of the other.

They are perpetually quarrelling and skirmishing. And though fear now and then gives faith a home thrust, faith will most certainly (and sometimes she knows it) get the better at last, and survive her adversary. Yet, though faith will infallibly out-live fear, faith is not immortal. She too must die, and that by God's own hand: for she is so strong, even when weakest, that none can deprive her of existence but he that gave it. Her death will be a willing and a delightful one. When the hour comes, she herself will not wish to live a moment longer. The soul in which she dwells, being severed from its body, and taken up to heaven; faith, gladly and triumphantly expires, under the meridian blaze of sight. In the mean while, there are times when, brightening into full assurance, she longs for her own annihilation, and is even straitened until it be accomplished. At length, having acted as the believer's companion and guide through the wilderness, she sees him safe to the threshold of heaven: and, the very instant he steps over that threshold, and enters within the veil, she takes her leave of him for ever.

As to fear, though she may, in some believers, keep pace with faith, and even outrun faith, during the greater part of the earthly race; yet the waters of death (if she die not before) will kill her effectually and finally. The mere prospect of that stream may perhaps give her fresh vivacity and strength; but no sooner does she begin actually to touch that water than she expires; and the renewed soul, which had been, through her means, all its lifetime subject to bondage, passes the river, with courage, serenity, and joy. Holy desire cuts the cable. Faith hoists the flag. Prayer spreads the sail, and God's spirit breathes the auspicious breeze. All the graces of the heart are in exercise, and ply their oars to the music of hovering angels. The dividing waters present a smooth expanse for the ransomed of the Lord to pass over. All is harmony. All is bliss. And thus does the precious freight, the disembodied soul, land, in triumph, on the golden coast; and, hardly staying to take a view of her dead enemies on the opposite shore, makes directly to the presence of God, and to the throne of him that was slain.

Unwillingly I return to earth, and, withdrawing my mind from a contemplation of the glory that shall be revealed, descend to consider the various fears to which all God's converted people, and myself among the rest, are subject, while imprisoned in a body of clay.

Within are fears. For that sorceress, whose name is Fear, can transform herself into a multiplicity of shapes, though she is, in reality, the same identical hag in all.

Sometimes she assumes the mantle of pretended humility: and whispers that "we must not give absolute credit to God's covenant and promises, nor aspire to the comfort and enjoyment of them, for fear of being presumptuous."

Anon, she wears the mask of caution: "Do not rejoice in God's election, and in Christ's righteousness, for fear of being a self-deceiver." Whereas, in reality, all who can embrace the free favour of God, and all who can lay hold on the righteousness of Christ, have a covenant right to both. And why should not they, who have a right to these, rejoice in the God to whose rich and immutable grace they are indebted for it?

At another time, fear accosts us in the garb of affected holiness: "You must bring," says she, "a price in your hand, to God the Father; or Christ's redemption will profit you nothing. Do not undervalue yourself, by supposing that you can do no good work before you are justified. I tell you, that you must work for life and justification. You must do good works, in order to be accepted; and fulfil a string of terms and conditions, seeing you are to be saved for your works, because of your works, yea, according to the merits of your works." But thou, O believer in Christ, flee these abominable doctrines. Harken not to them, as you value the glory of God, the freeness of grace, the riches of Christ, the interests of real holiness, and your own happiness. Remember that the conditions of fallen man's salvation are two, and no more: namely, perfect atonement for sin, and perfect obedience to the law. Both these conditions Christ has completely fulfilled, in the stead, and for the infallible salvation, of every soul that comes to his blood for cleansing, and to his righteousness for clothing. "To what end, then, serves faith?" To let thee into the knowledge, possession, and enjoyment of this free and finished redemption.

“And to what end serve good works?” Not to entitle us to God’s favour, or even to pave (much less to pay) our way to his kingdom: but to glorify his name, to adorn his gospel, to evidence our adoption, and benefit others on our road to heaven.

Fear very frequently mimics the voice of prudence; and advises us, as a friend, “Not to bring odium and inconveniences upon ourselves, by too strict a moral walk, and by a too resolute assertion of the doctrines of Christ.” How bitterly did poor Peter weep for having listened to this syren song! And what rending agonies of heart did he feel for his sham prudence, after the arrow of recovering grace, shot from the eye of Christ, had pierced his inmost soul! O thou almighty Son of God, save thy people from the fear of man. Not only pray for us, as thou didst for Peter, that our faith fail not (and thy prayer was heard: for his faith itself failed not, though his (d) profession of it did), but pray also, in our behalf, that our faith may never even seem to fail.

Fear is, sometimes, apt to beset those who, of all persons in the world, should have nothing to do with it, unless to trample it under their feet. I mean, the ministers of God’s word. O ye standard-bearers of the Most High, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Good Mrs. Ayscough, who was burned for the Protestant faith, when she was offered her pardon at the stake, on condition she would renounce the truth, cried out, with holy indignation, I did not come hither to deny my Lord and master. I desire to remember her words, every time I ascend the pulpit. A mincing, timid, partial declaration of the gospel is a virtual denial of Christ himself. Rather die, with the gospel standard in your hands, than resign a thread of it to the enemy: like heroic Valasco, the Spanish general, who, when the Havannah was taken by the English scorned to surrender the national flag, and nobly expired with his colours wrapped round his arm. But there are seasons of personal dryness and darkness, when fear, like an armed man, assaults the faith and liveliness of God’s ambassadors. They are, perhaps, at a loss even for a subject to preach from. All resources seem to be shut up. They sit in their own minds, from text to text, and for a long time can fix on none. They cry, in secret, Lord, how can we spread the table for the people, except thou bring the venison to our hands? or, with the disciples of old, whence shall we have bread for the multitude here in the wilderness? “The dear people flock to the word as doves to their widows; and we, alas, have little or nothing to feed them with.” At such times of doubt and barrenness, cast yourself at large upon God, and distribute the word as you are enabled. In all probability, the fishes and the loaves will increase in your hands, and God will administer bread enough and to spare. It is kind and wise in the Holy Spirit to make us feel that we are nothing, and that the excellency of the power is of him and not of us. The lesson of dependence upon his arm of grace alone is profitable, though not always palatable, to our proud, deceitful hearts. To the glory of the divine faithfulness I say it, that, for my own part, some of my happiest pulpit-opportunities have been when I have gone up the stairs with trembling knees and a dejected spirit: nay (twice or thrice in my life-time) when I have been so far reduced as to be unable to fix on a text, till the psalm or hymn was almost over. These are not desirable trials: but they redound, however, to the praise of Him who has said, Without me ye can do nothing; and whose almighty love can elicit light out of darkness, even out of darkness that may be felt.

On the whole, let all God’s people, both ministers and private Christians, come to the Lord by prayer, for deliverance from the fears that do most easily beset them. Bind them up in a bundle, and throw them at the foot of the cross, and implore God’s spirit to shine them away. Be humbled on account of them; but not discouraged. Proclaim eternal hostility against unbelieving fear, in all its branches: but know that it is God who must teach your hands to war, and your fingers to fight.

No man appears to have been more subject to fears and cares than David: though he had been enabled to vanquish a lion and to slay a giant. What course did he take for relief, in his hours of distress and tremor? He prayed to him that is mighty to save. And his success was answerable. I sought the Lord, and he heard me: yea, he delivered me out of all my fears.

Several of the fears to which God’s people are exposed have already been considered. The enumeration of a few more shall conclude the subject.

1. Weak believers are sometimes apt to be afraid that they are not in the number of God’s elect. They can, indeed, say, with David, “Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee:” but they are not clearly satisfied that this blessedness is theirs.

For my own part, I look upon it as one of the best symptoms of a regenerate state, when a person is ardently desirous to know his election of God. It is an inquiry which the generality of mankind never trouble themselves about; and which none but a true believer is concerned for in earnest. We read of some, in the Acts of the Apostles, who had never heard of such a person as the Holy Ghost: and, I fear, there are too many who have hardly ever heard whether there be such a thing as eternal, gratuitous, personal, and immutable election. Of those who have, too many set themselves to oppose it: and labour (though, blessed be God, they labour in vain) to stop up the very foundation of salvation, and to cut down that tree of life whose leaves and fruits are for the healing of the nations. A fierce free-will-sister in Cornwall was lately heard to say that she dreaded to open the Bible, for fear of meeting with predestination and election. And it has been affirmed of a very noted Arminian clergyman, that he should, one day, address his audience as follows: Brethren, many people talk about an electing God. I, on the contrary, assert that there is no such being. If there is an electing God, why does he not strike me dead before you all? But you see, my brethren, I am not struck dead. Therefore, there is no electing God.

Very different are the ideas of Christ's humbled, awakened servants. When a ray of God's everlasting love shines in upon their hearts they cry out, with the royal and devout predestinarian of ancient Israel, "How dear are thy counsels," i. e. thy purposes and decrees, "to me, O God! Oh, how great is the sum," i. e. how inestimable is the value "of them! If I should declare them, or speak of them, they are more than I am able to express." The Lord has some, yea, many names, even in our Sardis, who not only profess to believe the Scriptures of truth, but also make good their profession, by believing and by practically adorning the truths of the Scriptures. Such enlightened persons will ever be desirous not barely to admit those truths, in a mere doctrinal way alone, but to experience the efficacy of them, and to be feelingly interested in the blessings themselves.

Granting, however, that thousands of converted people have not attained to those heights of exalted consolation as to be able to say, with an unflinching tongue, "Thou hast chosen me, and not cast me away:" yet is there some secret comfort even in waiting upon God for the joy of his salvation, in seeking the light of his countenance, and in crediting the truths and promises of the gospel at large. To those who are, by grace, led thus far, I would beg leave to propose the following questions, without presuming to wade more deeply into the sacred profound of those decrees which lie hid in God than his written word permits. By way, then, of combating your fears, let me ask:

Art thou desirous of choosing God in Christ to be thy Father, thy portion, and thy covenant God, here and ever? If you are, it is one happy proof that God has chosen thee to salvation, through sanctification of the spirit and belief of the truth. You could not choose him, if he had not first chosen you.

Is love to God, in any measure, kindled in thy heart? Or, if you are in any doubt as to this, do you wish to love him? Would you be glad to receive him, to embrace him, and to hold him fast, as your chief and only good? Take courage. Wishing is a degree of love. No man ever wished for the thing which he altogether hated. A wisher for Christ is a lover of Christ. And you could not love him if he had not first loved you. Wishing is a fruit of the Father's drawings.

Is the law of God written on thy mind? That is, can you say with the apostle, that "to will is present with you," and that you "delight in the law of God, after the inner man?" Would it make you easy and happy, and would you have the supreme desire of your heart, were you to be holy as God is holy, and pure as Christ is pure? Then you may add, as the apostle does, "I thank God, through Jesus Christ." The Lord would not thus have written his law (however imperfectly at present) upon thy heart, if the pen of his own free grace had not first written thy name in the book of life.

This is a blessed consideration: and as sure as it is blessed. Yet, stop not here: but pray for the witness of the Holy Spirit to bear unclouded testimony to thy spirit, that thou art a child of God. Say, as the Psalmist did, "Remember me, O Lord, with the favour that thou bearest to thy own people! O visit me with thy salvation, that I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may rejoice with the gladness of thy nation, and give thanks with thine inheritance." Wait the appointed time: and God will set that promise, as a seal, upon thy heart; "Fear not, for I have redeemed thee: I have called thee by thy name: thou art mine."

2. Saints are subject to another fear: viz. that they are not truly converted, and that their spot is not the spot of God's children. Nor do I wonder that, when grace is not in lively exercise, they are liable to apprehensions of this kind: when I consider man's absolute unworthiness, even in his best estate; and that astonishing mixture of good and evil which is more or less visible in saints below.

Though I am by no means an advocate for doubting; I yet am of opinion that, through the alchemy of divine wisdom, even doubts and fears, though not desirable in themselves, are ultimately subservient to the advantage of God's chosen: just as, in the material world, not a thorn is without its use, and every bramble has its value.

Spiritual distresses and misgivings have a tendency, though grace, to keep us sensible of our sinfulness and helplessness (as Paul's temptations clipt the wings of his pride, and restrained him from being exalted above measure). They conduce to make us watchful and circumspect : to make us feel the pluse of our souls by frequent and severe self-examination : to kindle longing aspirations after God and communion with him : to lay us low at the footstool of Jehovah's sovereignty : to endear Christ's blood, righteousness, and intercession : and put us upon looking up to the Holy Spirit in prayer, for the support of his presence, and for the unction of his comforts, which alone are able to enlighten and to chase away the darkness of our minds.

There is likewise another particular which ought to encourage the mourners in Zion ; namely, that it is impossible for any who have not been spiritually quickened from above, to pant for God as a thirsty land ; to grieve, evangelically, from an heart-felt sense of sin ; and to be pained after a godly sort. A good man of the last century somewhere observes, that " He who cries out I am dead ; proves himself, by that very cry, to be alive." Can a dead person feel ? Can a dead man complain ? A believer may lament his deadness ; but he cannot lament his death, without his lips refuting themselves. There must be spiritual life, or there could be no spiritual sensibility, no spiritual motion, no spiritual breathings. The pregnant woman that longs must be alive. If the Lord had not drawn you, you would not follow hard after him. Nor could you say, " The desire of my soul is to thy name and to the remembrance of thee ;" unless God's Spirit had awakened that desire in your heart. If you was not truly converted, you would not be so anxious about the truth of your conversion. It is not the untamed bird of prey that pours the plaintive strain. No : it is the dove that mourns ; it is the nightingale that sings with her breast against a thorn.

However, though a weeping state is a safe one, and not without its advantages ; yet there is a still more excellent way. The diffident should be encouraged, but diffidence itself should not. Covet earnestly the best gifts. Aspire to the choicest attainments. Pray for unclouded manifestations. Cultivate spiritual fellowship with God in all the means of grace, both private and public. Endeavour to drink deep into holiness, and to be fruitful in every good word and work. Conversation with experienced Christians operates frequently as a step to gracious improvements. God's people are sometimes blessed to the rubbing off the rust of unbelief, and to the mutual elision of light and heat from each other.—Lay hold on Christ as well as you can, for wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption : committing yourself for better, for worse, to his grace, which worketh all in all. Thus it would be evident that you are indeed planted in the Lord's house, and belong to that invisible Church which he purchased with his own blood. Nay, you will gradually flourish in the courts of God, grow as the lily, and cast forth the root as Lebanon. Your conversion will be made clear to you. You will see your tokens. You will no longer have reason to doubt whether the good work of grace is begun in you : but your path, like a burning light, will shine more and more (in general) to the perfect day.

3. Believers are sometimes prone to fear that they have no real covenant-interest in Christ ; or, that they are not in a state of pardon and justification. " Oh," says the doubting Christian, " if I could but know that I have redemption through the blood of Christ, even the forgiveness of my sins ; that Christ undertook for me in the eternal covenant of grace, and that he is the Lord my righteousness ; I should be happy indeed : but, alas ! such knowledge is too wonderful and excellent for me ; I cannot attain unto it." Be it so, that you cannot attain to it : God is not the less able to give it. He can, as the apostle expresses it, not only grant you, but even fill you with " the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him." Therefore if you want assurance of salvation, ask it at the throne. But ask it with submission, and with a reserve to the will of God. Do not let your ultimate desires terminate in any thing short of God himself ; nor so hang upon comforts as to overlook the Comforter. Assurances are the brightest bridal jewels of a soul that is married to Christ : but the Bridegroom himself is better than the jewels he gives ; nor does he in general allow his bride to shine in them every day. He keeps them under his own key, and lets her wear them when he pleases. At worst, remember that he is your husband still, and the God who changes not. Venture yourself, therefore, on board his blood and righteousness, as a mariner trusts himself to the vessel in which he embarks. Do this, and you shall be carried safe to the haven where you would be. You may be shaken on your passage, but not forsaken ; tost, but not lost. The mediation of Christ, the faithfulness of your Covenant-Father, and the never failing love of the Holy Ghost, will bear you up, and bear you home. No man ever suffered final shipwreck who ventured his soul, his salvation, his all, on that bottom. If you cannot wrap yourself up in the mantle of Christ's righteousness with an assured faith, yet if you touch but the hem of his garment, with a weak faith, with a faith of longing and desire, or even (if I may so speak) with the very tip of faith's little finger; you have a capital evidence of interest in him. "As an infirm hand," says an excellent person, "can tie the marriage-knot: so a weak faith can lay hold on a strong Christ."

4. The Lord's people are frequently harassed with a fear that the work of sanctification in their souls is either not begun, or at a dead stand: that they do not increase with the increase of God, nor resemble him in holiness more and more.

If any fear may be called a good fear, this may: supposing it do not flow from a principle of legality, and be not carried too far. It is a blessed sign when we mourn under a sense of our short-comings, and burn with intense desire to rise higher into the likeness of God. For this also seek unto him. He is able to accomplish in you all the good pleasure of his will, and the work of faith with power. If he give you grace to put yourself as a blank into his hand; his Spirit will delineate his sacred image upon your soul, and, in the article of death, lighten the outlines, and finish the sketch into his own perfect likeness. Be diligent to use all the appointed means of sanctification which Providence favours you with. Be careful to shun all evil, and the very appearance of it. Walk in the path of duty marked out by the written word. Nor need you fear God's making good his covenant of promise, by making you such as he would have you to be. Be not discouraged, but rather excited to hope, to pray, and to believe, by the sense of your remaining corruptions. "The field," as one says, "that has millions of weeds in it may be a corn-field. One rose upon a bush, though but a little one, and though not yet blown, proves that which bears it to be a true rose tree." Despise not, then, the day of small things; but pray God to enlarge them.—Bless him even for the grain of mustard-seed: but at the same time beg his Spirit to water and increase it.

5. The fear of temptation keeps many of God's people in bondage. And happy are we if we so fly from it as to shut our eyes and ears and hearts against it. We know not what we are, nor what we are capable of, if left to ourselves. Yet do not let the fear of what may be cast a damp upon your present comforts, nor abate your confidence in the Lord. Prudent fear is wisdom; but much fear is unbelief. A believer cannot trust in himself too little; and blessed be God, he cannot trust too much in the all-sufficiency of divine grace. If therefore you are cast down by a sense of your liness to temptations, and of your proneness to fall by them; bring your temptations and your weakness together to God the Holy Spirit; and beseech him to get himself the victory in you, over you, and for you. Let watchfulness and prayer thus set a guard upon the outworks; and Jesus will throw in the succours of grace, and preserve the citadel from being taken by the enemy. He is faithful, and will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able to bear. He will either hide you in his pavilion, and keep you from the fiery trial; or if he bring you into the field, he will save you from being overpowered. The archers may sorely grieve you, and shoot at you; yet shall your bow abide in strength, and the arms of your hands be made strong by the mighty God of Jacob.

But, should the enemy of souls be even permitted to gain some advantage over you for a season; yet, cast not away your confidence, but look to the hills of covenant love, whence cometh your help. Christ will deliver you as at the first; and restore you as at the beginning. What was prophesied concerning Gad (Gen. xlix. 19.) shall be spiritually fulfilled in you: a troop shall overcome him, but he shall overcome at the last.

6. A sixth fear occasions no small uneasiness to weak believers; namely, a fear lest they should not be faithful unto death, nor hold on in grace to the end. But if God has given thee good evidences of thy being truly regenerated, and of thy being his child through faith in Christ Jesus, thou mayest, upon the strength of thy adoption, be as certain of thy final perseverance as if thy warfare was actually accomplished, and the crown of glory set upon thy head.

The invisible, or elect church, consists of only one and the same innumerable family; part of which is in heaven, and part on earth. (Eph. iii. 15.) Every individual member of this family, whether militant below, or triumphant above, is equally safe in the hands of Christ. Saints in glory are, indeed, happier than saints on earth; but saints on earth are no less eventually secure of salvation than saints in glory. The spirits of just men made perfect might as soon fall from their state of heavenly blessedness as a sanctified person here fall from a state of grace. The names of both are in the book of life. They are alike interested in God's everlasting and unalterable covenant. What the Father's love has given to the glorified will be also given to them that are yet behind; for to this end Christ died and rose again, that he might gather together in one the children of God that are scattered abroad; (John ii. 52.) and by the single offering of himself, he has perfected for ever them that are sanctified. Saints are not their own keepers; and it is well for them that they are not; they would be sorrowfully kept, if they were. Adam was his own keeper, and what did he get by it? Tho fallen angels were their own keepers. Peter kept himself, but how long? God's chosen are not thus finally left in the hand of their own counsel, nor trusted to their own management: All his saints are in thy hand, z. e. in the hand of Christ, Deut. xxxiii. 3. whence none can pluck them, John x. Which general promise of the perseverance of God's elect, taken as a collective body, ascertains and ensures the perseverance of each believer in particular. For the whole necessarily includes every part, and where any individual part is absent, it destroys the entireness of the whole; just as the human body is not complete if only one limb, or even a single finger, or so much as a piece of a finger be wanting. The philosophic integrity vanishes from that instant: for posito toto, ponuntur partes; and sublata parte, tollitur totum. So that what is affirmed concerning the aggregate is equally affirmed concerning the constituent members respectively, of which that aggregate consists: otherwise the affirmation would be essentially untrue; which, to charge Christ with, were blasphemy.

Let the follower of Christ, therefore, dismiss all slavish fear, as to his continuance in grace and in well doing; leave the care of that to God. They who belong to him are kept, and will be kept, by his power through faith unto salvation itself; and may sing with him that was caught up into the third heavens, Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Neither life nor death, nor things present, nor things to come, shall ever be able to do it. There is no being disinherited of the blessings entailed by God's covenant, and bequeathed in Christ's last will and testament, signed with his own blood, and sealed by his own Spirit. Saving grace is the good part which shall not be taken away. Whatever you lose, it is impossible for you to lose that. It is bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God, and hid with Christ in him. And when Christ who is your life shall appear, then shall ye also, who have believed, appear with him in glory.

7. I shall mention one other fear, common to many of God's redeemed; viz. the fear of death. Some true believers are apt to cry out (as the human nature of Christ himself did) Father, save me from this hour.

But why are you so dismayed at the prospect of getting home? Are you afraid of dying, or of what you may suffer in your last conflict? Turn again to your rest, for the Lord will deal bountifully with you, and be better to you than your fears:

“Who see take

Death's portrait true?

Fear shakes the pencil: Fancy loves excess.

Dark ignorance is lavish of her shades;

And these the formidable picture draw.

Man forms a death that nature never made;

Then on the point of his own fancy falls,

And feels a thousands deaths in fearing one.”

None returns from the grave to tell us what it is to die. Some happy believers have, indeed, sung in their last moments, “O death, where is thy once imagined sting? Can this be termed dying?” And very probably the passage is both sweeter and smoother than living imagination is apt to suppose: I lost an excellent parishioner in the year 1765. Though he had not the least doubt of his salvation, but as far as spiritual and eternal things were concerned, lay for many weeks triumphing in the full assurance of faith; he still dreaded the separation of soul and body, from an apprehension of what nature must endure in the parting stroke. Some little time before the knot was actually untied, God was pleased to indulge him with a foretaste of death. He was, for near an hour, quite gone in appearance; and his family began to conclude that the final struggle was over. By degrees, however, he came to himself; and on my asking him how he did, he answered that God had given him a specimen of death, and he found it not so terrible as he apprehended. From that period all his dread of dying vanished away; and he continued without any shadow of fear, filled with the peace which passeth all understanding, until his disimprisoned spirit flew to the bosom of God. Oh! then, whoever thou art that art troubled in like manner, cast thy burden on the Lord. You have found him faithful in other things; and you may safely trust him for this. He has delivered you in six troubles, and in the seventh he will be nigh unto you. The water floods shall not overflow thee, neither shall the deep swallow thee up. The rock of ages lies at the bottom of the brook; and God will give you firm footing all the way through.

Or, are you afraid of the consequences of death, and what will come after? Throw yourself upon God, in Christ, and you are safe. “Christ's righteousness is law-proof, death-proof, and judgment-proof.”

Are you fearful what may become of your family when God calls you away? Make your family over to him. Nominate Jehovah for their guardian and trustee. Cast anchor upon that comfortable promise: Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me.

Do you dread the buffetings of Satan? God will not let him take advantage of your weakness. You shall overcome; yea, you shall be more than conquerors, through the blood of the Lamb, and the word of his testimony.

Are you apprehensive lest your faith be small, and your sanctification imperfect? Christ will be praying for you, that your faith fail not; and the Holy Ghost will take care not to leave his work of grace upon thy soul unfinished.

You tremble perhaps, at the thought of laying aside your weak, sinful, mortal body. But you will receive it again; not such as it now is, frail, defiled, and perishable; but bright with the glory, and perfect in the image, of God. The body is that to the soul which a garment is to the body. When you betake yourself to repose at night, you lay aside your clothes, until morning, and resume them when you rise. What is the grave but the believer's wardrobe, of which God is the door-keeper? In the resurrection morning the door will be thrown open, and the glorified soul shall descend from heaven to put on a glorified robe, which was indeed folded up, and laid away in dishonour: but shall be taken out from the repository enriched and beautified with all the ornaments of nature and of grace.

Are you loth to bid a long adieu to your Christian friends? The adieu will not be a long one. They will soon follow to the place of rest. And in the mean time you will be with Christ, and with all the saints who have been gathered home before you, which is far better.

Should I be asked, What is the grand remedy against undue fear of every possible kind? I answer, in one word: Communion with God. "He," says good Dr. Owen, "who would be little in temptation, must be much in prayer." Ply the mercy seat. Eye the blood of Christ. Cry mightily to the Spirit of God. To which I add: Wait at the footstool in holy stillness of soul. Sink into nothing before the uncreated Majesty. If he shine within, you will fear nothing from without. What made the martyrs fearless? Their souls were filled with Christ. Jesus lifted up the beams of his love upon their minds, and they smiled at all the fires which man could kindle.

To enjoy communion with God, you must be found in the way of duty. If you play the truant, no wonder you are afraid of being whipped.—"Those trees," says the excellent Mr. Gurnall, "bear the sweetest fruit which stand most in the sun." Take heed to the thing which is right: for that shall bring a man peace at the last. The meaning of which text is, that by virtue of the wise connection which infinite wisdom hath established between antecedents and consequents, holy walking is the high road to holy comforts.

Your walk, perhaps, is strict and conscientious; and yet, it may be, you complain of doubts and darkness notwithstanding. Here, examine yourself: 1. Whether you do not work from legal principles and to legal ends? If so, no wonder, that like a slave with the lash at his shoulders, you toil all day and take nothing. Christ alone is the righteousness of them that believe. God will never set the seal of his gracious presence to the broken Sinai covenant. Whoever enjoys, or thinks he enjoys comfort and peace from the works of his own hands, and from the duties he performs, is blinded, and deluded into a fool's paradise, by the god of this world. The Lord meets his people in the way of duty, but not for it: as a father, who meets his son on a journey, at some appointed house, meets him in that house, but not for the sake of the house. Live upon what Christ is made to you of God, and you will find comfort. But if you seek happiness and establishment from yourself, or from any thing wrought by yourself, you will receive no solid nourishment from the breast of that sham consolation.

Or, 2. Christ may be all your hope, and yet your fears may continue to run high. Look narrowly into your own heart. See that there be no Achan in the camp, no beloved lust in the tent. I dare not say that the sense of God's love is always connected with the actings of faith, and with the concomitant exercise of holiness. But, I suppose that faith and sanctification are the usual correlatives of joy in the Holy Ghost. Art thou melted by grace into a filial fear of God? Go on to fear, to love, and to obey, whether the Lord gild thy path with sunshine, or darken it with gloom. He is the sovereign Dispenser of his own comforts; and may withhold or confer them as seemeth good in his sight. But it is thy indispensable duty to follow the Lamb, and to do his will, whether he cheers you with his consolations or not. Certain it is, from the infallible word of his grace, that to you who look unto Jesus all the sweet privileges of the gospel belong: and joy is one of them. Though it tarry, wait for it; for it will not deceive thy expectation; it will surely arrive at the appointed season, and will not linger a moment beyond. O ye of fearful hearts, be strong! Your God will come with a recompense, he will come and save you. Your prayers may not be answered immediately, but they are all strung on the file of his remembrance, and shall be answered after many days. Your fears are in his file. Your groans are noted in his book. Delight thou in the Lord, and he will give thee thy heart's desire: hold thee still in the Lord, and abide patiently for him. Commit thy way to the Lord; put thy trust in him, and he shall bring it to pass.

I knew a most valuable Christian, who died in the year 1760; and in her last illness was greatly exercised with darkness of soul; which, however, did not finally continue. While God was leading her through the wilderness of mental distress, she still anchored on the promises, though she had lost sight of the Promiser: and, as a proof of her absolute dependance on the faithfulness of a withdrawing God, she directed that (instead of the usual inscription of name and age) the following text should be engraven (and engraven it was) on the plate of her coffin:—"Deal with me, O God, according to thy name, for sweet is thy mercy." Thus, as the great Dr. Manton long ago expressed it, "Faith accepts God's bond, and patience waits for payment."

CHRISTMAS MEDITATIONS

ON GEN. XLIX. 10.

The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come: and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.

THIS remarkable passage is a link of that grand chain of prophecy which was delivered by the patriarch Jacob on his dying bed. Such are the faithfulness and the condescending grace of God, that he frequently brightens the last hours of his people with the richest displays of his power and presence; nor does any thing short of heaven itself afford a nobler sight than that of a believer standing on the verge of eternity, filled with the faith which casts out fear, happy in the assured possession of grace, and longing for the completion of that grace in glory.

Hence, I have often wondered how any considerate person can be an enemy to the doctrine of assurance. There is but one thing which can render death terrible: namely, our being at an uncertainty as to the reception we shall meet with at the hands of God. Certainly, then, the knowledge of salvation, by the forgiveness of sin, through the tender mercy of our God (Luke i. 77.), is a privilege which well deserves to be wished and prayed for. To have the Spirit of God bearing witness to our spirits that we are children of God (Rom. viii. 16.), is, at least, a very desirable blessing. And, were our hearts thoroughly awakened to a sense of divine things, it would be impossible for us to sit down easy and contented without some degree of this exceeding great and precious gift. Surely, it behoves us to cultivate that in life which is the only infallible antidote against the terrors of death! I do not say that assurance of my own personal interest in Jesus is essential to my faith as a real believer in him; but I am positively clear that it is essential to my fulness of comfort. Assurance adds nothing to the esse justificationis, or to the being of justification; but it adds much to the bene esse justificati, or to the well-being of a justified person.

Holy Jacob was fully satisfied as to the safety of his soul. He knew that his name was written in the book of life; and that his salvation was settled in the eternal covenant of grace and redemption. He, had a blessed conviction that the Son of God whose human nature was to descend from his loins in the tribe of Judah, had undertaken to atone for his sins; and to clothe him, by imputation, with a perfect righteousness. In consequence of this faith, when the time drew near that Israel must die (chap. lxxvii. 29.) Jacob drew near to the time with as much joy as the time drew near to him with speed. For we find him (chap. lxxviii. 21.) speaking of his own approaching death, with as much ease and complacency as if he was only setting out on a journey of pleasure: "Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die." He perceived the symptoms of advancing dissolution; and the prospect conduced, not to alarm his fears, nor to rivet him closer to the world; but operated like the shining of the sun, or the breathings of zephyr on a flower. It expanded his hope; enlarged his desire for heaven; and diffused the fragrance of his faith on all within the sphere of his conversation.

As greatly as this eminent saint longed to be dissolved and to be with Christ; he would not die until he had first taken a solemn leave of his family, by blessing them in the name of the Lord, and by predicting the fate of their posterities. At present I shall only consider his last address to Judah, his fourth son. Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise: i. e. thy tribe shall be the most conspicuous and distinguished on various accounts. In that portion of Canaan which shall fall to thy descendants and to those of Benjamin, the city of Jerusalem shall be built, and the temple of God shall stand. But chiefly shalt thou be celebrated as the progenitor of that spotless mother from whom the Son of God shall derive his inferior nature; and within the near neighbourhood of thy territory shall he suffer and expire for the salvation of his people.

Thy hand shall be in the neck of thy enemies, and thy father's children shall bow down before thee; referring to that valour and success in war, for which this tribe became so eminent, and so respected by its neighbours. This is expressed with still greater sublimity at the ninth verse. Judah is a lion's whelp; though young, yet strong, courageous, formidable, and magnanimous. From the prey, my son, thou art gone up; victorious as that king of beasts, when he ascends with majestic pace from the plains to the mountains; flushed with the conquest, and red with the slaughter of inferior animals. He stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion: who shall rouse him up? Implying, that this branch of the Israelitish nation should enjoy (as in fact they did) a long series of rest, honour, and prosperity; and that the tribe of Judah could no more be insulted with safety than a sheep or a deer can rouse and irritate a lion with impunity.—What grandeur and vivacity of genius must Jacob retain, even in that hour when strength and genius usually fail, to be able to convey his ideas in such august terms, and in a flow of such highly poetic imagery! Who that reads this chapter would imagine that elevated strains like these, strains which would have done honour to the muse of Homer, warbled from the lips of a dying man, of a man too labouring under the utmost bodily decays of age, and over whose head no fewer than one hundred and forty-seven years had past!

But the most valuable part of the prophecy is that which relates to the incarnation of Jesus Christ: The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and to him shall the gathering of the people be.

Of all regal ornaments the sceptre is believed to be the most ancient. And probably its origin was extremely simple. It seems to have taken its rise from the crook, wielded in earliest times by the harmless hand of a shepherd. Agreeably to which idea, the Hebrew verb  $\text{קָרַר}$  signifies, he fed, he exercised the office of a shepherd; and likewise he ruled, he governed as a magistrate. So the Greek word,  $\text{ποιμην}$ , a shepherd, is derived from the verb  $\text{ποιμαινω}$ , which imports, both to feed and to govern. A staff, primarily the instrument and the emblem of pastoral superintendency, appears to have been thence transferred to the hand of royalty. So that whenever kings look upon their sceptre, that significant ensign of authority should remind them of the tender affection they owe to their people; and of that fine lesson addressed to each of our English bishops at the time of their consecration (a lesson equally proper for princes as for prelates); "Be to the flock of Christ a shepherd, not a wolf. Feed them: devour them not. Hold up the weak. Heal the sick. Bind up the broken. Bring again the outcasts. Seek the lost. Be so merciful that you be not too remiss; so minister discipline that you neglect not mercy."<sup>(e)</sup> Some ancient sceptres (particularly of the earlier kings of France,) are affirmed to have been considerably longer than a modern walking-stick, and to have been curved at the higher end, exactly like a shepherd's rod. The Greek word  $\text{σκηπτρον}$  (from whence the Latin sceptrum, and the English sceptre), properly denotes a staff, or wand, of sufficient length for a person to lean upon: and the Hebrew  $\text{שֵׁבַט}$  is, in strictness, a staff, made of a shoot, or straight bough of a tree. Such as were the staves of the primitive shepherds and herdsmen.

By that sceptre which, for a given time, was not to depart from Judah, is undoubtedly meant the administration of temporal power. Hence the Septuagint render the passage by  $\text{Ουκ εκλεινει αρχων εξ Ιουδα}$ , A supreme governor shall not fail out of Judah; i. e. the supreme government in that tribe shall be Jewish, until the Messiah's advent. The words sceptre, and lawgiver, are here explicatory of each other, and mutually denote a series of native governors who should rule the Jewish nation according to its own law. And the sense of the whole is, that Judah should continue a distinct tribe by itself: and that its civil jurisdiction should, under some form or other, and with a greater or less degree of authority, remain in Jewish hands, until the incarnation of God the Son; but that he being come, the Jews should soon after lose their intrinsic power and authority as a nation; cease to be governed by rulers of their own; be ultimately dispossessed of the land in which they had so long dwelt, and subjected to the dominion of the Gentiles, among whom they should be dispersed, and sifted as in a sieve over the whole earth. Every tittle of which came accordingly to pass.

On this illustrious prophecy, uttered almost eighteen hundred years before the birth of Christ, profane history may be considered as the best commentary. We there find, that the sceptre did (not actually depart, but) began to depart from Judah, or verge towards a departure, within little more than half a century prior to our Lord's Nativity, when Jerusalem was besieged and taken by Pompey; and Aristobulus II., then king of Judea, was sent prisoner to Rome.

As the manifestation of God in human flesh drew nearer, the symptoms of the departing sceptre grew still more visible. The successive expeditions of Gabinius, of Crassus, and of Cassius, against this devoted people, contributed to prepare the way for the fulfilment of Jacob's prediction; and in fact proclaimed that Shiloh would soon appear.

The sceptre, however, was not, hitherto, departed from Judah; their civil power and independency, though checked, were not extinguished. They were still governed by magistrates of their own; and were even treated on various occasions, not as dependents, but as friends and allies of the Roman state.

A few years lower, when Herod (flatteringly surnamed the Great,) a native of Edom, was appointed Tetrarch, and soon after king, of Judea, chiefly by his interest with Mark Antony, the prophecy drew nearer to its accomplishment. But though the throne was now, for the first time, filled by a foreigner, still that foreigner was a professor of Judaism. Herod revered, or at least affected to revere, the Mosaic institutions; and even rebuilt the temple at a vast expense. The subordinate magistracy also consisted of Jews, as did the sanhedrim, which was their highest court of judicature. The sceptre, therefore, though departing fast, was not entirely gone from Judah, ere Shiloh came. Christ was born towards the close of this Herod's reign: i. e. while the political and ecclesiastical constitution of Judea were subsisting. Herod, indeed, was in some sense tributary to the Roman empire; but the Jews themselves were for the most part in full possession of their civil and religious rights.

When our blessed Saviour was about twelve years of age the sceptre totally departed from Judah. For, Herod (who died while our Lord was yet an infant) was succeeded by his son Archelaüs, which Archelaüs, after reigning about ten years, was deposed and banished by the emperor Augustus.—From thenceforward, the tribe of Judah, which had so long been distinguished by its dignity and pre-eminence, was reduced to a Roman province, and became an appendage to the empire. Quirinius, prefect of Syria, was commissioned to take possession of the country in the emperor's name; and Coponius, a Roman knight, was sent to preside over it, as lieutenant governor.

Thus did the sceptre, at length, depart from Judah, and a lawgiver from between his feet. Augustus drove the nail to the head; and Titus clinched it, within forty years after our Lord's crucifixion; when the city and temple were utterly destroyed, and those of the Jews who escaped immediate death were sold for slaves into every part of the known world.

In this manner does divine Providence give completion to its eternal and immutable purposes. All the predicted events that ever came to pass, and this among the rest, are so many standing proofs of God's predestination and foreknowledge. Necessity is but another name for certainty of event; without which there could be no such thing as infallible foreknowledge, and without infallible foreknowledge, there could be no such thing as infallible prophecy.

Such exact and wonderful accomplishments prove also the divine original of the Scriptures. Most of the leading incidents, whether civil or sacred, of general importance either to the church or to the world, were foretold in the Bible. The four universal monarchies, for instance; the advent, the sufferings, the resurrection, and the ascension, of the Messiah; the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost; the abolition of the Levitical economy; the ruin and dispersion of the Jews; the calling of the gentiles; the ten general persecutions; the vast spread of Christianity through the Roman empire; the rise, progress, and continuance of Popery, and of Mahometism; with a multitude of great events beside, were circumstantially foretold in the sacred writings of the Old and New Testament. From hence results such an invincible demonstration of the truth of Christianity as all the infidels in the world will never be able to surmount, while the sun and moon endure. We ourselves know and see that many of the Scripture-prophecies have been completely fulfilled; and that others of them are now fulfilling, even at this very time. Thus, with regard to the Jews, we have all the evidence it is possible to have, that the prophet Hosea wrote by divine inspiration, when he affirmed (chap. iii. 4.) that the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without sacrifice, and without an ephod, and without teraphim. This has actually and literally been the case with them for rather more than 1700 years past; and continues to be so at this present moment. Every Jew we meet is a living proof that the sceptre is indeed departed from Judah, and a lawgiver from between his feet.

It is certain, therefore, that the promised Shiloh is come; and Jesus Christ the righteous, in whose childhood the sceptre departed, is both the Son of the most High God, and likewise the true Messiah, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write.

ἡ γὰρ ὁ υἱος, Shiloh, may be rendered the Son; also the Saviour; likewise, the peaceable, and the prosperous one. The Septuagint translates, or rather paraphrases it, by ὅρατα ἀποκειμενα, i. e. he for whom [all] things are laid up, or kept in store. In this adorable person and most wonderful offices and transactions, Jesus exhausts every one of those significations. He is, 1. The everlasting Son of the Father, as God; and the Son of Mary, as man.—2. He is the effectual, the only, and the certain, Saviour, i. e. deliverer and preserver, of his elect body, the Church.—3. He is the alone peace-maker between God and men, by the infinitely precious blood of his cross.—4. He prospered and prevailed, to the uttermost, in the whole and in every branch of his mediatorial undertaking. No part of his success as a Saviour is uncertain, or suspended on a peradventure. The reward of his humiliation lies in the absolute and infallible salvation of every individual sinner for whom he died. And, as his work was perfect, his reward is sure.—5. For him all things are reserved. He is the appointed heir of all things; the Omega, or central end, no less than the Alpha, or author, of the worlds. All beings are by him, and for him. The elect, both angels and men, stoop to the sceptre of his grace; and the reprobate, both diabolic and human, must submit to the rod of his power.

To him shall the gathering of the people be. It is plain, from this clause of the text before us, that redemption by Christ is not that random and precarious thing which the Arminian scheme pretends. The salvation he wrought does not lie at sixes and sevens. It is by no means unsettled, uncertain, or undetermined. The dignity of his divine person, the infinite value of his obedience and sacrifice, together with the justice of his Almighty Father, to whom the inestimable price was paid, render it impossible that any single soul should perish, for whom such a Redeemer died. It is neither at the option, nor in the power, of thy corrupt free-will to render his mediation effectual or ineffectual. All is firmly fixed by the unalterable will, the immoveable decree, and the everlasting covenant, of the uncreated Three. Christ did not come into the world at hap-hazard, nor live and die for a may-be. He was born, and shed his blood, for a peculiar people, whom his own sanctifying grace was to make zealous of good works; (Titus ii. 14.) and that he might gather together into one glorified company all the children of God that were scattered abroad. (John xi. 52.)

The elect world are the great all for whom he lived and bled: even the whole world of his predestinated people. And every one of these his people shall be gathered to him: to him shall the gathering of the people be. As surely as they were created by his power, so surely shall they, in conversion, be gathered to him by the efficacious grace of his Holy Spirit. As surely as Christ was born for them at Bethlehem, so surely shall he be formed in them, their hope of glory, by the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Ghost.

And, indeed, were not this the case, the whole of Jacob's prophecy would not be true. The text positively avers that the people (i. e. the elect people of God) shall be gathered to Christ. And, if free grace say, Ay; it is in vain for free-will to say, No. God hath said, The people shall be gathered: and faith echoes back the promise, with, "Then gathered the people shall be; for thy counsel must stand, and thou wilt do all thy pleasure." Happy it is for us that God hath taken upon himself to gather and convert us to his Son. Unless he was the gatherer, not one of us would ever be gathered. Free-will never yet led a sinner to Christ; and never will, while the world remains. We are free enough to depart from God and holiness; but we are not free and desirous to return to him, and forsake our sins, and be conformed to him in righteousness, until his grace make us free in the day of his power upon our hearts. Free-will has led millions and millions of souls to the place of torment, but it never lifted a single soul to heaven. All the sins that ever were committed were committed by free-will;

but it is only the transforming grace of God that inspires and adorns us with the mind that was in Christ.

You, therefore, who profess to believe in Jesus, as the Shiloh that was conceived of the Holy Ghost, and born of the virgin Mary, beg of God that he may not permit you to rest satisfied with a mere speculative assent to the gospel history. If we are saved in the next life, we must be gathered to Christ in this. Nothing short of the inward, effectual call, can stamp us Christians in deed and in truth. Nothing will make us lead holy lives on earth but an experience of the life and power of grace in our souls. Nor will any thing short of Jacob's faith make us face death with Jacob's comfort.

And what is death to those that are born of God? It is but another gathering of them unto Christ. The soul of a saint is gathered from the body as a flower from the stalk; to adorn the court of heaven, and to bloom for ever in the bosom of God. They who are gathered to him by grace are, at death, only gathered into glory.

Their bodies too shall be gathered from the grave and rescued from the dominion of death; when Shiloh comes, the second time, to renew the face of the earth, and to begin his millennial reign. He, whose voice is as the sound of many waters, will say to his angels, when he appears in the clouds of heaven,—Gather my saints together unto me, who have made a covenant with me by sacrifice: who died, trusting in my righteousness, and depending on the merit of my blood, which I shed for the remission of their sins, when I offered myself up in sacrifice on the cross.

To him, in some sense, shall all flesh come. Before him shall be gathered all nations, and at his tribunal shall every knee bow. Thus, in every signification of the term, To him shall the gathering of the people be; and he will sever them, one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats; and set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left.

Eternal Spirit of grace, gather us here to him by the energy of thy renewing power! so, at death, shall our souls be gathered into heaven; and our mortal bodies shall be sown in the grave, only to be ripened and refined, until the resurrection of the just

A MEDITATION FOR A NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

Suggested by some remarkable passages in the twenty-first Chapter of Revelation; particularly by that which immediately follows.

He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new.

As the opening of the present year has recalled a train of reflections, which have not been wholly useless to myself, I transmit the substance of them to the press,* at the same time breathing his earnest wishes to the great Sovereign of eternity, and Author of time, in behalf of my readers, and of myself, that, together with a new year, he would be graciously pleased to give us new hearts, and enable us to lead new lives; renew and brighten our experiences and our evidences; give us new hold on the everlasting covenant; and write the law of faith and obedience, by the finger of his Spirit, on our inmost souls, more deeply, more feelingly, more comfortably, and more visibly, than ever. So shall we rise into an increasing meetness for that state of glory where the distributions of duration are not measured and regulated by a created sun; but Jesus, the uncreated and eternal Sun of righteousness, shines, and will for ever shine, on the whole choir of his glorifying and glorified people.—Phosphore, redde diem!

A considerable part of the following meditation refers to the doctrine of the millennium: a doctrine, which many excellent persons are inclined to disapprove. It may be proper to assure these that as much as relates to that article is inserted, not with a view to offend, or to perplex the mind of any man; much less with an intention to obtrude my own private opinion upon other people, or even to proselyte a single reader to the belief of it: least of all, with a desire to raise any controversy about it. But, as the question is naturally connected with the present occasion, I could not have done justice to the subject, without touching on that string: and I have endeavoured to touch it as concisely, as tenderly, and as inoffensively, as I was able. If I have erred, I hope I shall not displease: for which I throw myself on the public candour.

GREAT, unspeakably great, are the Mediator's power and glory. He will eminently display them both at that blessed, that most desirable period, when he shall be manifested a second time, at the end of the world; and appear not as at first, to suffer and die, but to reign on earth, with his saints, prelude to their final glorification in heaven.

Every thing below is changeable. The expiration of one year, and the birth of another; the successions of the several seasons, and the regular vicissitudes of day and night; all conspire to remind us, how transitory, how various, and how uncertain, our time is; and unite in calling upon us to look beyond the present valley, through which we travel, to the mount of God, the habitation of angels, and the saints' eternal home.

As the things of this world are thus liable to perpetual mutation, so are its best blessings mingled, even for the time being, with their respective inconveniences. Imperfection is written, not only on all we are, and on all we do; but likewise, on all we enjoy. This has been invariably the case, ever since man fell in paradise. With perfect innocence, perfect happiness took her flight: nor will either of them be seen on earth again, until that distinguished time arrive, when He that sitteth upon the throne shall say, Behold; I make all things new.

The whole frame, even of material nature, deviated into disorder from the moment Adam sinned. The elements acquired a propensity to hurt, unknown before. The earth teemed with thorns, and refused to supply its fallen master with food convenient for him, but on condition of labour and toil. Water and fire, though in themselves two of the most important sublunary gifts, received, nevertheless, a power to injure and destroy. The very air we breathe is frequently the region of disease, and the vehicle of death.

If such be the present state of the material world, how much less pleasing is the visible state of the moral world! But I willingly draw the curtain before a scene which, on a superficial view of things, seems rather calculated to excite our concern than joy. Both Scripture, philosophy, and reason, concur in assuring us, that the all wise God, by whose permission every event comes to pass, must have the justest causes, both for the good he does, and for the evil he permits.

It is enough for us to know that a day will dawn when a period shall be put to every disorder under which nature at present labours; and that the earth will become just what it was (perhaps considerably better than it was) ere sin destroyed the harmony, and broke the balance of the well-according system. The stupendous accomplishment of this predestined (f) restoration is largely and explicitly foretold, Rev. xx. where we read, that the apostate angels shall be restrained by the coercive power of God, and confined to their own place for 1000 years. That those of mankind who belong to Christ; and especially such of them as have been, or are yet to be, slain for his name's sake shall reign with him upon earth, during that given period. And that the bodies of the reprobate dead shall not be raised, until that period is fully expired.

The next chapter opens with acquainting us that, prior to the actual commencement of the millennium, a new heaven, i. e. a new body of surrounding air, and a new earth, shall be prepared for the residence of Christ and the elect. I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. Intimating, that this terraqueous globe, and its circumambient atmosphere, will be so purified by the preceding general conflagration, as to be totally changed in their qualities, and entirely divested of every thing noxious, or that can cause disgust and pain. And I John saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down from God

(f) For farther satisfaction on this subject, if the reader is disposed to consider it, he may consult the third Volume of the present Bishop of Bristol's Dis-

out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. By the holy city, I understand the departed souls of the elect, which had all been received into glory, from the moment of their dismissal from the body. These are termed holy, because of their separation unto God, by the decree of election: and because of their complete sanctification by the Spirit of grace. They are a city, because of their multitude, dignity, splendour, and unity with each other. These, when Christ appears, shall come down with him from God out of heaven; in order to be reunited to their respective bodies, which will then be raised by the voice of the archangel, and by the trump of God. Their beatified souls thus descending, will be prepared, as a bride, adorned for her husband; clothed with perfection of grace, and radiant in the robes of immortality and glory; suitable to the state of those who are to reign with Christ, as kings and priests to the Father. Those of the elect who shall be found alive on earth at Christ's appearing will be changed, in the twinkling of an eye (1 Cor. xv.) i. e. their souls will be instantaneously perfected in grace, and their bodies immortalized; and thus will they render the Church of the first born complete, and be caught up to meet the Lord, and their glorified brethren in the air. (1 Thess. iv.)

And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. Thus will angels and saints shout in concert. And let me observe, by the way, that it is impossible for the utmost power of language to express the Deity of Christ, in terms more strong, explicit, and decisive. The tabernacle of God is with men, and God himself, [i. e. Christ, in his own proper and individual person] shall be with them, and be their God. With what eyes does an Arian, or a Socinian, read the Scriptures?

The felicity of the Millenary state is next described:—First, God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. The world as it now is, is a valley of tears; and even God's own people have their weeping days below. But in the renewed world, wherein righteousness shall dwell (2 Pet. iii.) no sigh shall heave the breast, no pang shall rend the heart, no tear shall stain the cheek:—Second, And there shall be no more death. Each saint will possess personal immortality. We shall never die ourselves: nor be robbed by death of our Christian friends. Third: Neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain of body or mind.—For fourthly, the former things are passed away; all possible occasions of distress and uneasiness being for ever and totally removed; the blessed inhabitants of the new earth will be crowned with unmixed honour, holiness, and joy.

The sacred penman assigns a cause adequate to these great effects. And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. It will be a new formation indeed. Dr. Watts paraphrases the passage, with great beauty and justness, in those admired lines:—

Attend, while God's Eternal Son
Doth his own glory shew!
Behold, I sit upon my throne,
Creating all things new.
Nature and sin are past away,
And the old Adam dies;
My hands a new foundation lay
See a new world arise!

On what throne does the adored Immanuel sit?—On the throne of nature: for without him was not any thing made that is made. On the throne of providence: for all things are upheld by the word of his power, and governed by the counsel of his will.—On the throne of grace, as Mediator of the covenant: and as the Saviour of all who recline on his blood and righteousness. On the throne of his converted people's hearts: inspiring them with good, and restraining them from evil; sanctifying them by his presence, and cheering them with the smiles of his love: He will occupy the Millennial throne: as head of all principality and power.—He will also sit on the throne of universal judgment: assigning the heavenly inheritance to the saints on his right hand; and denouncing the sentence of condemnation against the unholy on his left. He will for ever and for ever sit on the throne of glory: encompassed by the angels he created, and by the people he redeemed. A cross was once his humble throne: and his crown was a diadem of thorns. A reed, once served him for a mock sceptre; and insulting ridicule was the homage he received. But his humiliation ended when he rose from the dead. He is set down at the Father's right hand; and, though a lamb (for he still wears the human nature in which he was sacrificed for our salvation), is in the midst of the throne, and the immortal inheritor of endless honour, and glory, and blessing.

Reader, dost thou say within thyself "Happy the people who are washed in the blood of Him that sitteth upon the throne; and are arrayed in the righteousness of him that maketh all things new?" I can give you one sign, whereby to know, whether this happiness is evidently yours. Has Christ, by the power of his spirit, made thy soul anew? Has he begun to introduce his new creation there? God forbid that we should enter upon a new year, without seriously inquiring, Whether he, who maketh all things new, has given us a new nature and a new name? You may read the character of those, who shall be excluded from the

New-Jerusalem state, in the chapter which has supplied us with the above remarks. The fearful, who deny Christ or his truths from worldly motives; and the unbelieving, who depend on their own repentance in the room of Christ's blood, and on their own works, in the room of or conjointly with Christ's righteousness; and the abominable, i. e. in general, all who are grossly and daringly immoral; more particularly, murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.

In like manner spake Isaiah many centuries before, in his xxxvth chapter; where, referring to the Millenniary dispensation, he thus proceeds: The unclean shall not pass over it; no sinner that is unjustified and unsanctified shall have any share in the blessings of that holy state: No lion shall be there; no unregenerate person, none who is a stranger to the meekness and gentleness of Christ: nor shall any ravenous beast go up thereon: no man, in his natural state, no avaricious harpies, or sensualized worldlings, who die unchanged by grace, shall participate in the first resurrection, or attain to the glory which is reserved for the sons of God; but the redeemed shall walk there; the redeemed from sin, who are ransomed by the atonement, and made holy by the spirit of Christ.

What shall I say farther, to the reader? Shall I wish him joy of the new year, into which the good hand of Providence has brought us? I do: and chiefly, I wish him to be a partaker of that joy which cometh from above. I wish, as the apostle did, that the God of hope may fill you with all joy and peace in believing, and cause you to abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost. If thou art already a believer, the Lord crown the new year with his goodness, by giving thee a fresh out-pouring of faith, holiness, and liveliness! If you are not a believer, God confer on you the best new year's gift, by granting you to experience the new birth unto faith and good works! What will become of you, if you die without that experience learned from Christ's own mouth? He who sitteth upon the throne; he who maketh all things new; has, himself, most solemnly and irrevocably averred, that, unless you are made anew, unless you are born again of the Holy Ghost, you shall not so much as see, much less inherit, the kingdom of God.

O, pray to him for faith; and he who prepares your heart to call upon him will hearken to your cry. Throw yourself, for eternal life, on the merits of Jesus; and then, whether you believe the doctrine of the millennium, or not, you will certainly have a part in the blessedness of the state itself, and the second death shall have no power over you

A DESCRIPTION OF ANTINOMIANISM.

"For I delight in the law of God, after the inward man."—ROM. VII. 22.

STRICTLY speaking, an Antinomian is one who is "an enemy to the revealed law of God," which is two-fold; moral, and ceremonial. Our obligation to observe the ceremonial law was superseded by the incarnation, sufferings, and death of Christ. The sun of righteousness himself being risen, the ritual stars which pre-typified his approach were thrown into shades, never to appear again, except descriptively and historically in the records of the Old Testament. Hence it was prophesied, concerning Christ, that he should "cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease." (a) And St. Paul declares, that "the hand-writing of the Levitical ordinances is blotted out," (b) yea, that it is "abolished, (c) and disannulled, because of the weakness and [αυωφελος] uselessness thereof." (d) Even while the Jewish dispensation obtained, the ceremonial law was always intrinsically weak, as not being able (nor indeed was it ever designed) to make the comers thereunto perfect, or to be a real expiation of sin. (e) All its value and virtue consisted in its prefiguring the person by whom, and shadowing forth the way in which, sin is expiated, and sinners saved. Thus these emblematic services were at best weak, though extremely significant in their import, and for the time being enjoined by the authority of God. But, ever since the Messiah's actual sacrifice of himself, they are likewise become useless in point of practical observance. The end of their institution is completely answered, and we are become dead to the Aaronic law in particular by the body of Christ. (f) The question, therefore, now depending, has no kind of reference to the ceremonial appointments under the old administration, since it is universally agreed that a man may assert the total disuse of these, and yet be no Antinomian, according to the proper sense of that term.

Men are, or are not, to be stiled Antinomians with relation to the moral law: consequently the general definition given above may be reduced to a yet narrower compass; and the term Antinomian will be found strictly to import one who is an enemy to the moral law of God, revealed in the Holy Scriptures; and this Antinomianism, or enmity to the moral law, may be distinguished into speculative and practical.

1. Speculative Antinomianism is predicable of any man and of every man, whose scheme of religious principles is such as either directly, or by unavoidable consequence, tends to set aside the necessity of personal and social morality.

2. Practical Antinomianism is the habitual, allowed, and persevering violation of those precepts which God hath prescribed for the adjustment of our outward conduct; whether those rules regard our demeanour toward him, toward our neighbour, or toward ourselves. Let a person's idea be ever so orthodox, yet, if his life be immoral, he is, to all intents and purposes, a practical Antinomian, and unless the effectual grace of the Holy Spirit intervene, to retrieve him from the dominion of his sins, he must after death be one of those to whom Christ will say, "Depart from me; I never knew you, ye workers of iniquity."

It evidently appears, from this plain state of the case, that no true believer can possibly be an Antinomian.—He cannot be speculatively such, for "he delights in the law of God after the inner man," (g) and holds, with St. Paul, that he (h) is not without law to God, but actually ενομος, with the dominion, and subject to the preceptive authority of the moral law unto Christ; from principles of faith and love, and from a desire to glorify God, and benefit his neighbour.—Much less can the true believer be a practical Antinomian. What we love we follow: "trahit sua quemque voluptas." He that loves the law of God will aim at conformity to that law; for "how shall we, who are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" (i) yet it does not follow from this text that God's converted people are sinners. They are indeed said to be dead to sin. But there is a total death, and a partial death. We experience the latter from the first moment of our regeneration. We shall not experience the former till mortality is swallowed up of life. "The spirits of just men are not made perfect in holiness till they ascend from the body to join the innumerable company of angels" that surround the throne. (j)

We shall now set down some of the reasons why no true believer can be a practical Antinomian: which are, first, one who truly believes must antecedently to that faith have been spiritually "born of God; and he that is born of God will do the works of God." "They that are after the flesh," who are in state of nature and unregeneracy, do mind and follow "the things of the flesh:" but "they that are after the Spirit," who have been renewed by his effectual influence, cannot fail to mind and follow "the things of the Spirit." (k) Where the Holy Ghost dwells his gracious fruits will infallibly and necessarily appear; and the fruit of the Spirit, the practical effect of his saving operation on the heart, is manifested in and by "all goodness, and righteousness, and truth." (l) The regenerate elect are the peculiar workmanship of God, "created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath fore-ordained that they should walk in," (m) as therefore God's fore-ordination cannot be rendered void, and as the new-creating agency of his Spirit, by which faith is wrought, cannot but lead to holiness of life, it follows, that no true believer can be a practical Antinomian.

Secondly, One who truly believes must have been convinced of sin: he has so far tasted of the evil and bitterness of iniquity as to know and feel that sanctification constitutes the intrinsic dignity, and conduces to the supreme felicity of man; consequently, was it only from a principle of self-interest (to go no higher,) he cannot but breathe the Psalmist's prayer, "Make me to go in the path of thy commandments, for therein is my desire." (n) And the leading desire of the heart will ever, under such circumstances, influence the conduct of the life.

Thirdly, a true believer has "the love of God shed abroad in his heart," (o) which more forcibly than even the considerations of dignity and happiness, effectually, but sweetly, constrains him to perform the good which his heavenly Father enjoins, and to shun the evil which his heavenly Father forbids. Hence by the apostle, "love unfeigned" is connected with "purity, long suffering," and "the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left." (p) In like manner, faith is expressly declared to "work by love," (q) not by servile dread, but by filial affection. As faith is the seed whence evangelical morality springs, so love to God is the genial beam that awakens the powers of faith, calls them forth into act, and adorns the conversation with the leaves and flowers and fruits of pure and undefiled religion. It is the work, not of fear, but of faith; it is the labour, not of legality, but of love, which indicate our "election of God." (r) Forgive the repetition; for it is a repetition of the apostle's own; it is "the work and labour of love," which God will "not forget." (s) If he did he would be unrighteous, i. e. unjust to his own solemn, but absolutely gratuitous, promise, whereby real grace, meliorating the heart and shining in the life, stands indissolubly, yet most freely connected with the never-ending happiness of heaven.

It is evident from the above remarks, deduced from clear and express testimonies of

(g) Rom. vii. 22. (h) I Cor. ix. 21. (i) Rom. vi. 2.
(j) Heb. xii. (k) Rom. viii. 5. (l) Eph. v. 9.
(m) Eph. ii. 10. (n) Psalm cxix. (o) Rom. viii.

inspiration, that love to God (which can only result from a sense of his prior love to us, (f) is the operative, producing principle of acceptable obedience. It is also the producing principle of acceptable sufferings for his sake. "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and of love, and of a sound mind;" on which remark the apostle rests the following exhortation: "be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, but be partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God." (u) Now, the graces of faith and love being inseparable, it follows that every true believer is also a lover of Christ. Where this love exists, it is crowned and evidenced by the assemblage both of active and of passive virtues.

Even Dr. Young could sing,

and an infinitely superior authority has expressly decided that "love to God and man is the fulfilling of the law," (x) i. e. love when real will put us on the vigorous and persevering discharge of every moral duty: consequently, as before, no true believer can be a practical Antinomian.

A multitude of additional arguments might be alleged to the same effect, but I shall at present confine myself to the following, viz. That a true believer cannot be a practical Antinomian, because he prizes and wishes to cultivate communion with God, as the sublimest privilege and enjoyment which it is possible to inherit below. But all wilful and allowed deviations from virtue have an innate tendency to interrupt that enjoyment, and to intercept the light of God's countenance; nay, to spread a screen of separation between us and our views of Christ, to darken our evidences, to deaden our joys, and to render the soul a counterpart to Ezekiel's roll, which was "written within and without, with lamentation and mourning and woe."

Finally, That person must know little indeed of experimental religion, who can suppose that any pleasures or profits of sin, or all of them together, can compensate for one moment's loss of intercourse with God, as reconciled to us in his dear Son

THOUGHTS ON REV. VII. 14, 15,

"These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple."

THE Scripture particularly sets forth these three things, viz. 1. What we are by nature. 2. What we must be made of grace: and, 3. What those who are possessed by grace shall be in glory.

St. John had a blessed vision of the latter; of the glory of the saints in light; and of the delightful employ, in which the spirits of just men, made perfect, are engaged. Their number exceeded the utmost arithmetic of angels and men,—yet are they all minutely numbered by that omniscient Being who wrote their names in his book; and whose praise they celebrate in ceaseless songs of adoration, harmony, and love. They stand before the throne, and before the Lamb; clothed with white robes, and palms of immortal victory in their hands.

Do we ask, "Who are these, that are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they?" A heavenly intelligencer will inform us. Pause then, my soul, a moment. Fix thy meditation on the solemnly delightful subject; and may it have a happy tendency to raise thy affections to things above!

I. They came out of great tribulation: εκ της θλιψεως της μεγαλης. The words signify, very grievous oppression, affliction, and trouble, of every kind. The distresses of God's people are various, and flow from a vast multiplicity of sources. They are tried by the world, outwardly; and, inwardly, by their own corruptions. A believing man's greatest foes are often those of his own house; and, especially, the many evils that are in his own heart. How pathetically did St. Paul complain of the body of sin and death which he carried about with him; and how deeply did he groan, being burdened! The Christian is frequently, like Gideon's men, faint, yet pursuing. God is pleased, sometimes, to hide his face; then are the souls of his people cast down, and disquieted within them. But a great (perhaps the greater) part of their trouble and distress, arises from a consciousness of their own barrenness, ingratitude, and want of fervour in their Redeemer's service; although

II. They are enabled to wash their robes, and make them white in the blood of the Lamb.

By their robes, I presume, we are not here to understand the robe of imputed righteousness, in which they are justified, and stand perfect before God: for that robe does not need washing, being no less than the complete obedience of God incarnate. Their own best duties, services, and religious performances, of any and of every kind, were the robes in which they visibly appeared before men, and by which their faith was made manifest to the world. For though good works do not procure (so far from it, they have no share in procuring) a believer's justification in the sight of God, yet they follow after the grace of Christ, and are pleasing to God and profitable to men. So just is that remark of St. Austin,—Bona opera non creant iustum, sed iustificatus

(f) 1 John iii. 1; and iv. 10. 19.

(u) 2 Tim. i. 7, 8. (x) Rom. xiii. 10.

facit bona opera. This is also agreeable to St. Peter's strain of arguing. (y) Moreover, the blood of the Lamb, in which the righteous wash their robes, is and must be a very different thing from the robes themselves. May not this be the simple meaning? True believers, after all they do and suffer, trust not in their doings and sufferings, either in whole or in part, but in the atonement made by Immanuel's blood; and in that work of vicarious righteousness which Immanuel accomplished by his obedience unto death."

3. Their bliss and exaltation are described in these charming words: Therefore are they before the throne of God. Not because they came out of great tribulation, but because they and their robes were washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. Being freely interested in Jesus, they are saved by grace; and the God of grace has all the glory.

CONSIDERATIONS ON HEB. VI. 4—6.

"For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good Word of God, and the powers of the world to come; if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."

I HAVE been solicited to give an elucidation of the above-mentioned text: and the rather, because that awful passage may seem, at first view, and in the eyes of a mere English reader to carry a dubious aspect, as though the faith of God's elect might ultimately fail: and as though God himself might break his covenant and alter the thing that is gone-out of his lips.

It is impossible for those who were [1.] once enlightened, and [2.] have tasted of the heavenly gift, and [3.] were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and [4.] have tasted the good word of God, and [5.] the powers of the world to come; if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance: seeing they [1.] crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and [2.] put him to an open shame.

1. It is said concerning these possible apostates from the Christian profession,

[1.] That "they were once enlightened;" απαξ φωτισθηντας, once (z) baptized into the visible church of Christ. Every person, who is at all acquainted with ecclesiastical antiquity, knows that βαπτισμος and φωτισμος were, very frequently, put for each other, and used as reciprocal terms. Nor need we observe that amongst the classical distinctions, which obtained in the primitive Churches, were the following distributions of professors into these different ranks of Church-membership. 1. The κατηχημενοι, or Catechumens; i. e. those adults who were not deemed sufficiently instructed and matured in the things of God to be yet admitted to baptism.—2. The σφωτισμενοι, i. e. enlightened or baptized; those who had actually been initiated by their suscription of that ordinance. And 3. the αρτιοι, or τετελεισμενοι, i. e. the perfect; viz. such as had not only been baptized, but who were likewise partakers of all the privileges of God's house, and who were considered as stablished, strengthened, settled in the faith of Christ, and fully entitled to unlimited citizenship in the Church below. It follows that "they who were once enlightened," or "baptized," might indeed make total and final shipwreck of their profession; and many of them actually did so. They were (as another apostle expresses it) twice dead: i. e. naturally dead, or unregenerate; and professionally dead. According to those words of our Lord, From him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he seemeth to have. (a)

[2.] They are described, as having "tasted of the heavenly gift:" or, as having been admitted to a participation of the Lord's Supper.

[3.] They were "partakers of the Holy Ghost:" i. e. of gifts, qualifying them for temporary usefulness in the Church, and enabling some of them even to preach the gospel with success. There is, I apprehend, no part of scripture which forbids us to suppose that Judas himself might have been, in this sense, a "partaker of the Holy Ghost;" i. e. furnished with ministerial talents, for the benefit of others. And yet it is certain that Judas never was a regenerated man: (b)

[4.] They have "tasted the good word of God:" or had some acquaintance with the Scripture, and some relish for its doctrines. To this class, Herod and Simon Magus may be referred: (c)

[5.] They shared in "the powers of the world to come." By that phrase, the world to come, αιων ο μελλων (which may be better rendered, the future age, or dispensation,) the ancient Jews universally meant the times of the Messiah. And St. Paul, in other parts of this very Epistle (the whole of which he particularly designed for the instruction of the Hebrew proselytes), makes use of this same term, and evidently in their own sense of it. Consequently, by the δυναμεις i. e. "powers or miracles of the Messiah's dispensation;" is meant the ability of working miracles in proof of the gospel.—This ability a man might have without a grain of saving grace in his heart.

(y) 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4.

(b) John vi. 61, and xiii. 10, 11.

(c) Mark vi. 20. Acts viii. 13.

St. Paul, elsewhere, supposes it possible for a person to be endued with what is commonly called "the faith of miracles;" and yet to be totally void of charity, or real love to God. (d)

On those parts of this passage which we have hitherto considered, the following words of our Lord may stand as the best explanation that can possibly be given. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity. (e) With all their retinue of useful gifts, these possessors of them were never themselves in a state of grace. Christ never knew them, i. e. never loved and never acknowledged them, as true members of that mystic body which he died to save. And, in answer to every possible instance of professional apostacy that ever was and ever can be alleged, the following remark of St. John will always hold true; They went out from us, i. e. they passed, during a time, for true believers, but they were not of us; for, if they had been of us, they would, no doubt, have continued with us. (f)

II. The nature of their defection is pointed out. 1. They crucify εαυτοις, (g) within themselves, the Son of God afresh: i. e. they, as it were, act the crucifixion of Christ over again, in their own minds, and by word of mouth; forasmuch as they inwardly approve and outwardly justify and applaud the treatment which Jesus met with. They blasphemously style the Lord of glory an impostor; and make his murder in some sense their own act and deed, by horribly thinking and declaring that he was deservedly put to death. In so doing, they,

(2.) Put him, so far as in them lies, to open shame.—No wonder that it should be pronounced humanly impossible to renew or to restore again to Church-communion, and to repentance, such worse than infernal wretches; to whom in all probability is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

REMARKS ON ECCLES. VII. 16

"Be not righteous over-much, neither make thyself over-wise; why shouldst thou destroy thyself?"

The carnal Jews, being ignorant of God's righteousness, went about to establish their own: and, from a supposition that they must appear before God in their legal garments, they fasted, prayed, and even scourged themselves, to make their imaginary righteousness more complete. The above austerities being carried on with such rigour, as threatened ultimate injury to the health of the self-righteous ascetics; and Solomon, knowing that bodily exercise, legally performed, would profit them nothing; advised them not to carry their misguided zeal too far, to so little purpose: Be not righteous over-much.

Moreover, as their wisdom (being from beneath, and contrary to the wisdom of God, which reveals the glorious righteousness of our adorable Saviour) had a strong tendency to make them lose sight of salvation by the Messiah alone, to swell them with self-conceit, and fire their imagination with undue opinion of their own excellence; the sacred writer, thoroughly aware of the tremendous consequences which must follow on a final persistence in delusion like this, adds, Neither make thyself over-wise. As if he had said: By carnal wisdom ye can never know God. It only makes you more fit for hell. And, what ever others may do, my son, be thou better instructed; for why shouldst thou destroy thyself, by setting up thy own righteousness in opposition to the merits of Christ; and thy own fancies, in opposition to the way of justification planned and revealed by God?"

I doubt not it will be readily allowed that there is no danger of our being too righteous in a gospel sense; nor of our having too much of that wisdom which maketh wise unto salvation.

OBSERVATIONS ON 1 COR. XV. 28.

"And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him; that God may be all in all."

THOSE words are of unspeakable importance. Much, very much indeed, depends on a right understanding of them. Here let it be observed,

1. That the Son of God, as such, is and must be God, or a person in the divine nature. "Unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God," &c. (h)—"The Son of God was manifested;" is the same with "God was manifested in the flesh:" (i)—Certain it is, that the eternal Deity of the second person in the Trinity results necessarily and solely from his eternal Sonship, or from his having been everlastingly begotten of the Father in the same infinite and undivided essence.

2. The Son of God, as such, cannot possibly be inferior to the Father. There can be no difference, and consequently no inequality of nature, between them. Even among men, a son is as much a human being as his father: and, surely, the uncreated and eternally begotten Son of the Father Almighty is and must be as truly a divine being as the Father who begat him.

3. We are expressly assured that the throne of God the Son is for ever and ever. (k) And that, even considering him, net in his divine and essential character, as Son of the Father, but viewing him in his human, œconomical, and assumed character, as man and Mediator, he shall reign over the house of Jacob [or the elect Church of God] for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end: Isa. ix. 7. Luke i. 33.

It follows, from the above premises, that, when we read of a future period, in which the Son also himself shall be subject [ὑποταγησεται, shall be subordinate, or shall act in subserviency] to the Father, it cannot be understood of him as man and Mediator: for, in those capacities he did from the first, and to this moment does, act "subjectively, subordinately, and subserviently," to the Father's will and designs. John iv. 30, and vi. 38.

5. Consequently the future subordination, or subserviency, spoken of in this text, must be some voluntary act of surrender and acknowledgment which (not the man Christ Jesus, but which) the co-eternal and co-equal Son of God will make to the Father, when the whole number of the elect shall be gathered in.

6. What act of subserviency, or of acknowledgement and surrender, will the Son then make? The apostle tells us: "He shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even to the Father." What kingdom? Not his essential royalty, as God with God: for that is inseparable from each of the three divine persons. Nor his presidency over the church as her Head and Mediator: for that relation is indissoluble, and he will ever shine as the first-born among many brethren. But I take the kingdom to consist of that innumerable company whose names were written in heaven; and which, when their numerical fulness is completed, the Son of God, who graciously consented to become the Son of man for their sakes, will present in one entire and glorified body to the Father. Thus God will then be all in all: i. e. the Son will say to the Father, and to the Holy Spirit, "Our covenant-designs are now completely fulfilled. I undertook to redeem the elect, and redeem them I did. Thy predestination, O Sovereign Father of mercies, has now its full accomplishment. Thy gracious operations, likewise, O Spirit of holiness, have had their entire effect: who didst engage to renew, sanctify, and preserve the people of my Father's choice, and of my redemption. Here they all stand, washed and clothed by me, and sealed and purified by thee. Not one of them is absent, and not one of our purposes has miscarried in a single instance. Grace reigns, through my righteousness, unto eternal life: and we, the triune God, are all in all!"—Amen. Amen.

EXPLICATION OF ROM. VIII. 4.

"That the Righteousness of the Law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the Flesh, but after the Spirit."

THE works of the law, and the righteousness of the law, are synonymous terms. By the former we are expressly told no flesh can be justified: nor, consequently, by the latter, as performed by us. Why? Because every man is a fallen creature; and to the corruption of his nature is hourly adding the accumulated iniquity of actual transgressions. Therefore, by such a partial, imperfect, and polluted conformity to the moral law, no person can possibly be accepted unto life. And yet, without justification, man must be lost for ever. He must, therefore, either give up all hope of salvation, or seek for a justifying righteousness at the hand of Christ. Now Christ came for this very end, to fulfil all righteousness; not for himself, who was and is the source and centre of all holiness; but for us, who had lost our original rectitude, and are become the degenerate plants of a strange vine. The Son of God left his glory, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled for us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. This must certainly be the genuine import of the text under consideration. ἵνα το δικαιομα τη νομε πληρωθη εν ημιν, the exact sense of which, according to the genius of the original, stands thus: "That the righteousness required by the law might be fulfilled for us," i. e. in our stead, or on our account. Thus Theophylact on the place: ὁ γαρ ὁ νομος ἐβλεπο μεν, ἡσθηνει δε, τατο ὁ Χριστος ἐποιησε δι ημας. What the law was desirous of [viz. perfect obedience, in order to justification], but through weakness could not obtain, that did Christ perform for us. Now to render the preposition εν, by for, instead of in, does not put the least violence upon the words of the apostle. The same preposition signifies for in many other parts of the sacred writings. For instance, Mat. vi. 7. They think to be heard, εν τη πολυλογια αυτων, for their much speaking.—Gal. i. 24. εδοξαζον εν εμοι τον Θεου, they glorify God for me, i. e. in my behalf, on my account.—Eph. iv. 1. I a prisoner εν Κυρω, for the Lord, i. e. on Christ's account, and for the sake of his gospel. And ver. 32. Even as God, εν Κυρω, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you.—Phil. i. 26. That your rejoicing in Christ Jesus may abound, εν εμοι, for me.—1. Pet. iv. 14. If ye are reproached, εν ονοματι Χριστου for the name of Christ. More examples might be easily produced, but these may suffice.

Admit this translation of the preposition εν to be just in this place (and I think it is self-evidently so) and there is not, in the whole book of God, a passage wherein the glorious Suretyship obedience of the Lord Jesus Christ is more clearly and solidly asserted.

AN EXPLICATION OF THAT REMARK-ABLE PASSAGE,

(ROM. ix. 3.)

"I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ, for my Brethren, my kinsmen according to the Flesh."

This seemingly difficult text is rendered perfectly easy and clear, 1. by inclosing part of it in a parenthesis; and, 2, by attending to the tense of the verb ηυχόμεν, mistakenly translated, I could wish.

I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart (for I myself, ηυχόμεν), did wish to be in a state of separation from Christ, on account of my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh. That is to say, "I am deeply concerned for my unbelieving countrymen: and I the more pity and lament their enmity against Jesus, because I myself was, once, exactly in their situation; and know, by my own past experience, the bitterness and danger of their infidel state." Something like the speech of Dido, in Virgil:

Haud ignara mali, miseris succurrere disco.

AN ILLUSTRATION CONCERNING

1 COR. xv. 29.

"Else what shall they do, who are baptized for the Dead?"

It may be remarked on this portion of sacred writ, that superstition, and a too great stress on the mere opus operatum of ordinances, began, very early, to encroach on the simplicity and spirituality of the gospel. Hence, by degrees, the sacrament of baptism was considered as inseparably connected with the absolute and plenary forgiveness of sins, from this mistaken idea, many weak believers were for postponing their own baptism until their last moments. The consequence of which was that some (through sudden death, or other unforeseen exigences) actually died without having been baptized at all. Their surviving relatives, equally superstitious with the deceased, imagined, that, in order to remedy, so far as could be done, the loss of that rite, it would be a deed of charity for one of them to be baptized in the deceased person's name and stead; begging of God at the same time to accept the baptism of the proxy as though it had been administered to the principal.

If this corrupt practice obtained in some of the first churches so early as the days of St. Paul (which, however, we will not venture to affirm), the solution of the text in question will be very easy. The apostle, not from any approbation of this superstitious custom, but merely with a view to convince the Corinthians of the certainty of a resurrection, by an argument ad hominem, i. e. by an argument founded on their own principle and practice; reasons thus: "What shall they do who are baptized [ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν] for, or "instead of, the dead?" i. e. What can be the design of them, who act in this manner, but to benefit (as they fondly suppose) the persons who died unbaptized? But, if these persons so died, as not to live again, your imaginary labour of love can answer no valuable end whatever. Ye are, therefore, O Corinthians, self-convicted of the grossest absurdity, as many of you as are baptized for your departed friends, and yet doubt the future resurrection of your friends departed.

EXPLANATION ON THAT DECLARA-TION OF THE APOSTLE,

1 COR. xv. 5,

WHERE it is said that our Lord, after his resurrection, was seen of Cephas, and then of the twelve, it is inquired, "How is this explained? Seeing Judas had put an end to his own existence long before, could he then be called one of the twelve?"

Certainly not. The late Dr. Guyse, in his most valuable paraphrase and notes on the New Testament, has given this matter a very satisfactory explication. "It is no uncommon thing for a society, body, or college of men, to retain their original name, when one or more of them be absent, or dead. Jacob's sons called themselves twelve brethren, after they supposed that Joseph was lost or dead; Gen. xlii. 13. 32. The triumviri, septemviri, and decemviri, among the Romans, were respectively so called, whether they were all living, or were present in their assemblies, or not. And we commonly speak of points of law being referred to the twelve judges, though several of them may be absent, and some of them dead. In like manner, Christ having originally appointed twelve apostles, to be in a peculiar manner his witnesses; they were called by that name, after Judas was dead, and before Matthias was chosen in his place to make up the number again; John xx. 24. Yea, and they continued to be spoken of as twelve, after Paul and Barnabas were added to their number, Rev. xxi. 14.—Thus far, the excellent Dr. Guyse: correspondently with whose just remarks, it may be further observed, that, if only forty members of parliament assemble they are termed the House of Commons; though the entire number, if all were present, amounts to 558.

A SACRAMENTAL MEDITATION.

ON CANT. VIII. 14.

"Make haste, my Beloved; and be thou like to a Roe, or to a young Hart on the Mountains of Spices."

EVERY serious and sensible Christian considers the book of Canticles as a storehouse of inward religion, and a treasury of holy experiences. In no part of the Scriptures is the work of the blessed Spirit, on the souls of men, more strikingly and more exactly delineated. If some unhappy persons consider this sacred poem in any other view, it is because they are unacquainted with the power of godliness, and have not experienced that renewal in the spirit of their minds which can alone qualify lost sinners to contemplate, with advantage, the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven.

The Church addresses the passage quoted above to the Saviour, who has redeemed her by his blood. She styles him her Beloved; the object of her supreme affection, and the meritorious procurer of all her happiness. She prays for the manifestations of his spiritual presence; and that those manifestations may be speedy: "Make haste, my Beloved! and be thou, in the swiftness of thy approach, "like to a roe, or to a young hart, on the mountains of spices!" Rapidly as those lively, expeditious animals spring from hill to hill; nimbly as they bound, instantaneously as they leap, on the fragrant mountains of the East; so swiftly do thou lift up the light of thy countenance on thy waiting people, and cheer them with such tokens of thy grace and favour as are more reviving to the soul than all the odours of the spicy mountains are to the fainting traveller. On the other hand, a formal professor does not look upon ordinances as means of inward religion, and as steps to communion with God, through the Spirit: but having skimmed the surface of outward duties, he sits down satisfied with externals, and aims at nothing higher.

Not so are the conduct and views of one, whose heart God hath touched. The truly awakened soul considers all the exterior means of grace but as channels through which grace itself, and the comforts of it, are (in a way of sovereignty and freeness) communicated to them that hunger and thirst after the righteousness of Jesus Christ. And as it is not the mere channel of conveyance, but the water conveyed, which can satisfy thirst; so the Christian is sensible that, not a bare attendance on outward duties, but the presence of God enjoyed under those duties, is that which nourishes the believing soul, and renews the believer's strength. Hence his heart's desire and prayer are similar to the verse immediately preceding the text. "Thou that dwellest in the gardens," thou who condescendest to be constantly present in the hearts and assemblies of thy people, "the companions hearken to thy voice; the Church above, and the Church below, with whom thou hast vouchsafed to contract a gracious intimacy, are delighted with hearkening to thy voice of love: O, cause me to hear it! make me also glad with the joy of thy salvation! give me to see the felicity of thy chosen, and to drink deep of that river, to experience much of that unspeakable fellowship with thyself, which makes glad the city of God both in earth and heaven." Then follows the supplication, "Make haste, my Beloved," &c. with which we began; from all which it appears that Jesus is the object of his people's love.

And whom should we love, if not him who loved us, and gave himself for us? If the bliss even of angels and glorified souls, consists greatly in seeing and praising the Son of God; surely, to love, to trust, and to celebrate the friend of sinners, must be a principal ingredient in the happiness of saints not yet made perfect. Solomon, whose experience of grace was lively and triumphant when he wrote this Song of Songs, declares, in the fifth chapter, "that Christ is altogether lovely." Other objects may be overrated, and too highly esteemed; but so transcendent, so infinite, is the excellency of Christ, that he is, and will be to all eternity, more lovely than beloved. Yet, though all the love possible for saints and angels to shew falls, and will always fall, infinitely short of the Saviour's due: still it is a blessed privilege to love him at all, though in ever so faint a manner, and in ever so low a degree. They that love him at all, wish to love him more: and more and more they shall love him, through the ages of endless duration in heaven, where they shall be like him, and see him as he is.

MEDITATIONS ON THE COLLECT FOR THE FIRST SUNDAY IN ADVENT.

"ALMIGHTY God," &c.—Advent signifies the act of approaching or of coming. The members of Christ's mystic body, the Church, however they may differ in external and non-essential points; yet, are they all firmly united in this faith, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; and consequently very God of very God: that he came to visit us in great humility; that he will come again in the last day to judge both the quick and the dead; and that life immortal is obtained for us, and shall be enjoyed by us, through him only.

These are the doctrines upon which this collect is founded, and which are confessed in it. In the firm belief of these, looking back to Christ's first coming, and forward to his second advent, every believing soul is and will be concerned to cast away the works of darkness; i. e. the evil actings of his corrupt nature; a nature compounded of the pride of the devil and the lust of the beast. And 2, to put on the whole armour of God, brought to light and presented to him by the gospel; even the girdle of truth, the breast-plate of Christ's righteousness, the preparation of the gospel, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit (Eph. v. 14, &c.) And seeing the absolute necessity of casting away the former, and of putting on the latter, believers use all prayer to the God of all grace, for his Spirit to enable them to do both; knowing that without God's effectual grace they can do neither.

Hence observe that this collect breathes a spirit quite contrary both to Antinomian licentiousness, and to Arminian pride.— These are of the works of darkness, enemies to the Church of Christ, and are alike therefore to be detested and cast off. The former brings a reproach on the purity of the gospel, the latter perverts the gracious glad tidings of it. That we may avoid the one, and cast off the other, let us ever remember that all good works are necessary to adorn our holy profession; but that as the Church of England elsewhere speaks, we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God, by Christ preventing us (or being beforehand with us), that we may have a good will; and working with us, when we have that good will. Article X.

CONCISE HISTORY OF THE APOSTLE'S CREED, THE NICENE CREED, THE ATHANASIAN CREED, AND THE TE DEUM.

I. THAT excellent and ancient formulary, commonly called, the Apostle's Creed, was so named, not as if it were written by those illustrious disciples of Christ, but because it contains a general summary or outline of the apostolic doctrines.

Some weak and superstitious people, however, have aimed at reducing it to twelve articles (though it really consists of twenty), in order to have it believed that this creed was drawn up by the twelve apostles, and that each apostle clubbed an article. But let it be observed, (1.) that this tradition was never heard of, so far as appears, for almost four hundred years after Christ. (2.) Rufinus, one of the first assertors of it, is on all hands acknowledged to be an author whose integrity was none of the best. (3.) Neither St. Luke, in the Acts of the Apostles; (4.) nor any of the primitive councils or synods; nor, (5.) any of the more ancient fathers, say one word about the matter; St. Ambrose being the first writer who ascribed this creed to the apostles, as their composition.

Nevertheless, it is a valuable compendium of the Christian faith, and truly apostolical, though not framed by the apostles. It is quite uncertain who were the penmen of it, and when it was penned: but this is no impeachment of its worth, respectability, or usefulness. It seems to have obtained in the Church, about A.D. 300.

II. The Nicene Creed is a most admirable form of sound words, drawn up by the first general council, convened at Nice, A.D. 325.

This celebrated council, which assembled in the great hall of the emperor Constantine's palace at Nice in Bythnia, consisted at a medium of about three hundred bishops, and a vast multitude of inferior clergymen. Its grand object was to counteract the progress of the Arian heresy, then growing rampant; in opposition to which, the creed here framed asserts the eternal generation of the Son of God, and (which are the necessary consequences of that) his co-essentiality and co-equality with the Father. Arius himself, from motives of worldly prudence, subscribed this famous creed; but with most wicked and treacherous mental reservations; just as too many who enter into orders in the Church of England at this very day subscribe this very creed, without believing the eternal generation and the absolute divinity of God the Son, any more than they believe the doctrine of absolute predestination, to which they likewise most solemnly set their hands.

III. The Athanasian Creed chiefly respects the doctrine of the Trinity; the eternal generation and the miraculous incarnation of the second person in the Godhead. It is called St. Athanasius's Creed; not because it was syllabically composed by him, but because it so perfectly accords with the system which that great and good man drew from the Scriptures, and which (at a time when the Arian faction were endeavouring to persecute truth out of the world) he underwent so many dangers, difficulties, and sufferings to defend.

Dr. Waterland, who has professedly written a learned and masterly history of the Athanasian Creed supposes, with the utmost probability, that it was drawn up by Hilary, bishop of Arles, about A.D. 430.

Archbishop Tillotson expressed an impious wish, "That the Church of England was fairly rid of the Athanasian Creed." And why not by the same rule wish her to be fairly rid of a certain troublesome volume (no less galling to Arians and Arminians than the Athanasian Creed and the Thirty-nine Articles can be), viz., that two-edged sword of the Spirit commonly called the Old and New Testaments?

IV. The seraphic hymn, entitled Te Deum, seems to have been collected from some devotional passages in the writings of St. Ambrose and of St. Austin. Dr. Cave, however, thinks it probable that St. Ambrose alone had the honour of composing this divine and almost unequalled song, by way of general antidote against the Arian poison. St. Ambrose died, A. D. 397. St. Austin not until 430.

QUERY, CONCERNING A PASSAGE IN THE MARRIAGE CEREMONY STATED AND RESOLVED.

IN what sense are we to understand that declaration of the husband to his bride, "With my body I thee worship?"

The word worship, in ancient English, signifies neither more nor less than that honour, attention, and respect, which are due to worth-ship, i. e. to distinguished excellence. The Church of England, taking it for granted that a man has a very high opinion of the woman he marries, enjoins him to testify that good opinion; and in such terms as are equivalent to a solemn promise of treating her tenderly and respectfully: or, as the apostle Peter expresses it, of giving honour to the wife, as to ασθερες ερω σκευη, the less robust vessel of the two. 1 Pet. iii. 7.

A late very sensible writer (k) supposes, agreeably to the venerable Hooker's comment on the phrase, that the design of the above stipulation is, "To express that the woman, by virtue of this marriage, has a share in all the titles and honours which are due or belong to the person of her husband. (l)" He also observes that Martin Bucer, who lived at the very time when our Liturgy was composed, translated the passage in question, by cum corpore meo te honoro, i. e. "with my body I thee honour:" and that the learned Mr. Selden renders it corpore meo te dignor.—"It is true," adds Mr. Wheatly, "the modern sense of the word is (or, rather seems,) somewhat different; for which reason, at the review of our Liturgy, after the restoration of king Charles II., the word worship was promised to be changed for that of honour. How the alteration came to be omitted, I cannot discover. But, so long as the old word is explained in the sense here given, one would think no objection could be urged against the using of it."

A CURSORY REVIEW OF VALOUR, PATRIOTISM AND FRIENDSHIP, OCCASIONED BY A LATE CELEBRATED AUTHOR (m) EXCLUDING THEM FROM THE LIST OF VIRTUES.

VALOUR.

LET what will become of prowess, considered merely in a military view, there certainly is a species of it by no means incompatible either with the letter or spirit of the gospel, but warranted by both. Valour properly understood, does not consist in cutting throats with insensibility, nor yet in plundering the weak, trampling on the humble, oppressing the innocent, or doing mischief only because it may be in our power. This is a very unjust definition of the quality in question: true valour is but another word for strength of mind, and is not always constitutional, but sometimes the gift of divine grace, and sometimes the acquired result of reason and reflection. Rash, unjust, and wanton exertions of power differ as much from valour as insolence and pride differ from real dignity, or as lawless lust differs from virtuous love. Valour or firmness of soul may be distinguished in active and passive. The former meets just and necessary dangers with decent intrepidity, as David encountered the Philistine of Gath. The latter sustains incumbent evils with fortitude and composure, and its language is that of St. Paul and of the whole army of martyrs. None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself; I am ready not only to be bound, but also to die at Jerusalem, for the name of the Lord Jesus. Acts xx. 24, and xxi. 13.

"Be strong, and of a good courage," said the Deity to Joshua, "be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed," Josh. i. 9. The promise to obedient Israel was, five of you shall chase a hundred; and a hundred of you shall put ten thousand to flight, and your enemies shall fall before you by the sword, Levit. xxvi. 8. It even seems probable that something analogous to war was carried on literally for a short time in heaven itself, antecedently to the expulsion of the apostate angels, who can hardly be supposed to have quitted the seats of blessedness without force on one part, and unavailing resistance on theirs. It moreover deserves remembrance, that it was among our Lord's last directions to his disciples, He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one. Luke xxii. 36. Now a sword is both an offensive and defensive weapon. The evident purport, therefore, of the injunction is, that emergency may arise wherein it is lawful for Christians to defend themselves by a resolute resistance, and to annoy their enemies by a vigorous assault.

PATRIOTISM.

The prophet Jeremiah was a patriot or most ardent lover of his country, else he would hardly have deplored its calamities in strains so pathetic as these: For the hurt of the daughters of my people am I hurt; I am black, astonishment hath taken hold upon me. Jer. viii. 21. A very considerable part of his prophecy, and almost the whole of his book of Lamentations, are the sympathetic complaints of a religious patriot weeping over the sins and the distresses of his country. Read the 137th Psalm. What is it but the warmest effusions of a patriotic muse (glowing and under the influence of divine inspiration too, glowing I say) with the most exalted and uneradicable love of its country. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her skill in music: if I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth. If I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy, that is, as dearly as I love to join in the public and private worship of God, may my hand never be able to touch the harp to his praise, nor my tongue to sing hymns to the glory of his name; if Judea and her capital are not dearer to me than any other country, and than any other temporal consideration whatever. But what must set the point beyond all further dispute is the example of Christ himself. If he was a patriot, patriotism must be a virtue. And that he was such appears from his weeping over the approaching calamities of his country; the tears which, as man, he shed on that occasion were tears of patriotism.

FRIENDSHIP.

A most tender and peculiar friendship subsisted between Jonathan and David, that Timothy and Philemon were amongst the most intimate and confidential friends of St. Paul, and (what must decisively turn the scale is) that our Lord himself honoured Lazarus and his two sisters, and also the evangelist John, with such a share of his adorable intimacy and friendship as the rest of his disciples, much less the world at large, were by no means admitted to. And that the tears he poured at the tomb of Lazarus were tears of friendship: we should distinguish sufficiently between friendship and benevolence. The latter, according to the amiable genius of Christianity, should extend to all mankind. The former may, without any wrong to others, be lawfully and reasonably restrained to a few.

ON SACRED POETRY.

GOD is the God of truth, of holiness, and of elegance. Whoever, therefore, has the honour to compose or to compile any thing that may constitute a part of his worship should keep those three particulars constantly in view.

As we cannot pray without the exciting and enabling grace of the Holy Ghost (Rom. viii. 26. Jude 20), so neither can we sing spiritually, acceptably, and profitably without the presence and inspiration of the same condescending and most adorable person (1 Cor. xiv. 15. Eph. v. 18, 19). The reason is evident. For what is a psalm or hymn strictly taken but prayer or praise in verse?

The original difference (if any specific difference there originally was) between psalms and hymns, seems to have lain in this; that anciently a psalm was actually set to instrumental music, and usually accompanied by it at the time of singing. (Psalm lxxxi. 2.) A similar or even the self-same composition simply sung without the aid of musical instruments was, perhaps, the primitive definition of an hymn. (Matth. xvi. 30.) By degrees the word psalm became appropriated for respectful distinction's sake to the inspired songs of David and others recorded in Scripture; while succeeding pieces formed on those elevated models, but written from time to time as occasion served by inferior believers, obtained the appellation of hymns.

St. Paul (in Eph. v. 19. and Col. iii. 16.) mentions a species of sacred poetry which he terms ὄδαι πνευματικαί, i. e. "spiritual odes." These, likewise, I take to have been what are usually called human compositions; as much so as the hymns of Prudentius, Beza, Grotius, Witsius, Vida, Dr. Watts, Miss Steele, or Mr. Hart. Such devout productions may be denominated odes or songs at large, because (like many of the Psalms themselves) they admit of much latitude and variety; being not strictly limited to absolute prayer and praise, but occasionally fraught with doctrine, exhortation, and instruction in righteousness; tending, as the apostle expresses it in the passage last cited, to "teach," to "admonish," and to build up one another on our most holy faith. The "odes" which St. Paul recommends "are termed spiritual" ones, because they relate to spiritual things; are written by spiritual persons under the impressions of spiritual influence; and if the good Spirit of God shine upon us at the time, are a most spiritual branch of divine worship; conducing to spiritualize the heart, wing the affections to heaven, and give us a blessed foretaste of the employment and the felicity of elect angels, and of elect souls delivered from the prison of the flesh.

Some worthy persons have been of opinion (and what absurdity is there for which some well-meaning people have not contended?) that it is "unlawful to sing human human compositions in the house of God." But, by the same rule, it must be equally unlawful to preach or publicly to pray, except in the very words of Scripture. Not to observe that many of the best and greatest men that ever lived have both in ancient and modern times been hymn-writers; and that there is the strongest reason to believe that the best Christians in all ages have been hymn-singers. Moreover, the singing of hymns is an ordinance to which God has repeatedly set the seal of his own presence and power; and which he deigns eminently to bless at this very day. It has proved a converting ordinance to some of his people; a recovering ordinance to others; a comforting ordinance to them all; and one of the divinest mediums of communion with God which his gracious benignity has vouchsafed to his Church below.

But, remember, reader, that "none can" truly and savingly "learn the Song of the Lamb" who are not "redeemed from the earth" by his most precious blood: (Rev. xiv. 3.) Pray, therefore, for the effectual operation of the Holy Ghost on thy heart, to apply and make known to thee thy personal interest in the Father's election and in the Son's redemption. So wilt thou not only sing with understanding, but with the Spirit also beaming upon thy soul, and be able experimentally to say,

As from the lute soft music flows,
Obedient to the skilful hand;
So, tuned by thee, my spirit owes
Her harmony to thy command.
Touched by the finger of thy love
Sweet melody of praise I bring
Join in the enraptured choir above,
And feel the bliss that makes thee sing.

REFLECTIONS FOR THE BEGINNING OF THE YEAR 1776

1. OUR highest acknowledgments are due to him whose mercy endureth for ever. To him who crowns each revolving year with the blessings of his goodness, who holds our souls in life, and suffers not our feet to be moved. He alone is worthy to receive the love of our hearts, the tribute of our lips, and the obedience of our hands, even to him be praise and dominion for ever. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things.

2. If we ought to kindle into gratitude, under the sense of his increasing mercies, it is no less our duty and our desire to acknowledge and deplore the accumulating sinfulness which augments with every moment that swells our aggregate of time; who can tell how oft he offendeth?

3. But if we are great debtors, we have also a still greater pay-master. His infinite atonement has discharged the whole. While therefore we remember and feel our unworthiness, let it answer every purpose of humiliation, but not cherish the poisonous root of unbelief. Be the free grace of the Father, the redeeming merit of Jesus, and the sanctifying omnipotence of the Holy Ghost, our sovereign preservatives from distrust, the subjects of our song, and the strength of our joy, all through the allotted paths of our earthly pilgrimage!

4. Through the good hand of God upon us, another year dawns on the present generation. Time is now 5779 years old, and hastens to that grand period when, like a drop that has been severed from the ocean, it shall again be absorbed in that eternity out of which it was taken. Amidst the omnium rerum vicissitudines, or the incessant changes, incident to men and things, previous to the final death of time, we rejoice that the Saviour of sinners and the blessings of his cross, continue immutably the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. Not less than 800 years before his incarnation, he thus addressed his believing people by the mouth of his sublimest prophet: Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath! For the heavens shall vanish away like smoke; and the earth shall wax old like a garment; and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner, but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished. Isa. li. 6. A sheet anchor in every possible storm!

5. What numbers were transmitted to their eternal homes in the course of the year now closed!

"How many sleep, who kept the world awake
With lustre and with noise! Has death-proclaim'd
A truce, and hush his sated lance on high?
'Tis brandish'd still, nor shall the present year
Be more tenacious of her human leaves,
Or spread of feeble life a thinner fall."

Many a lofty head will be laid low before the expiration of 1776. The sad ravages of civil war will too probably, people the regions of the grave with additional thousands, over and above the myriads who never fail to swell the ordinary bills of mortality.—But Providence, unerring Providence, governs all events. Dan. iv. 35. And grace, unchangeable grace, is faithful to its purpose. Rom. viii. 28. May we live by faith on both!

THOUGHTS ON THE ASSURANCE OF FAITH.

THE deep things which relate to personal experience of the Holy Spirit's dealing with the soul ought to be matters of prayer, not of disputation.

It has long been a settled point with me, that the Scriptures make a wide distinction between faith, the assurance of faith, and the full assurance of faith.

1. Faith is the hand by which we embrace, or touch, or reach toward, the garment of Christ's righteousness, for our own justification.—Such a soul is undoubtedly safe.

2. Assurance I consider as the ring which God puts upon faith's finger.—Such a soul is not only safe, but also comfortable and happy.

Nevertheless, as a finger may exist without wearing a ring, so faith may be real without the superadded gift of assurance. We must either admit this, or set down the late excellent Mr. Hervey (among a multitude of others) for an unbeliever. No man, perhaps, ever contended more earnestly for the doctrine of assurance than he, and yet I find him expressly declaring as follows: "What I wrote, concerning a firm faith in God's most precious promises, and a humble trust that we are the objects of his tender love, is what I desire to feel, rather than what I actually experience." The truth is, as another good man expresses it, "A weak hand may tie the marriage-knot; and a feeble faith may lay hold on a strong Christ.

Moreover, assurance after it has been vouchsafed to the soul may be lost. Peter no doubt lost his assurance, and sinned it away, when he denied Christ. He did not, however, lose the principle of faith; for Christ had before-hand prayed, concerning him, that his faith itself might not fail: and Christ could not possibly pray in vain.—A wife may lose her wedding-ring. But that does not dissolve her marriage-relation. She continues a lawful wife still. And yet she is not easy until she find her ring again.

3. Full assurance I consider as the brilliant, or cluster of brilliants, which adorns the ring, and renders it incomparably more beautiful and valuable. Where the diamond of full assurance is thus set in the gold of faith, it diffuses its rays of love, joy, peace, and holiness, with a lustre which leaves no room for doubt or darkness.—While these high and unclouded consolations remain, the believer's felicity is only inferior to that of angels, or of saints made perfect above.

4. After all, I apprehend that the very essence of assurance lies in communion with God. While we feel the sweetness of his inward presence, we cannot doubt of our interest in his tender mercies. So long as the Lord speaks comfortably to our hearts, our affections are on fire, our views are clear, and our faces shine. It is when we come down from the mount, and when we mix with the world again, that we are in danger of losing that precious sense of his love, which is the strength of saints militant, and the joy of souls triumphant.

But let not trembling believers forget that faith, strictly so called, is neither more nor less than a receiving of Christ, for ourselves in particular, as our only possible propitiation, righteousness, and Saviour: John i. 12.—Hast thou so received Christ? Thou art a believer, to all the purposes of safety.—And it deserves special notice that our Lord calls the centurion's faith "great faith;" though it rose no higher than to make him say "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." Matt. viii. 8. 10.

The case likewise of the Canaanitish woman is full to the present point. Her cry was, "Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David!" And, a little after, "Lord, help me!" Jesus at first gave her a seeming repulse: but her importunity continued, and she requested only the privilege of a dog, viz., to eat of the crumbs which fell from the master's table. What were our Saviour's answer and our Saviour's remark? An answer and a remark which ought to make every broken sinner take down his harp from the willows:—"O woman, great is thy faith." Matt. x. 22—28.

5. The graces which the blessed Spirit implants in our hearts (and the grace of faith among the rest) resemble a sun-dial; which is of little service except when the sun shines upon it. The Holy Ghost must shine upon the graces he has given, or they will leave us at a loss (in point of spiritual comfort), and be unable to tell us whereabouts we are. May he, day by day, rise upon our souls with healing in his beams! Then shall we be filled with all joy and peace in believing, and abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost. Rom. xv. 13.

6. Are there any weak in faith who come under the denomination of bruised reeds and smoking flax? Let them know that God will take care of them. The former will not be broken: the latter shall not be quenched. Bless God for any degree of faith; even though it be as the smallest of all seeds, sooner or later it will surely expand into a large and fruitful tree.—However, stop not here; but, as the apostle advises, covet earnestly the best gifts: and the gift of assurance, yea, of fullest assurance among the rest. The stronger you are in faith, the more glory you will give to God, both in lip and life. Lord, increase our faith! Amen.

SPEECH DELIVERED AT THE
QUEEN'S ARMS, NEWGATE STREET,
ON THE FOLLOWING QUESTION:

"Whether the World is to be destroyed? and what are the approaching Symptoms of its Dissolution?"

MR. PRESIDENT,

WHEN this question was debated at a former meeting, an ingenious gentleman then present observed, very truly, that the decision of it in this assembly depends entirely on the principles of the respective speakers. Every person here either believes revelation or not. Those who unhappily reject that divine light cannot possibly come to any degree of certainty as to the enquiry now depending: to them there is a wide field left open of conjecture ad infinitum: they may to their lives' end blunder on in the dark, and debate how the world is to be destroyed, whether by water, a universal earthquake, &c., or even whether it will ever be destroyed at all. But to them who believe the Scriptures the point is quite plain and clear. The Bible cuts short the matter at once, and leaves no room for doubt. We are there positively told, that the terraqueous globe will be destroyed, and destroyed by fire. "The earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up:" and again, "the heavens and the earth which now are, are kept in store and reserved unto fire:" meaning the globe on which we live, and the atmosphere that surrounds it equally every way. These, the same inestimable book informs us, will not be so destroyed as to be either annihilated or rendered unfit for subsequent habitation: but so destroyed as to rise (like the fabled phoenix) from its ashes, and become eventually such as it was at its first creation, before moral evil entered and ever natural evil took place. As to the manner in which this great event is to be effected, revelation, so far as I can perceive, has not discovered. Whether it will be by God's omnipotently counteracting the centrifugal power of the earth, by which it is at present kept at a due distance from the sun; or by the fall of one or more of the heavenly bodies, which may kindle the earth in their passage; or by the approximation of a comet; or, which seems most probable to me, by the bursting forth of the subterraneous fire, which is justly believed to be imprisoned within the cavities of the earth, near the centre, and which is supposed to act in concert with the sun-beams in temperating the coldness of the air, and occasioning the fruitfulness of the earth; but which probably continues insensibly to increase with time, and will at the destined season burst the womb in which it is confined, and render the whole earth and sea one undistinguished mass of fluid fire.

I come now to the other branch of the question, respecting the approaching symptoms which will precede this general dissolution. As to those recorded in the 24th of St. Matthew, and in the 21st of St. Luke, the signs prelusive to the destruction of Jerusalem are so blended and interwoven with those that shall introduce Christ's second coming, and it requires so large an induction of historical particulars, as well as so much caution and critical exactness to assign each circumstance to its respective period of accomplishment, that I shall not (as a very worthy gentleman has ventured to do) repeat any of the symptoms predicted in those two chapters; but confine myself to one or two plain and express signals, mentioned in other parts of holy writ. 1. The utter abolition and destruction of both the eastern and western antichrist, will prepare the way for Christ's appearance and the world's dissolution. This yet remains to be effected, but will most surely be brought about in God's appointed time. And the people of God, who shall be alive at that period, may, when they see the total extermination of Mahometanism and Popery, lift up their heads with joy, knowing that the Judge is at the door, and that their redemption draweth nigh. 2. The calling in of the Jews, when a nation shall be born in a day, and they shall unanimously believe in Him whom their fathers have pierced, will be another event preparatory to the consummation of all things. So will, 3. the universal conversion of the whole Gentile world, when Christ will take all the heathen as the right of his inheritance.

SPEECH DELIVERED AT THE
QUEEN'S ARMS, NEWGATE STREET,

ON THE FOLLOWING QUESTION:

"Whether unnecessary Cruelty to the Brute Creation is not criminal?"

MR. PRESIDENT,

THE humane tendency of the question reflects great honour on the benevolence of the gentleman who proposed it; and the manner in which it has been discussed, since I came into the room, does equal credit to the gentlemen who have spoken to it. However, I must own my dissent, in some particulars, from the worthy gentleman who gave his sentiments last: and as he thought proper to make very free with the gentleman who spoke before him, I hope he will excuse me if I make modestly free with him. And though the observation I intend to animadvert upon was rather a deviation from the question, yet I shall follow him in the deviation for a while; and the more willingly, as it may conduce indirectly to throw some light on the subject now under debate.

That gentleman asserted peremptorily and absolutely, that "All things whatever, in and upon the terraqueous globe, were created purely and solely for the service of man." Such an opinion may serve to gratify our vanity and sooth our pride: but how far it is founded on reality, will appear from examining into matter of fact.

We will suppose that a ship on a foreign voyage drops anchor on a foreign coast. A poor sailor takes the opportunity of bathing in the sea. A hungry shark either scents or descries him; darts forward to the unhappy victim; snaps him in two, and swallows him at a couple of mouthfulls. I would ask, was the shark made for the use of that man? or was that man made for the use of the shark? So long, therefore, as there are not only useless creatures in the world (useless as to us, though they doubtless answer some valuable purpose in the great scheme of creation), but creatures apparently noxious, and fatal sometimes to our very lives; so long, I think, if demonstration carries any conviction, we must grant that there are some creatures not made for the service of men. But to omit sharks, rattlesnakes, and crocodiles, let us descend to creatures of much lower class. Will that gentleman seriously say, for instance, that London bugs, fleas, and some other reptiles I could mention, are made for human benefit? Ask any mendicant in the streets what he thinks; he will tell you, that they seem rather made to tire our patience and to mortify our pride. I allow indeed that man is the centre, in which the generality of created good may be said to terminate; for which we ought to be thankful to the most wise and gracious Creator of all things. But then it is to me equally evident that the same adorable being consulted and does consult, the happiness of every individual creature to which he has given life; else why such various and so admirably adapted accommodations for their respective provision and welfare.

I now come directly to the question; and without hesitation or limitation deliver it as my steadfast belief that all wanton exercise of power over, and all unnecessary cruelty to, the brute creation, is truly and properly criminal. Several good reasons have been urged in proof of this, by some gentlemen who spoke before me; but I own there is one argument which has more weight with me than all that have been yet offered, and which I wonder no gentleman has hitherto mentioned. I firmly believe that beasts have souls; souls, truly and properly so called: which, if true, entitles them not only to all due tenderness, but even to a higher degree of respect than is usually shewn them.

I lay down two things, Mr. President, as data: 1, That mere matter is incapable of thinking; and 2, That there is no medium between matter and spirit.

That brutes think can hardly, I imagine, be questioned by any thinking man. Their not being able to carry their speculations so high as we do is no objection to their cogitability. Even among men some are more able reasoners than others. And we might perhaps reason no better than the meanest animal that breathes, if our souls were shut up in bodies no better organized than theirs. Nay, brutes not only think when they are awake and their senses are in full exercise; but they frequently think, even in their sleep. A dog, as he lies extended by the fire side, will sometimes shew by the whining noise he makes, and by the catching motion of his feet, that he is enjoying an imaginary chace in a dream. A cat, dissolved in sleep, will often, by various starts and agitation, convince any unprejudiced observer that she fancies her prey full in view and is preparing to seize it. I remember a cat of my own, who one evening enjoyed for five or eight minutes this pleasing illusion; until at last her eagerness, agitation of spirits, and a spring she endeavoured to make, awoke her from her golden dream; upon which she shewed as much concern and disappointment as she could discover by disconsolate mewings. Now there can be no imagination without thought: nay, these two are perhaps, in fact, things synonymous: nor can there be thought without some degree of reason: and that which reasons must be something superior to matter, however modified, and essentially different from it. I have not time to enter deeply into the subject. I cannot, however, help giving it as my judgment that, before a man can coolly and deliberately deny rationality to brutes, he must have renounced his own. And why that noble faculty which, pro gradu, produces similar effects in us and them, should be called by a different name in them and us, I own myself quite at a loss to determine. If I can at all account for it, the pride of man is the only reason I am able to assign. We are, right or wrong, for monopolizing every excellence to ourselves; and for allowing little or none to other animals is forgetting that inferior animals are not only our fellow-creatures, but (if it may be said without offence) our elder brethren, for their creation was previous to our's.—If then brutes reason, that in them which does reason must be spirit, or an immaterial principle, which principle, being immaterial, must be perfectly simple and un compounded; if perfectly simple it must be, in its own nature, incorruptible; and if incorruptible, immortal. And I will honestly confess that I never yet heard one single argument urged against the immortality of brutes, which, if admitted, would not, mutatis mutandis, be equally conclusive against the immortality of man.

What I have offered may seem strange and surprising to those who have not viewed the subject on both sides of it. It would have seemed strange to myself a few years ago.

I accounted for all the internal and external operations of brutes upon the principles of mechanism. But I was soon driven from this absurdity by dint of evidence. Was a cat a meer machine, she could not distinguish a mouse from a kitten, but would be equally indifferent to both. Was a dog a mere machine, he would not distinguish his master from a rabbit, much less would he pursue the latter, and caress the former; any more than a clock can know its owner, or one statue can hunt another.—I next had recourse to instinct. But I soon found, upon careful examination, that this is a mere term without an idea: a name for we know not what; and he that would distinguish between instinct and reason (for if instinct has any meaning at all it must signify reason) must first find a medium between matter and spirit. But I am rather for expunging the word quite, as a term which, in its present application at least, signifies just nothing; and, like all such unmeaning terms, either conduces to no end, or at least, to a very bad one, as only tending to confuse and embarrass, and “darken counsel by words without knowledge.” By the way, this is not the only word which, was I to unite an expurgatory index to our language, I would utterly proscribe. But whatever I retain, chance, fortune, luck, and instinct, should have no quarter; because they are wells without water; terms without ideas; and words are only so far valuable as they are the vehicles of meaning.

I cannot wholly dismiss the subject, without observing another particular in favour of the spirituality of brutes; namely, what is commonly the facultas locomotiva, or power of voluntary motion from place to place. Motion itself, simply considered, is not always an indication of an intelligent agent within; but voluntary motion is, and must be such in the very nature of things. An inanimate body set in motion by some exterior cause would, as is universally allowed, go on in a straight line, ad infinitum, if not obstructed in its course by the air or some other intervening body. All involuntary motion, therefore, being necessarily and in its own nature, rectilinear, and the motions of beasts not being necessarily rectilinear, but in all directions and in any direction, as occasion requires (for they in their way act as much pro re natà as we can do), it follows that every beast has something within which judges, consults, and directs; which, as it cannot possibly be material must be spiritual. If a dog was running from this end of the room to the other, and one of the gentlemen by the opposite chimney-piece was to stand up in a menacing posture, the animal would immediately cease to proceed in a right line, because he would know that would be the wrong one for his safety, he would turn back and, if possible, escape at the door. What is this but practical reason? an excellence, by the bye, in which many of those creatures surpass the generality of mankind. The language of such conduct is apparently this, “If I go forward, danger is before me; if I return, or go another way, I may probably escape this danger; ergo, I will do the latter.” Could we ourselves in similar circumstances argue more justly, or act more wisely? From which I conclude that, as there is evidently something in every living creature which discerns what is good, and puts him upon pursuing it; which likewise points out what is pernicious and puts him upon avoiding; this discerning, reasoning, inclining principle, must be essentially different from the mechanic system it actuates, and can be no other, in plain English, than an intelligent soul. Should it be objected, that “this intelligent principle does not always produce these beneficial effects, witness the case of a dog who swallows poison under the apprehension of a dainty;” I answer, man himself is liable to deceptions of a similar kind. Yet he would be a disgrace to the name of man who should, upon this account, question either the immateriality or immortality of his own soul.

I pay, likewise, great attention to another consideration. That beasts are possessed of the five senses we value ourselves upon (though perhaps, after all, every one of those senses may in reality be reducible to one, viz., feeling), in as great, and sometimes much greater perfection than we, is a principle which I look upon as incontestable. Brutes are, if experience (which is practical demonstration) carries any authority, as sensible of pain and pleasure as man. Rub a cat’s head and she will purr; pinch her tail and she will spit. Now I would ask, what is it that feels? The body, the flesh, the blood, the nerves? No: for a dead animal has all these and yet feels not. It is the soul, Mr. President, that feels and perceives through the medium of the senses ; for what are the senses but channels of conveyance, and a sort of mediators between outward objects and the mind? In what way matter acts upon spirit is unknown, but that it does so every day's experience proves.

Memory likewise belongs to brutes. Memory is the power of recalling past ideas, and of recollecting past events. The person who denies that beasts remember must either be a man of no observation, or have a very bad memory himself. Now there can be no memory without ideas : no ideas without thinking (for the forming, the comparison, and the combination, of ideas are thought) : no thinking without some degree of reasoning : and no reasoning without a reasonable soul. There may be thought without memory, but memory there can be none without thought. And the passions likewise are as strong in them as in us.

On the whole, needless cruelty to beasts is highly criminal. Especially if we take in these two additional observations ; 1. That the same Deity who has made them what they are might have made us what they are ; i. e. he might have imprisoned our spirits in their bodies had it been his pleasure. And, though I look upon the Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration to be in itself both groundless and absurd, yet its tendency was certainly a very good one, as it necessarily induced men to be tender of the lives and happiness, the being and the well-being, of the animal creation. 2. As another very cogent motive to this benevolence of disposition and behaviour, let us never forget that all the miseries and hardships under which the brute creation labour, together with mortality itself, to which they are liable, are primarily owing to the sin of man ; which reflection must influence every considerate and truly ingenious mind to treat them with the greatest lenity upon that very account. Nor can I omit just mentioning an argument which may be deduced from the care of Providence. If God hath respect to the meanest of his creatures, and despises not the workmanship of his own hands, let us, whose supreme glory it is to resemble Deity, imitate him in these amiable and gracious views. As Dr. Young truly and nobly observes, "There is not a fly, but infinite wisdom is concerned both in its structure and its destination." How dare we then be destroyers of their ease which we ought to promote, or wantonly deprive them of that life which we cannot restore?

SPEECH DELIVERED AT THE QUEEN'S ARMS, NEWGATE STREET

ON THE FOLLOWING QUESTION :

"Whether our good works will add to our degree of future glory?"

MR. PRESIDENT,

FROM what I have the pleasure to know of the worthy gentleman who is the father of the question, I have too great an opinion of his good sense, and of the deference he pays to divine revelation, to suppose he believes there is any sort of merit in human works. I dare say no person here need be acquainted that to merit properly signifies to earn, and originally the word was applied to soldiers and other military persons, who, by their labours in the field, and by the various hardships they frequently underwent during the course of a campaign, as also by other services they might occasionally render to the commonwealth, were said merere stipendia, to merit, or earn their pay : which they might properly be said to do, because they yielded in real service an equivalent to the state for the stipend they receive, which was therefore due to them in justice. Hence, I apprehend, we come at the true meaning of the word merit ; from this view of the point I think it is very clear in the very nature of things, exclusive of Scripture, that there can be no such thing as merit in our best obedience. One man may merit of another, but all mankind together cannot merit from the hand of God. If we advert to revelation, nothing can be clearer than this important truth. Salvation in all its various branches is expressly declared to be "not of works," and elsewhere "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy, he saved us : " for which one of the reasons assigned is, "lest any man should boast : " which he would surely, and might justly do, if his works were meritorious of divine acceptance, could justify him in the sight of God, and entitle him to heaven. The law will admit of no righteousness as a sufficient ground of justification, but such and such a righteousness only, as in every respect whatever, and from first to last, comes up to the standard of that law, which no human righteousness since the primitive transgression of Adam ever did come up to or ever will. Hence it follows that all men being sinners, and of consequence not having a perfect righteousness to bring, either the whole human race must be condemned, or those who are saved must be saved by a righteousness out of themselves and to be had from another. Who this other is, in virtue of whose complete obedience the Church of his elect are justified from all things, the Scripture plainly declares when it tells us that "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes:" that the same blessed Person "who knew no sin was made sin," that is, a sin-bearer and a sin-offering, "for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him:" and, to mention no more passages, that "as by the disobedience of one many were made, or constituted, sinners; so by the obedience of one shall many be made and constituted righteous." If then we are justified by the alone imputation of Christ's righteousness, it more evidently follows that good works on our part are in no sense meritorious of heaven, neither as causes nor conditions, for, however plausible and innocent the word condition may sound, a condition is no more than a softer name for cause, as being something on account of which something else is given or done. And that works can be neither causes nor (which amounts to the same thing) conditions of justification is clear, because the performance of a condition necessarily precedes the reception of a benefit suspended on that condition; whereas, good works (and works are then only evangelically good which proceed from the united principles of faith in Christ and love to God, which faith and love are the fruits of grace previously bestowed) do not go before, but follow after justification, which is the express doctrine both of Scripture and of the Church of England, in her 12th and 13th Articles, and throughout the whole book of Homilies. Therefore to put good works before justification is making the effect prior to the cause, and representing the fountain as flowing from the stream, instead of deducing the stream from the fountain. I shall only add one observation more on the head of merit. Whoever believes the Scriptures must admit that, whatever good is either wrought in man, or done by him, is the fruit of God's effectual grace. Was it otherwise it would follow that God is not the source of all good, but that men may be good independently of the Creator, and of consequence that there are some good and perfect gifts which do not descend from the Father of lights. How rational this is in itself, and how honourable to the Deity, must be left to the judgment of those gentlemen who think fit to depart from the doctrines of the Reformation by espousing the system of Arminius. If, therefore, the good we are enabled to do is done in the strength of divine grace, it follows, not that the Deity is indebted to us, but that we are unspcakably indebted to him, for working in us both to will and to do the things that are well-pleasing in his sight. "Are good works, then, and moral obedience, unnecessary?" Quite the reverse. They are of indispensable necessity. They must and will be wrought by all who are born from above. They are the evidences of faith, and the necessary consequences of justification.— Believe in Christ for justification, and lead a bad life if you can. It is impossible. They that are of God will do the works of God.

I have been perhaps tedious, but what is said has a close connection with the question before us; which is, "Whether our good works, &c." Here, I think, is room for a distinction. I am of opinion that good works, extensive usefulness, and eminent sufferings for Christ, will in one respect be followed by a proportionable degree of glory, and in another, not. I am one of those old-fashioned people, Mr. President, who believe the doctrine of the Millennium, and that there will be two distinct resurrections of the dead: 1st of the just, and 2ndly of the unjust; which last resurrection, of the reprobate, will not commence till a thousand years after the resurrection of the elect. In this glorious interval of one thousand years, Christ, I apprehend, will reign in person over the kingdom of the just; and that during this dispensation different degrees of glory will obtain, and "every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour." This reward, though temporary, will surely be more than equivalent to anything we can be enabled to do or suffer for God, during the short span of our present life. And yet, though the reward will vastly transcend the work, still between temporal obedience and this temporal recompense there is some little proportion, whereas, between temporal obedience and the eternal weight of glory there is no proportion at all. And to me it seems very clear that, whatever difference of bliss and honorary distinctions may obtain during the Millenary state, I am inclined to think, both by Scripture and reason, that in the heavenly glory which will immediately succeed the other, all the saints will be exalted to an equality of happiness and crowned alike. In the course of the present argument, I have been forced to take the doctrine of the Millennium for granted, time not allowing me to even intimate a hundredth part of the proof by which it is supported. I would only observe to those who have not considered that subject that it would be prudent in them to suspend their judgment about it, and not be too quick in determining against it, merely because it seems to lie out of the common road. As doctrines of this kind should not be admitted hastily, so they should not be rejected prematurely. Upon the whole, I give it as my opinion that the reward of the saints, during the personal reign of Christ upon earth, will be greater or less in proportion to their respective labours, sufferings, and attainments; but that, seeing they are loved alike, with one and the same everlasting love of God the Father; that their names are in one and the same book of life; that they are all justified by the same perfect righteousness of Christ, redeemed and washed from all their sins in the blood of the same Saviour, regenerated by the same Spirit, made partakers of like precious faith, and will in the article of death be perfectly (and of course equally) sanctified by divine grace; for these and other reasons that might be mentioned, I am clearly of opinion that, in the state of ultimate glory, they will be on a perfectly equal footing with regard to final blessedness, both as to its nature and degree; and, as the parable expresses it, "receive every man his penny."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS RELATIVE TO THE NATIONAL DEBT.*

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1775.*

Qu. 1. SUPPOSING this debt to be only 130 millions of pounds sterling at present (although it is much more), and that it was all to be counted in shillings: that a man could count at the rate of 100 shillings per minute, for twelve hours each day till he had counted the whole; how much time would he take in doing it?

Ans. 98 years, 316 days, 14 hours, and 40 minutes.

Qu. 2. The whole of this sum being 2600 millions of shillings, and the coinage standard being 62 shillings in the Troy pound, what is the whole weight?

Ans. 41 million, 935 thousand, 484 Troy pounds.

Qu. 3. How many carts would carry this weight, supposing a ton in each?

Ans. 20,968 carts.

Qu. 4. Supposing a man could carry 100 pound weight from London to York; how many men would it require to carry the whole?

Ans. 419 thousand, 355 men.

Qu. 5. If all these men were to walk in a line at two yards distance from each other, what length of road would they all require?

Ans. 476 miles, half a mile, and 70 yards.

Qu. 6. The breadth of a shilling being one inch, if all these shillings were laid in a straight line close to one another's edges, how long would the line be that would contain them?

Ans. 41,035 miles; which is 16,035 miles more than the whole circumference of the earth.

Qu. 7. Supposing the interest of this debt to be only  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum, what does the whole annual interest amount to?

Ans. Four million 550 thousand pounds sterling.

Qu. 8. How doth the government raise this interest yearly?

Ans. By taxing those who lent the principal, and others.

Qu. 9. When will the government be able to pay the principal?

Ans. When there is more money in England's treasury alone than there is at present in all Europe.

Qu. 10. And when will that be?

Ans. Never.

SPIRITUAL IMPROVEMENT OF THE FOREGOING

Qu. What is the moral law of God?

Ans. The transcript of his own most holy nature, and the standard of human purity and obedience.

Qu. Will this law make any allowance for human infirmity, or admit any abatement of the perfect conformity which it demands?

Ans. It makes no allowance for the former, nor will it dispense with a single grain of the latter.

Qu. How does that appear?

Ans. It appears from the undeniable current of Scripture: where the language of the law is, Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect. (Matt. v. 48.) Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law, to do them. Gal. iii. 10. The indispensable requisition is, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself. Luke x. 27. Hence, in the eye of the law and the estimation of the law-giver, the risings of wrath are tantamount to murder; the calling any man a fool exposes us to the penalty of hell-fire; an impure thought brings us under the condemnation of actual adultery. Matt. v. 22, 28.

Qu. What is the grand inference from these alarming premises?

Ans. That inference which the apostle terms an evident one, and evident indeed it is, viz. that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God. Gal. iii. 11. For a single breach of the law renders us guilty of the whole: James ii. 10. And one idle word lays us open to the vengeance of God, according to the tenor of the covenant of works. Matt. xii. 36.

Qu. Supposing a person was to break the law but once in 24 hours; to how many would his sins amount in a life often, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, or eighty years?

Ans. If he was to fail in moral duty but once a day his sins at ten years of age would amount to 3 thousand 6 hundred and 50. At twenty years' end, the catalogue would rise to 7 thousand 3 hundred. At thirty, to 10 thousand nine hundred and 50. At forty, to 14 thousand 6 hundred. At fifty, to 18 thousand 2 hundred and 50. At sixty, to 21 thousand 9 hundred. At seventy, to 25 thousand 5 hundred and fifty. At eighty, to 29 thousand 2 hundred.

Qu. What if a person's sins are supposed to bear a double proportion to the foregoing estimate? That is, let us imagine him to sin twice a day, or once every twelve hours.

Ans. In that case his sins at the age of ten years will be multiplied to 7 thousand 3 hundred. At twenty, to 14 thousand 6 hundred. At thirty, to 21 thousand 9 hundred. At forty, to 29 thousand, 2 hundred. At fifty, to 36 thousand 5 hundred. At sixty to 43 thousand 8 hundred. At seventy, to 51 thousand 1 hundred. At eighty, to 58 thousand 4 hundred.

Qu. We must go farther still. What if a man's sins keep exact pace with every hour of his life? i. e. we will suppose him to sin 24 times a day.

Ans. His sins will then amount, in a life of ten years, to 87 thousand 6 hundred. At twenty years of age they will accumulate to 175 thousand 2 hundred. At thirty, to 262 thousand 8 hundred. At forty, to 350 thousand 4 hundred. At fifty, to 438 thousand. At sixty, to 525 thousand 6 hundred. At seventy, to 613 thousand 2 hundred. At eighty, to 700 thousand and eight hundred.

Qu. Is there a single minute from the first of our existence to the very article of death, wherein we come up to the whole of that inward and outward holiness which God's all perfect law requires?

Ans. Most certainly not.

Qu. Of how many sins then is each of the human race guilty, reckoning only at the rate of one sin for every minute?

Ans. At ten years old we (according to that method of calculation) are guilty of no fewer than 5 millions 256 thousand sins. At twenty, of 10 millions and 512 thousand. At thirty, of 15 millions 568 thousand. At forty, of 21 millions and 24 thousand. At fifty, of 26 millions and 280 thousand. At sixty, of 31 millions and 536 thousand. At seventy, of 36 millions and 792 thousand. At eighty, of 42 millions and 48 thousand.

Qu. May we not proceed abundantly farther yet? Sixty seconds go to a minute. Now, as we never in the present life rise to the mark of legal sanctity, is it not fairly inferrible that our sins multiply with every second of our sublunary duration?

Ans. It is too true. And, in this view of the matter, our dreadful account stands as follows.—At ten years old each of us is chargeable with 315 millions, and 36 thousand sins.—At twenty, with 630 millions, and 720 thousand.—At thirty, with 946 millions, and 80 thousand.—At forty, with 1261 millions, 440 thousand.—At fifty, 1576 millions, and 800 thousand.—At sixty, 1892 millions, and 160 thousand.—At seventy, with 2207 millions, and 520 thousand.—At eighty, with 2522 millions, 880 thousand.

Qu. When shall we be able to pay off this immense debt?

Ans. Never. Eternity itself, so far from clearing us of the dreadful arrear, would only add to the score by plunging us deeper and deeper even to infinity. Hence the damned will never be able to satisfy the justice of the Almighty Creditor.

Qu. Will not divine goodness compound for the debt by accepting less than we owe?

Ans. Impossible. Justice, holiness, and truth, will and must have their own, even to the very uttermost farthing. God himself (with profoundest veneration be it spoken) must become an Antinomian, and renounce himself, ere he can forego his essential attributes, and repeal his inviolable law, by offering violence to those, and by making void the claims and the threatenings of this.

Qu. Who then can do us any good in this respect?

Ans. Not all the angels in heaven, nor all the men that ever did or ever shall exist. Others cannot help us, nor can we help our own selves.

Qu. If so, are we not lost, without remedy and without end?

Ans. In ourselves we are. But (sing, O heavens!) God's own arm brought salvation.

Qu. How so? What is there wherewith to counterbalance such an exceeding and astonishing weight of guilt?

Ans. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law; being made a curse for us." Gal. iii. 13.—This, this will not only counter-balance, but infinitely over-balance, all the sins of the whole believing world.

Qu. If the personal short-comings and misdoings of each sinner in particular amount to so vast a multitude, who can calculate the extent of the whole national debt, the entire aggregated sum, which (abstracted from her union with Christ) lies on the Church at large, that elect nation whom he has redeemed from among men?

Ans. The arithmetic of angels would be unable to ascertain the full amount.

O thou covenanting, thou incarnate, thou obeying, thou bleeding, thou dying, thou risen, thou ascended, thou interceding Son of God! not all the seraphs thou hast created, not all the innumerable saints thy love hath ransomed, will be able to comprehend, much less to display, along the endless line of eternity itself, the length, the breadth, the depth, the height, of a sinner's obligations to thee.

Qu. If, on one hand, we are each constrained to cry out with the believers of old, Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord, for in thy sight shall no flesh living be justified by works of human performance;—Who can tell how oft he offendeth?—How shall man be just with God? If thou contend with him for his transgressions, he cannot answer thee for one of a thousand;—My sins are more in number than the hairs of my head;—Forgive us our debts, and cast all our sins into the depths of the sea; what has faith to say?

Ans. Faith, on the other hand, can reply in the very words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin; and there is now no condemnation [σθεν κατακριμα, not one condemnation] to them that are in Christ Jesus. So that we may sing, with Dr. Watts, “Believing sinners free are set,

For Christ hath paid their dreadful debt.”

We may add, in the words of another sweet singer in Israel,

“Who now shall urge a second claim?
The law no longer can condemn;
Faith a release can show:
Justice itself a friend appears;
The prison-house a whisper hears,
Loose him, and let him go!”

Qu. What return can believers render, to the glorious and gracious Trinity, for mercy and plenteous redemption like this?

Ans. We can only admire and bless the Father, for electing us in Christ, and for laying on him the iniquity of us all:—the Son, for taking our nature and our debts upon himself, and for that complete righteousness and sacrifice whereby he redeemed his mystic Israel from all their sins;—and the co-equal Spirit, for causing us (in conversion) to feel our need of Christ, for inspiring us with faith to embrace him, for visiting us with his sweet consolations by shedding abroad his love in our hearts, for sealing us to the day of Christ, and for making us to walk in the path of his commandments.

THE MANNER OF STONING A CRIMINAL TO DEATH, AMONG THE ANCIENT JEWS.

STONING was one of the four capital punishments among the Jews, inflicted for the greater and more enormous crimes, especially for blasphemy and idolatry.

The malefactor was led out of the consistency (where he had received sentence), at the door whereof a person stood, with a napkin in his hand, and a man on horseback at some distance from him: that if any one came and said he had something to offer for the deliverance of the criminal, the horseman (on the other's waving the napkin) might give notice, and cause the offender to be brought back to a farther hearing.

He had two grave persons to go along with him to the place of execution, and to exhort him to confession by the way. A crier went before him proclaiming who he was, what his crime, and who his witnesses. When arrived at the fatal spot, which was raised two cubits from the ground, he was first stript, then stoned, and afterwards hanged. He was to continue hanging until sun-set, and then, being taken down, he and his gibbet were buried together. [See Cave's Life of St. Stephen, Sect. 19.]

MANNER OF WHIPPING AMONG THE ANCIENT JEWS.

THIS punishment was not to exceed 40 stripes: and therefore the whip with which it was to be inflicted being made of three thongs, and each blow giving three stripes, they never laid on any criminal more than 13 blows; because 13 of those blows made 39 stripes, and to add another blow would have been a transgression of the law, by adding two stripes over and above 40. [See Prideaux's Connect. Part ii. Book 5.]

REMARKABLE DESCRIPTION OF ST. PAUL'S PERSON.

How little stress is to be laid on external appearance! This prince of apostles seems to hint, concerning himself, that his bodily presence was not calculated to command respect at first sight: 2 Cor. x. 10. St. Chrysostom terms him homuncionem tricubitalem, “a little man, about three cubits [or four feet and a half] in height.”

Lucian, or whoever is the author of the Philopatris, is supposed to have had St. Paul in view where he introduces “A Galilean” (for so the Christians were contemptuously styled), “rather bald-headed, with an acquiline nose, who travelled through the air into the third heaven.”

But, of all other writers, Nicephorus Callistus has given us the most circumstantial account of St. Paul's person [Lib. ii. cap. 37].—“St. Paul was small of stature, stooping, and rather inclinable to crookedness, pale-faced, of an elderly look, bald on the head. His eyes, lively, keen, and cheerful, shaded in part by his eyebrows, which hung a little over. His nose, rather long and not ungracefully bent. His beard, pretty thick of hair, and of a sufficient length; and, like his locks interspersed with grey.”

BIOGRAPHY.

SOME ACCOUNT OF MR. JOHN KNOX.

TRANSLATED, CHIEFLY FROM THE LATIN OF MELCHIOR ADAMUS.

SCOTLAND had the honour of producing this great and eminent luminary, who became the principal instrument, in God's hand, of effecting the reformation in that kingdom, at a time when Papal darkness, ignorance, and superstition, had involved the whole nation in shades of deeper than Egyptian night. He was born at Gaffard, near Haddington, in the county of East Lothian, A.D. 1505; and received his academical education in the university of St. Andrew's, under the tutorage of the celebrated John Mair, or Major: and soon gave proof of the astonishing genius with which Providence had endued him, by his swift and profound advances in all the walks of scholastic science. Having mastered these, he studied, with great diligence, the writings of Austin, and of Jerom: which, running in a more simple and easy channel, moved him to forego the needless intricacies of the philosophic theology he had formerly imbibed; and to embrace that simplicity with which both Christ and his apostles were content, and which they commended to their disciples. He soon perceived that these scholastic niceties, when pushed to excess, are directly opposite to the genius of the gospel; and open the way, not to Christian knowledge, but to the endless mazes of sophistry and strife of words.

Coming acquainted with the famous Mr. George Wishart (afterwards martyred for the Protestant faith), it pleased God so to bless the conversation of that holy man to Mr. Knox that it issued in the effectual conversion of the latter: who, being very honest and very courageous, published a confession of his faith, at Edinburgh, in which he boldly and clearly avowed the blessed principles of the Reformation. The Romish bishops and clergy, alarmed at the open defection of so eminent a man, and who had taken priest's orders in their Church but a few years before, endeavoured, first to suppress his book, and then to seize the author himself. He was accordingly apprehended, and condemned to suffer death: but, by the good providence of God, being set at liberty, he left his native country, and retired to Berwick, whence he proceeded to Newcastle, and then to Warwick; in all which places he preached the gospel in its purity, with great zeal and unremitting labour, and with success equal to both: so that his name now became more public and diffused than ever

Edward VI. was then king of England. The fame of Mr. Knox soon reached the ears of that excellent prince, who shewed him no small favour and encouragement. His majesty first made him his own chaplain, and then licensed him as one of the six itinerant ministers, who were empowered to preach the gospel in all places throughout the kingdom. In process of time Edward offered him a bishoprick, which, however, Mr. Knox declined to accept.

That hopeful and pious king dying, A.D. 1553, his sister Mary succeeded to the crown, whereby the reformation, here, bade fair for being extinguished, almost as soon as lighted: many great and learned men, as well as others, being put to death; and those who could, securing their lives by voluntary banishment. Among the latter, Knox was one; who fled, first, to Frankfurt; and thence to Geneva, the common asylum of distressed Christians. There he enjoyed the intimacy of Calvin, and spent his time chiefly in preaching, and comforting the afflicted exiles.

A.D. 1559, he returned into his own country; where he again preached the truth, with incredible power and success. Although the French faction was at that time very powerful in Scotland, and the Devil's emissaries strove hard to ruin the Protestant interest in that kingdom; yet Knox continued resolute, laborious and undaunted as ever; solidly and unanswerably, both by his writings and from the pulpit, asserting that Christ alone is the foundation of our acceptance with God, and his obedience the only meritorious cause of our justification. But as our Lord himself and his apostles underwent hatred, banishment, and persecution; so was Knox obliged to leave Edinburgh, and repair to St. Andrew's; whither, when he came, he met with many adversaries.

About this time, viz. in the year 1572, in the month of August, such a scene opened in France as scarce any history can parallel: I mean the massacre at Paris; where, beginning with admiral Coligni, it so raged against all who held the truth, without regard to age, sex, or quality, that it was truly said there was more blood than wine spilt at that Thyestean marriage.

This dreadful slaughter gave the deepest concern to Mr. Knox, as it did every where to all lovers of the gospel; and added fresh weight to his former sorrows. But, shortly after, matters taking a more favourable turn in Edinburgh, many, who had been banished thence, returned: and, among the rest, Knox was invited back, by letters from the Parliament. Thither, therefore, he came, accompanied by a great number of godly and learned men; and had not been there long before he entered on his ministerial office, and preached publicly to the people. But, as his voice was rather low and weak, he could not be well heard by the prodigious multitudes that attended. On which he besought the Parliament to furnish him with a place more commodious: which being granted, he preached some sermons to the people on the sufferings of Christ, from the 26th of Matthew; often beseeching God to take him home while he was in that exercise.

Still continuing unable to supply the cure of so large a church, especially as his body was much weakened and emaciated by study and fatigue, and the hardships he had formerly undergone; leave was given to the people of Edinburgh to choose him such an assistant as Knox and they should deem most capable and worthy, and to present him, when chosen, to the ecclesiastical synod, for their approbation and license. By common consent, Mr. James Luson, of the university of Aberdeen, was the person pitched upon; and he was accordingly invited by letters from the city, and from Mr. Knox: who, perceiving in himself that the time of his departure was at hand, among many arguments he made use of to quicken Luson's pace, said, in the post-script of one of his letters; "Make haste, my brother: else you will come too late to see me alive."

The good man being arrived at Edinburgh, and having preached several times in public, was, on the 5th of November, 1572, declared by Knox to be pastor of that church. In that assembly, Knox took occasion of preaching his last sermon, and of telling the people how many and great things God had done for him, and what deliverances he had wrought in his behalf; and likewise reminded them with how much diligence and faithfulness he had preached the gospel to them; and congratulated the Church of Edinburgh on the favour God shewed them by deputing so able a minister to succeed him; adding, at the same time, most fervent prayers for the temporal and spiritual prosperity both of him and them; wishing them an abundant increase of grace, and a continual supply of the Holy Ghost. In conclusion, he blessed the people with greater liveliness than he had ever done before; i. e. with a more cheerful mind, though with a very feeble body.—Then he walked home, leaning on his stick, and accompanied by the greater part of the congregation.

Thus he returned to his house, out of which he never after came alive.

The next day he was seized with a violent cough; breathing continually with more and more difficulty, until he breathed his last. When his friends advised him to send for some physician, he smilingly consented; saying, "I would not either despise or neglect ordinary means; but of this I am certain, that God will shortly put an end to my warfare below."

The day after, he ordered his servants to be paid their wages; whom, at the same time, he earnestly exhorted "to walk in the fear of the Lord; and to live so as became Christians educated in that family." His disorder growing worse and worse, he was forced to premit his ordinary method of reading; which used to be every day some chapters of the New Testament, and in the Old, particularly the Psalms; and some useful portions of ecclesiastical history. In the mean while, he requested his wife (Margaret Stewart, a devout woman, and a most affectionate partner of his faith and cares), and Richard Ballantine, his servant, who was always very dear to him for his remarkable piety, that they would take care to read to him, every day while he lived, the 17th chapter of St. John's Gospel, one or other of the chapters of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and the 53rd chapter of Isaiah: which injunction they never once omitted.

He was always peculiarly fond of the book of Psalms, God having greatly blessed them to his soul. With some select portions of those admirable compositions he was much comforted in life, and strengthened in death.

The day following, he rose from his bed by seven o'clock; and being asked, "Why, when he was so weak and sick, he would not rather choose to rest himself?" He answered, "I have been this whole night taken up with the meditation of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, my Lord; and would with joy get into the pulpit, that I might communicate to others the comfort I have inwardly enjoyed from reflecting on that blessed subject." So intent was he on the work of the Lord, even to his last breath; and when, for want of strength, he could scarce be lifted out of bed by the assistance of two servants.

A few days after, he sent for all the ministers of the several churches in Edinburgh, to whom, being assembled round his bed, he thus addressed himself; "That day is now at hand which I have so often and intensely longed for: in which, having finished my labours, and gone through my various sorrows, I shall be dissolved, and be with Christ. And I appeal to God, whom I have served in the Spirit in the gospel of his Son, that I have taught nothing but the true and solid doctrines of his word: having made this my main view, through the whole course of my ministry, to instruct the ignorant; to edify and comfort believers; lift up and confirm with the promises of grace those who were weak, fearful, and doubting, through the fear of wrath and consciousness of sin; and to beat down haughty rebellious sinners with the threatenings and terrors of the Lord. And although many have frequently complained of my harshness in preaching, yet, God knows, that I did not thus deal out thunders and severity from hatred to the persons of any; though this I will acknowledge, that the sins in which they indulge themselves were the objects of my keenest hatred and resentment; and in my whole ministry this was my single aim, if I might by any means gain over their souls to the Lord. My motive for speaking freely and plainly whatever the Lord gave me to say, without respect of persons, was nothing but reverence to that God who called me by his grace, and made me the dispenser of his divine mysteries; before whose tribunal I knew I must one day stand, to give account for my discharge of that embassy and commission wherewith he had invested me. Wherefore I profess, before God and his holy angels, that I have never knowingly adulterated his sacred word, held back any of his counsel from my people, studied to please men, or given way to my own or other's corrupt affections or secular interest; but have faithfully expended the talents committed to me for the good of the Church over whom I was in the Lord. To the truth of this my conscience beareth testimony, which is a comfort to me, notwithstanding the various slanders which some have made it their business to cast upon me. And do ye, my dearest brethren in the faith and labour of Jesus, persist in the everlasting truths of his gospel; look diligently to the flocks with whose oversight God hath intrusted you; and which he hath redeemed to himself by the blood of his Son. And do you, my brother Luson, fight the good fight, and finish the work of God, to which you are called, with alacrity and faithfulness. May God shower down his blessing from on high upon you and your several charges in this city! which, so long as they continue to hold fast those doctrines of truth which they have heard of me, the gates of hell shall never be able to prevail against. And beware of those who have not only opposed the royal government, but even forsaken the truth which they once professed; against whom I denounce that, unless they sincerely repent and return to the good way which they have left, they shall one day miserably perish in soul and body. I would say more, but cannot, as I am scarce able to draw my breath." With these words he dismissed them: and afterwards spoke in private to those who attended him, to admonish one Grange, on whom that judgment afterwards fell which Knox had predicted. He was then visited by the chief nobility of the town, among whom was Lord Morton, afterwards Viceroy of the kingdom, as also by some godly ladies of the first quality; none of whom he suffered to depart without a word of comfort or exhortation, as their separate cases required.

Perceiving death to approach nearer and nearer, he gave orders for his coffin to be made, alter which he burst forth to this effect: "Lord Jesus, sweetest Saviour, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Look, I beseech thee, with favour, upon this Church which thou hast redeemed, and restore peace to this afflicted commonwealth. Raise up pastors after thine own heart, who may take care of thy Church; and grant that we may learn, as well from the blessings as from the chastisements of thy providence, to abhor sin, and love thee with full purpose of heart." Then, turning to those about him, he said, "O wait on the Lord with fear, and death will not be terrible: yea, blessed and holy will their death be who are interested in the death of the Son of God." Being asked by an intimate friend, "whether he felt much pain?" he replied, "I cannot look upon that as pain which brings on the end of mortality and trouble, and is the beginning of life." Having then ordered those passages of Scripture, above mentioned, to be distinctly read to him, he repeated the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed; enlarging as he went on, most sweetly and spiritually, upon each of the separate petitions and articles, to the great comfort and edification of them that were by. Afterwards, lifting up his hands towards heaven, he cried out, "To thee, Lord, do I commit myself. Thou knowest how intense my pains are, but I do not complain. yea, Lord, if such be thy will concerning me, I could be content to bear these pains for many years together: only do thou continue to enlighten my mind through Christ Jesus." He passed that night with more ease and complacency than usual; the 15th chapter of 1 Cor. being frequently read to him at his own desire: which being done, he would cry out, "O what sweet and heavenly consolations does my Lord afford me from this blessed chapter!" But when one of his eyes grew blind, and his speech began to fail, he cried faintly, "Turn to the 17th of St. John, and read it carefully, for there I have cast my anchor." When that was read he rested a little, but soon began to utter very heavy groans and deep sighs; so that the by-standers plainly perceived he was grappling with some very great temptation. There were at this time present in the room, one John Johnson, a holy man, and Robert Campbell, a great friend to the gospel, Mrs. Knox, and others, who, observing his agonies, thought him to be in the pains of death. At length, however, contrary to their expectation, he recovered like one awaked from sleep; and, being asked how he did, answered, "Many have been my conflicts with Satan in the course of my frail life, and many the assaults which I have sustained; but that roaring lion never beset me so furiously and forcibly as now. Often has he set my sins in array before me; often has he tempted me to despair; and often strove to ensnare me with the enticements of the world; but, I being enabled to hew his snares in pieces with the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, he was not able to prevail against me. But now he has found out a new way. That crafty serpent has endeavoured to persuade me that, because I have faithfully and successfully discharged my ministerial office I am on that account deserving of eternal life and an happy immortality. But God was pleased to make me triumphant over this temptation also, by powerfully suggesting to my memory those texts, What hast thou that thou didst not receive! And, by the grace of God, I am what I am: and, Not I, but the grace of God which was with me; and others, with which I foiled the enemy, and quenched his fiery darts. I thank my God, therefore, through Christ, who has vouchsafed me the victory; and I have a certain persuasion in my own breast that Satan shall not be permitted to return, or molest me any more, in my passage to glory: but that I shall without any pain of body, or agony of soul, sweetly and peacefully exchange this wretched life for that blessed and immortal one, which is through Christ Jesus." Then evening prayers were said; and, being asked whether he could hear them distinctly? he answered, "Would to God you all heard with such ears, and perceived with the same mind, as I am enabled to do! And now, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." Whereupon certain symptoms of immediate death appearing, he was desired to give some sign whereby they might know that he died in the stedfast belief and enjoyment of those gospel-truths which he had taught when living, and likewise of his comfortable assurance of a blissful immortality through Christ. On which, as if he had received fresh strength, he triumphantly lifted up his hand toward heaven and continued waving it, for a considerable time, and then quietly departed to the rest which remaineth for the people of God, on Nov. 24, 1572, about eleven o'clock at night.

LIFE OF MR. FOX THE MARTYROLOGIST. (a)

MR. JOHN FOX was born at Boston, in Lincolnshire, A. D. 1517; the very year when Luther began the Reformation in Germany.

His father died when he was very young; and his mother marrying again, he came under the tutelage of a father-in-law, with whom he dwelt until the age of sixteen, at which time he was entered of Brasen-Nose College, Oxford, and was chamber-fellow with the celebrated Dr. Alexander Nowel, afterwards dean of St. Paul's. Mr. Fox plied his academical studies with equal assiduity, improvement, and applause. In 1538, he took the degree of Bachelor in Arts, and that of Master, in 1543. The same year he was elected Fellow of Magdalen College.

When he first removed to the University, and for some time after, he was strongly attached to the heresies and superstitions of Popery. To his zeal for these, he added a life strictly regular and moral: and, laughing at the idea of justification by faith in the imputed righteousness of Christ, thought himself sufficiently safe in the imaginary merit of his own self-denial, penances, alms-deeds, and compliances with the rites of the Church.

But he was a chosen vessel, and therefore divine grace would not let him remain a pharisee. Through the effectual breathings of God's holy Spirit, his studies were over-ruled, not only to the abundant advantage of posterity at large, but also to the endless benefit of his own soul in particular. His indefatigable and profound researches into ecclesiastical history, and the writings of the primitive fathers; and, above all, his thorough acquaintance with the Holy Scripture in its original languages; became the means of convincing him to what an immense distance the Romish Church has departed from the faith, practice, and spirit of Christianity.

In order to make himself a yet more competent judge of the controversies then in debate between Protestants and Papists, he searched with indefatigable assiduity into the ancient and modern history of the Church. Here he learnt at what periods and by what means the religion of Christ flourished, and by what errors it began to decline. He considered the causes, and weighed the importance, of those various dissensions which had, from time to time, obtained in the professing world; and quickly perceived that, in every age, the mistakes, follies, and vices of mankind are more similar in their nature, operations, and effects, than is generally imagined. What is the far greater part of civil and ecclesiastical history but a register of the weakness and wickedness which divide almost the whole human race between them?

With such zeal and industry did Mr. Fox apply himself to these inquiries, that, before he was thirty years of age, he had read over all the Greek and all the Latin fathers, all the scholastic writers, together with the acts of all the councils; and moreover, made himself master of the Hebrew language. But, from this strict and severe application, by night, as well as by day; from forsaking his old Popish friends, and courting the most sequestered retirement; from the dubious and hesitating manner in which, when he could not avoid being in company, he spoke of religious subjects; and, above all, from his sparing attendance on the public worship of the Church, which he had before been remarkable for strictly and constantly frequenting; arose the first surmises of his being alienated from the reigning superstitions, and infected with (what the bigoted Romanists had either the ignorance, or the insolence, to term) the "new heresies."

Thus, even the humble and benevolent Mr. Fox was not without his enemies, who narrowly watched his conduct, and waited for an opportunity to injure him. His singular openness and sincerity did not long leave them at a loss for ways or means. Snares were laid for him, and his generous honesty betrayed him into them. A moderate portion of dissimulation (commonly called prudence and circumspection) would, perhaps, have secured him a while from the machinations of his adversaries. But he chose rather to suffer affliction with the people, and for the cause, of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; mindful of that decisive and alarming declaration, Whoever is ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels. Through grace, our author determined to venture the loss of all things for Christ's sake; in consequence of which he openly professed the gospel, and was publicly accused of heresy. His college passed judgment on him, as a heretic convicted, and presently after he saw himself expelled from the University. His enemies maintained that he was favourably dealt with by that sentence, and might think himself happily off to incur expulsion instead of death.

Mr. Fox's troubles sat the heavier on him, as they lost him the countenance and good offices of his friends, who were afraid to assist and protect a person condemned for a capital offence. His father-in-law, particularly, seized this opportunity to withhold from Mr. Fox the estate which his own father had left him; thinking that he who stood in danger of the law himself would with difficulty find relief by legal methods.

Being thus forsaken and oppressed, he was reduced to great straits, when God raised him up an unexpected patron in Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire, who received him into his house, and made him tutor to his children. Here he married a citizen's daughter of Coventry; and continued in Sir Thomas's family until his pupils were grown up: after which, he, with some difficulty, procured entertainment with his wife's father, at Coventry; whence, a few years before the death of Henry VIII., he removed to London.

For a considerable time after his arrival in the capital, being without employment or preference, he was again reduced to extreme want. But the Lord's good providence relieved him, at length, in the following extraordinary manner. As he was sitting one day in St. Paul's church, his eyes hollow, his countenance wan and pale, and his whole body emaciated (or rather, within a little of being literally starved to death); a person, whom he never remembered to have seen before, came and sat down by him, and, accosting him familiarly, put a respectable sum of money into his hand, saying, Be of good comfort, Mr. Fox; take care of yourself, and use all means to preserve your life; for, depend upon it, God will in a few days, give you a better prospect, and more certain means of subsistence. He afterwards used his utmost endeavours to find out the person by whose bounty he had been so seasonably relieved; but he was never able to gain any discovery. However, the prediction was fulfilled; for within three days from that memorable incident, he was taken into the duchess of Richmond's family, to be tutor to her nephew the earl of Surrey's children, who (on the imprisonment of the earl, and of his father the duke of Norfolk, in the tower) were committed to the care of the duchess for education.

Mr. Fox lived with this family at Ryegate, in Surrey, during the latter part of Henry VIII.'s reign, the five year's reign of king Edward VI., and part of queen Mary's. Gardiner, the bloody bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese this good man so long lived, would have soon brought him to the shambles, had he not been protected by one of his noble pupils, then duke of Norfolk. Gardiner always hated Mr. Fox (who, it is said, was the first person that ventured to preach the gospel at Ryegate); and saw, with deep concern, the heir of one of the noblest families in the kingdom trained up in attachment to Protestantism under Mr.

Fox's influence. The prelate, therefore, formed various designs against the safety of the latter; and sought, by many artifices and stratagems, to work his ruin. The holy man, who was no less suspicious of the bishop than the bishop was of him, found himself obliged in prudence (though much against the duke's inclination, who loved and revered him as a father), to quit his native land, and seek shelter abroad. His grace of Norfolk, perceiving that no arguments or intreaties could induce his honoured tutor to remain in England, took care to provide him with every accommodation requisite for his voyage. Mr. Fox accordingly set sail from Ipswich haven, accompanied by his wife, who was then pregnant, and by several other persons, who were leaving their country on a religious account. The vessel had not been very long at sea ere a storm arose, which, the next day, drove them back into the port whence they had set out. Having with great difficulty and danger reached the land, Mr. Fox was saluted with indubitable information that bishop Gardiner had issued a warrant for apprehending him, and was causing the most diligent search to be made after him. On this he made interest with the master of the ship to put to sea again without delay, though at evident hazard of their lives, as the tempest had not yet subsided. Through God's goodness, however, they all arrived in two days at Nieuport in Flanders; whence Mr. Fox and his company travelled to Antwerp and Franckford, and so to Basil, in Switzerland, whither great numbers of the English resorted in those times of domestic persecution.

The city of Basil was then one of the most famous in Europe for printing; and many of the learned refugees who retired thither got their subsistence by revising and correcting the press. To this employment Mr. Fox betook himself; and it was here that he laid the first plan of his inestimable history and martyrology, intitled, Acts and Monuments of the Church.

Queen Mary the bloody died in the month of November, 1558. And, the day before she died in England, Mr. Fox, in a sermon then preached by him at Basil, publicly and positively predicted that the day then next ensuing would be the last of her life. An event so circumstantially foretold, by one at such a distance from the place of Mary's residence, and so punctually accomplished by the hand of divine Providence, could only be made known to the predictor by revelation from God.

Elizabeth's accession encouraged Mr. Fox to return home, where, on his arrival, he still found a faithful and serviceable friend in his late pupil, the duke of Norfolk; who hospitably and nobly entertained him at his manor of Christ-Church, in London, until his [i. e. until the duke's] death; from which latter period Mr. Fox inherited a pension, bequeathed to him by his deceased benefactor, and ratified by his son the earl of Suffolk.

Nor did the good man's successes stop here. On being recommended to the queen, by her secretary of state, the great Cecil, her majesty gave him the prebendary of Shipton, in the cathedral of Salisbury; which was, in a manner, forced upon him, for he brought himself with difficulty to accept of it. The truth is that, wise and holy and learned as Mr. Fox unquestionably was, he entertained some needless doubts concerning the lawfulness of subscribing to the ecclesiastical canons; a requisition, which in his idea, he considered as an infringement of Protestant liberty. Through this extreme scrupulousness, he excluded himself from rising to those dignities and promotions in the church, to which his uncommon merit, as a scholar and a divine, eminently entitled him; and to which he would most certainly have risen but for the cause now assigned. His friends were many, great, and powerful; as Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Thomas Gresham, Sir Drue Drury, archbishop Grindal, bishop Aylmer, bishop Parkhurst, &c.; who would have been the instruments of raising him to very considerable preferments, had not his unaccountable coolness towards the canons and ceremonies of the Church of England, restrained him from accepting any of her capital emoluments. While, however, we wonder at his prejudices, we cannot but revere him for his honesty, and for his extreme tenderness of conscience.—Dr. Fuller tells us that archbishop Parker summoned him to subscribe, in hope “that the general reputation of his piety might give the greater countenance to conformity.” But, instead of complying with the command, Mr. Fox pulled out of his pocket the New Testament, in Greek, and holding it up said, To this will I subscribe. And when a subscription to the canons was required of him, he refused, saying, I have nothing in the Church but a prebend at Salisbury, and, if you take it away from me much good may it do you. But he was permitted to retain it until his death: such respect did the bishops (who had most of them been his fellow exiles abroad) bear to his age, parts, and labours.

Yet, let it be remembered that, notwithstanding his acknowledged moderation in point of thorough conformity, he was still a declared enemy to the heats and violences of rigid puritanism. “I cannot but wonder,” said he, in a letter to a bishop,

“at that turbulent genius which inspires those factious puritans.—Were I one who, like them, would be violently outrageous against bishops and archbishops; or join myself with them, i. e. become mad, as they are; I had not met with severe treatment [at their hand]. But because, quite different from them, I have chosen the side of modesty and public tranquillity, the hatred which they have long conceived against me is at last grown to this degree of bitterness.—Your prudence is not ignorant how much the Christian religion suffered, formerly, by the dissimulation and hypocrisy of the monks. At present, in these men, I know not what new sort of monks seems to revive; so much more pernicious than the former, as, with more subtle artifices of deceiving, and under pretence of perfection, like stage-players who only act a part, they conceal a more dangerous poison: who, while they require every thing to be formed according to their own strict discipline, will not desist until they have brought all things into Jewish bondage.”(b)

Thus thought, and thus wrote, this admirable divine! this friend to men of all parties; but a slave to no party of men!

How benevolently disposed this great and good man was, even toward those who differed the most widely from him in religious principles, appears, among many other instances, from the Latin letter which he wrote to queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1575, to dissuade her Majesty from putting to death (c) two anabaptists who had been condemned to the fire. Fuller has preserved the whole of this masterly and truly Christian address. The substance of it was as follows, that, “To punish with the flames the bodies of those who err rather from blindness than obstinacy of will is cruel, and more suitable to the example of the Romish Church than to the mildness of the gospel. I do not” (added he) “write thus from any bias to the indulgence of error, but from a regard to the lives of men, as being myself a man; and in hope that the offending parties may have opportunity to repent of and retract their mistakes.”

He earnestly beseeches her Majesty “to spare the lives of these miserable men; or at least soften their mode of punishment: as to banish them, or commit them to perpetual imprisonment, &c., but at all events not to re-ignite the Smithfield fires, which, through her goodness and care, had been so long extinguished. If this could not be granted, at least to allow them a month or two, in order that endeavours might be used to reclaim them from their errors, and thereby to prevent the destruction of their souls as well as of their bodies.”—Mr. Fox (says Fuller) was very loth that Smithfield, formerly consecrated with martyrs’ ashes, should now be profaned with those of heretics: and was desirous that the Papists might enjoy their own monopoly of cruelty, in burning condemned persons. But, though queen Elizabeth constantly called him “her father Fox,” yet, herein, was she no dutiful daughter, for she gave him a flat denial, as to the saving of their lives, if after a month’s reprieve, and conference with divines, they would not recant their heresies. It is not a little surprising that so holy and so candid a man as Dr. Fuller should endeavour to palliate, if not to justify, the extreme malignity which brought those two Dutchmen to the stake. “Damnable,” says this historian, “were their impieties; and the queen was necessitated to this severity; who, having formerly punished some traitors, if now sparing these blasphemers, the world would condemn her; as being more earnest in asserting her own safety than God’s honour.” A wretched excuse this for wilful and deliberate murder! It reminds us of Melancthon’s cruelty (falsely fathered on Calvin), in pressing the magistrates of Geneva to burn the heretic Servetus. The answer of a Popish princess on a similar occasion did more honour to humanity. This lady (who is still living) was solicited by some Romish ecclesiastics to concur with them in bringing a supposed heretic to the flames. “Is it not true,” said she, “that heretics burn for ever in hell-fire?” Without doubt, answered the priests. “It would be too severe then,” added she, “to

(b) The occasion on which this letter was written; and the whole of the letter itself, in its original Latin; are extant in Fuller’s Church Hist. b. ix. p. 106.—For a summary of it, in English, see Biographia Britannica, vol. iii. p. 2021.

(c) On Easter-day was disclosed a congregation of Dutch Anabaptists, without Aldgate in London; whereof seven-and-twenty were taken, and imprisoned; and four bearing fagots at Paul’s Cross solemnly recanted their dangerous opinions. Next month, one Dutchman, and ten women were condemned, of whom one woman was converted to renounce her errors; eight were banished the land; two so obstinate, that command was issued out for their burning in Smithfield.”—FULLER’S Ch. Hist. B. ix. p. 204.

This shocking and unjustifiable persecution could not but reflect deep disgrace on the Protestant name. The two unhappy victims were burned, according to their sentence, July 22, 1575. They were both Dutchmen, and, as we are informed by Stow, “died in great horror, with roaring and crying.” (Chronicle, p. 680).—Strype says, their names were, John Wielmacker, and Hendrick Ter Woot; and that they suffered, after an imprisonment of sixteen weeks. Much interest was made in their behalf, by the Dutch congregation settled in London; but the Privy Council would not spare them: (Strype’s Annals, vol. ii. p. 380.) It was eminently humane, in their countrymen here to importune the Government so earnestly in their favour; especially, when we recollect that the intercessors were Calvinists, and that the sufferers added, to their other heresies, the maintenance of free will, perfection, justification by works, and falling from grace; which, however, was infinitely far from warranting the sanguinary rigour with which they were treated.

burn them in both worlds. Since they are devoted to endless misery hereafter, it is but justice to let them live unmolested here."

Hitherto Dr. Fuller and the Biographia Britannica have been our chief guides in the present account of the truly apostolic Mr. Fox. For what we have further to add we shall be principally indebted to the learned, faithful, and laborious Mr. Clark. (d) While Mr. Fox was in exile at Basil, during the prevalence of Popery in England, he one day, in a sermon which he preached before his afflicted countrymen in that city, positively assured them "That the time was now come for their safe and happy return home; and that he told them this comfortable news by express command from God." Several ministers who were present took occasion afterwards to reprove him, with a degree of asperity, for publicly declaring what they took to be the premature flights of his own fancy and conjecture. But they soon altered their opinion, when authentic intelligence arrived that queen Mary the bloody was actually dead.

On his re-settlement here he sat himself to revise and enlarge his admirable Martyrology. With prodigious pains and constant study he finished that elaborate work in eleven years. For the sake of greater correctness he never employed any amanuensis, but wrote every line of this vast book with his own hand, and searched and transcribed all the records and original papers himself. But, by such excessive toil, leaving no part of his time free from study, nor affording himself either the repose or recreations which nature required, his health was so reduced, and his person became so emaciated and altered, that such of his friends and relations as only conversed with him occasionally could not recollect him at sight. Yet, though he grew daily more lean, withered, and exhausted, his hard studies went on as briskly as ever, nor would he be persuaded to lessen his accustomed labours.—The Papists, foreseeing how extremely detrimental his history of their errors and cruelties would prove to their cause, exerted their whole art and strength to lessen the reputation of his work. This malice of their's was of signal service both to Mr. Fox himself and to the Church of God at large; as it eventually made his book more intrinsically valuable, by inducing him to weigh, with the most exact and scrupulous attention, the certainty of the facts he recorded, and the validity of the authorities whence he drew his informations.

Having long served both the Church and the world by his ministry, by his pen, and by the unsullied lustre of a beneficent, useful, and holy life, he comfortably resigned his soul to Christ, on the 18th of April, 1587. The Lord had given him a foresight of his departure; and so fully persuaded was he that the time was just at hand when he should quit the body, that (probably to enjoy unmolested communion with God, and to have no worldly interruptions in his last hours) he purposely sent his two sons from home, though he loved them with great tenderness, and before they returned, his spirit, as he had foreseen would be the case, was flown to heaven. He was interred in the chancel of St. Giles's, Cripplegate; of which parish he had been, in the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, for some time vicar.

Mr. Strype (e) says that a very fair marble stone, fixed in the south wall of that chancel, was presently after erected to his memory, with the following inscription:

VITA VITÆ MORTALIS EST, SPES VITÆ IMMORTALIS.

Fuller acquaints us that Mr. Fox foretold the destruction of what was madly styled by the Pope and Spaniards, the Invincible Armada. "The story," says that historian, "is true, though Mr. Fox survived not to see the performance of his own prediction.—His dear friend, Dr. Laurence Humfrey, may be said to have died with him (though his languishing life lasted a year longer); so great was his grief to be parted from his fellow-colleague, bred together in Oxford, and banished together into Germany." (f)

Among the graces for which our matchless martyrologist was eminent, shone his extensive (some would almost term it profuse) liberality to the poor. He was so bountiful to them while he lived, that he had no ready money to leave to them at his death. His love to his Saviour was such that he could never refuse giving to any who asked him for relief in the name of Jesus, or, for Christ's sake. A friend once inquiring of him, "whether he recollected a certain poor man whom he used to relieve?" He answered, Yes, I remember him well: and I willingly forget lords and ladies to remember such as he.

His ability in comforting afflicted consciences was very peculiar. No wonder, therefore, that his house was frequented by persons of all ranks, from noblemen down to the poorest of the flock, who were labouring under soul distresses.

His time was divided between study, preaching, praying, spiritual conference, and visiting the sick and afflicted. His principal hours for intercourse with God in secret prayer were during the night season: at which times of holy retirement, he has been heard to agonize with God, and to mingle his supplications with groanings which could not be uttered.

He was distinguished by a deep and settled contempt of earthly things: more especially of pleasures, amusements, wealth, and honours. Hence, he abstracted himself as much as he possibly could from all friendship, society, and connection with the great and noble of this world. The money which was sometimes offered him by rich men he accepted, but the poor were as sure to have it as ever he received it.

On various occasions he more than seemed to speak by a spirit of prophecy. Many things did he foretel when comforting the distressed, and when terrifying the obstinate and obdurate.

Lady Anne Heneage lying sick of a violent fever, and the physicians deeming it mortal, Mr. Fox was sent for to be her spiritual assistant in her last moments. After prayer and religious conversation, he told her that she had done right in preparing for eternity, but that, nevertheless, she was not to die of that sickness. A knight, her son-in-law, taking him aside soon after, said to him, "Mr. Fox, you acted wrongly in disconcerting my mother's mind with hopes of life, when the physicians have pronounced her past recovery."—I have said no more, answered the good man, than God commanded me; for it is his pleasure that she shall not die, but live. And the event was as he foretold.

Going one day to see the earl of Arundel, son to the duke of Norfolk, at his lordship's house in the Strand, London; on his coming away, the earl walked with him down his garden, to the Thames side, where he was to take boat. The weather being very stormy and the water extremely rough, the earl advised him not to venture himself on the river. Mr. Fox's answer was very remarkable, and makes us feel a wish to know the particular subject of their preceding conversation: My lord, let these waters so deal with me as I have in truth and sincerity delivered to you all that I have spoken. On saying these words he entered the boat, and very shortly afterwards the wind ceased, and the river ran with a smooth and gentle current.

There have been macaronies in a ages. One of Mr. Fox's sons had a great desire to travel beyond sea, from which his father could by no means dissuade him. After a tour of several years, he returned home and presented himself to the good old man in a fantastical, outlandish habit. Who are you? said Mr. Fox.—"Sir, I am your son Samuel."—To which his reply was: O my son, who has taught thee to make thyself so ridiculous? This reproof seems to have been attended with good effect, for the giddy youth proved, afterwards, a serious, devout, learned, and respectable man. In 1610, he wrote the life of his father, prefixed to his Martyrology; and at length died, full of years and of good works.(g)

A very singular incident, of which Mr. John Fox himself was eye-witness, shall conclude this summary of his life and character. He it was who had that memorable interview with Mrs. Honeywood, mentioned by so many authors of that age. The concern of this pious lady for the salvation of her soul was so great, her doubts and fears so very distressing, and her sorrow of mind so grievous, that she sunk into utter despair: which had such an effect on her bodily health as brought her to death's door, and kept her in a gradual consumption for almost twenty years. In vain did physicians administer their medical assistances; for her disease, which originated from a spiritual cause, required a supernatural remedy. There was but one Physician whose power and skill could reach her case: even he who healeth those that are broken in heart, and giveth medicine to heal their sickness.—In vain did the ablest and most evangelical ministers preach to her the comforts of the gospel; and labour to persuade her of the willingness and certainty wherewith Christ receives every coming sinner. The holy Spirit alone could preach to her heart with efficacy; and he had not yet vouchsafed, in all those years, to rise upon her soul. At length Mr. Fox was sent for; who, on his arrival, found a most mournful family, and the mistress of it the deepest mourner among them all. The holy man prayed with her, and then reminded her of what the faithful God had promised, and of what Christ had done and suffered for her soul. But even this was to no purpose for still she could not believe that the gospel promises and the merits of Jesus belonged to her. Mr. Fox, not in the least discouraged, went on, and to the wonder of those about her, expressed himself to the following effect: You will not only recover of your bodily disease, but also live to an exceeding great age; and, which is yet better, you are interested in Christ, and will go to heaven when you die. Looking earnestly at him as he spake these words, she answered, with much emotion, Impossible! I shall as surely be damned as this glass will break: and immediately dashed a Venice glass (which she was holding in her hand), with much force against the wall. The glass fell, first on a chest, and then upon the ground, but was neither broken nor so much as cracked. (h) The event proved that Mr. Fox did not prophecy by the spirit of error. Mrs. Honeywood was then sixty years old; and lived in much comfort and felicity until she was upwards of ninety, and could reckon above three hundred and sixty persons descended from herself.

THE LIFE OF DR. JEWEL, BISHOP OF SALISBURY. (i)

WE learn from Dr. Fuller that this great prelate was a native of Devonshire: "John Jewel bearing the Christian name of his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, was born at Buden (or Bowden, of which estate his ancestors had then been near two hundred years in possession), in the parish of Berynarber, near Ilfracombe, in that county. His mother's surname was Bellamy, who with her husband lived happily 50 years in holy wedlock; and at their deaths left ten children behind them.

"Concerning our bishop it may be said, 'nomen, omen.' Jewel was his name, and precious were his virtues. So that if the like ambition led us Englishmen as doth foreigners, specially to render our surnames in Greek or Latin, he may be termed Johannas Gemma, on better account than Gemma Frisius entitled himself thereunto."

He was chiefly bred in the school of Barnstaple; where John Harding, afterwards his Popish antagonist, was his school-fellow. At thirteen years old, he was admitted into Merton College, Oxford; under the tuition of Dr. John Parkhurst, afterwards the ingenious and evangelical bishop of Norwich. Such was his sedulity (rising always at four in the morning and not going to rest until ten at night), that he was never punished for any one of his exercises, and but once for absence from chapel. Hence he was removed to Corpus Christi College, where he proved an excellent poet, linguist and orator. Such was his memory that he could repeat all Horace by heart; and he gave many other surprizing proofs of quickness and retention.

During his residence at the university, after the accession of king Edward VI., he was happy in the friendship of that holy and learned reformer, doctor Peter Martyr. "Having touched at all human arts," says Fuller, "he landed at divinity; being much assisted by Peter Martyr the king's professor therein. St. Jerom tells us that so great was the intimacy between Pamphilus that worthy priest and martyr and Eusebius the Bishop of Cæsarea, ut ab uno alter nomen accepèrat, that they were mutually surnamed the one from the other Pamphilus Eusebii and Eusebius Pamphilii. No less the unity of affections between these two, who accordingly might have been called Martyr's Jewel, and Jewel's Martyr, as seldom in body and never in mind asunder.

Having been chosen (k) Humanity Lecturer, in preference to many of his seniors, he acquitted himself with such brightness and ability that his tutor, Dr. Parkhurst, honoured him with the following complimentary epigram:

*Olím discipulus mihi, care Juelle, fuisti;
Nunc ero discipulus, te reuente, tuus.*

Amidst all his attainments in learning, such were his fervour of devotion, sanctity of life, and affability of behaviour, that he was admired and almost loved by the bitterest enemies of the Protestant faith; insomuch that (in Henry VIIIth's reign) the dean of his college, who was a fierce and bigotted Papist, would sometimes say to him, "I should love thee, Jewel, if thou was not a Zuinglian. In thy faith thou art

(h) Fuller, in his Worthies of England, (Kent, p. 86,) says, that, though this circumstance was little short of miraculous, still Mrs. Honeywood took no comfort from it; but "continued, a great time after, in her former disconsolate condition, without any amendment, until God, who findeth out the fittest minutes for his own mercies, suddenly shot comfort, like lightning, into her soul; so that she led the remainder of her life in spiritual gladness. This she herself told to the reverend father, Thomas Morton, bishop of Durham, from whose mouth I have received it in relation. In the days of Queen Mary she used to visit the prisons, and to comfort and relieve the confessor-ers therein. She was present at the burning of Mr. Bradford, in Smithfield, and resolved to see the end of his sufferings: though, so great was the press of people that her shoes were trodden off and she forced thereby to go barefoot from Smithfield to St. Martin's, before she could furnish herself with a new pair for her money. She died the eleventh of May, 1620: in the ninety-third year of her age, and in the forty-fourth year of her widowhood."

a heretic; but surely in thy life thou art an angel. Thou are very good and honest, but a Lutheran." Much the same with what the persecuting heathens would frequently say, of believers in Christ; bonus homo, sed Christianus; i. e. such an one is a good man, but he is a Christian.

A little before the death of Henry VIII. Mr. Jewel took his master of arts' degree, and when good king Edward wore the crown he became a most celebrated and shining ornament of the Church of England. His principal fault was that of being too hard a student. By this he greatly emaciated his body and impaired his health. His diet was extremely simple and sparing; and his incessant fatigues of mind bade fair to sink him much sooner to the grave than in reality they did. The tolerably advanced age to which he attained is one proof among millions that the same absolute Providence which registers our hairs has also determined the number of our days.

Retiring once to Witney, on account of an epidemic sickness which raged at Oxford, our future bishop pursued his studies with such assiduity that, neglecting to supply himself with necessary accommodations, he contracted so violent a cold, as fixed a lameness in one of his legs, from which he was never exempt to his dying day.

Being presented to the rectorry of Sunningwell, in Berkshire, he performed his own duty at that church every other Lord's day, by preaching and catechising in person. On the alternate Sundays he preached and expounded at Oxford with much credit to himself and much usefulness to others.

Thus happily and honourably he went on until king Edward VI. (of whom the world was not worthy) was transplanted to heaven, and Mary succeeded to the English throne. On that sad occasion none had more reason to be apprehensive of danger than Mr. Jewel, whom God had made so zealous and so distinguished an instrument of diffusing the doctrines of grace, in opposition to the Arminian or (as they were then called) the Pelagian tenets of Popery. His enemies immediately laid a snare for him, by choosing him to draw up a congratulatory letter to the new Queen, in the name of the university, well knowing that if he refused the task, he would expose himself to the imputation of disloyalty; and if he consented, he would give great offence to the Protestants throughout England. Aware of the dilemma to which he was reduced, he extricated himself from this artful trap by discreetly penning the letter in such general terms as satisfied the Court and yet gave no umbrage to the favourers of the gospel. "I

Fuller, "all as yet were confident that the Queen would maintain the Protestant religion, according to her solemn promise to the gentry of Norfolk and Suffolk: though (she being composed of courtship and Popery) this her unperformed promise was the first court-holy-water which she sprinkled among the people. And because every one was counted a truant in Popery who did not outrun the law, Dr. Tresham, an active Papist and a van-courier before authority, repaired the great bell at Christ church. which he new named and (l) baptized May. While Mr. Jewel was reading the letter he had penned to Dr. Tresham for his approbation thereof, presently that bell tolled to mass, and Tresham, breaking off his attention to what was written, exclaimed in a zealous ecstasy, O sweet May! how musically, how melodiously, doth she sound! This bell then rang the knell for that time to the truth in Oxford; thenceforward filled with Protestant tears and Popish triumphs."

Shortly after Mr. Jewel for refusing to be present at the celebration of mass was driven from his college (of Corpus Christi), and forced to quit his fellowship. For a while he lay hid at Broadgates hall (now Pembroke college,) where his friends and scholars privately repaired to him; and in the learned and religious knowledge which he communicated to them they received more than compensation for the dangerous risk they ran in venturing to visit him. Among his pupils was a Mr. Edward Year, an ingenious person, and zealously attached to the gospel. This gentleman wrote two poems, one in Latin and the other in English, ridiculing the superstitions of Papal worship, and prophesying the return of the reformation. These verses coming into the hands of Mr. Welsh, who was at that time censor of Corpus Christi college, so provoked him that he punished the author by literally whipping him with great severity, giving him a lash for each verse, amounting to about eighty in the whole. The poet (a sample of whose performance is preserved in Fuller's Church History), probably thought himself well off to escape with a flogging instead of being roasted alive.

Mr. Jewel had not been long in his concealment when he was discovered by some popish spies, which was followed by an event that was matter of subsequent humiliation to him as long as he lived. The apostle Peter and the excellent archbishop Cranmer, though they loved Christ with deep and undissembled affection, yet were unhappily induced to deny him in a day of trouble and of rebuke and blasphemy. Take the account of our author's temporary defection in the words of the valuable historian last quoted. "Being, by the violence of Popish inquisitors, assaulted on a sudden to subscribe to some errors of their church, he (m) took a pen in his hand and said smiling, Have you a mind to see how well I can write? and thereupon under writ their opinions. Thus the most orient Jewel on earth has some flaws therein. To conceal this his fault had been partiality; to excuse it, flattery; to defend it, impiety; to insult over him, cruelty; to pity him, charity; to admire God for permitting him, true devotion; to be wary of ourselves on the like occasion, Christian discretion.

"Such as go out when God openeth them a door to escape do peaceably depart. But such as break out at the window either stick in the passage or bruise themselves by falling down on the outside. Jewel may be an instance hereof, whose cowardly compliance made his foes no fewer without him, and one the more (a guilty conscience) within him. The Papists neither loved, nor honoured, nor trusted him any whit the more for this his subscription; which they conceived not cordial, but forced from him by his fear. Yea, thereby he gained not any degree of more safety; and his life being waylaid for, with great difficulty he got over into Germany."

For Dr. (n) Martial, dean of Christ Church, not deeming his subscription sufficiently sincere and explicit, was plotting how to deliver him into the bloody hands of Bishop Bonner; but he escaped on foot and through bye-ways to London. The news of his flight soon spread, and proper persons were dispatched to intercept him. But, as God's providence would have it, Mr. Jewel (accidentally as an Arminian would call it) missed his way, and so eluded the keenness of his vigilant pursuers. Thus, says a pious historian, "by going out of the way he found the safest way (o);" and certain it is that the wrong way proved the right.

While travelling on foot in a snowy winter's night, he grew quite spent, and scarce able to breathe, much less to pursue his walk. In this situation he threw himself despairingly on the earth, expecting and choosing death rather than life. He was found, however, by one Augustin Bernher, a Switz, who had formerly been a servant of bishop Latimer's, but was afterwards admitted into holy orders. This worthy person, like another good Samaritan, lifted Mr. Jewel from the ground, and seating him on a horse, conducted him to Lady Ann Warcop's, by whom he was kindly entertained, and then safely conveyed to London. Here, concealing himself first in Thames-street, and afterwards elsewhere, for fear of being discovered, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, a man of great distinction at that time, furnished him with money, and secured his passage in a ship bound for the continent. His direct escape was managed by Mr. Giles Laurence, tutor to Sir Arthur Darcie's children, living near the Tower of London. He had been Jewel's fellow collegian at Oxford, and Greek professor. Afterwards, in 1564, Mr. Jewel (then a bishop) made him archdeacon of Wiltshire.

Arriving at Frankfort, A. D. 1554, and the second of Mary's reign, our refugee had the happiness to board in the same house with Dr. Edwin Sandys, who had likewise fled from England on a religious account; and who, in the better days of Elizabeth, became the exemplary archbishop of York. By his advice, and that of two other intimate friends (Mr. Chambers and Mr. Sampson), he made a solemn and affecting recantation of his subscription, in a full congregation of English Protestants, on a Sunday morning, after having preached a most tender penitential sermon. It was, said he, my abject and cowardly mind and faint heart that made my weak hand commit this wickedness. He bitterly bewailed his fall; and, with sighs and tears, supplicated forgiveness of the God whose truth he had denied, and of the Church of Christ whom he had so grievously offended. If the eyes of the preacher were wet, those of his auditory were not dry; and, from thenceforward, "All embraced him as a brother in Christ; yea, as an angel of God. Whoever seriously considers," adds Dr. Fuller, "the high parts of Mr. Jewel, will conclude, that his fall was necessary for his humiliation." After some stay at Frankfort he was invited to Strasburgh by his old friend (p) Peter Martyr, who, being both wealthy and hospitable, had instituted a kind of college for learned and religious men, more especially for Protestant refugees, in his own house. He entertained them with a friendship and liberality truly noble, and politely made our Jewel the sub-president of his numerous guests; all of whom he continued to shelter and support, until milder times, or more advantageous settlements elsewhere, made it their interest or inclination to remove.

(m) Dr. Humphry imputes his [i. e. Jewel's] wavering, to the specious promises made by Queen Mary, that she would force no man's conscience, and intended to make no change in religion. It is added that, if he could have consulted his old tutor, Dr. Parkhurst, he would not have been guilty of so great a weakness. He took a journey, on foot, to Cleve (of which Dr. Parkhurst was rector), for that purpose, but the Doctor, on the re-establishment of Popery, had fled to London. Mr. Jewel, being thus disappointed, returned to Oxford; where he lingered until certain inquisitors laid hold on him by surprize, and pressed him, with threats, to subscribe. But he soon became sensible of his apostacy, and took the first opportunity to escape.—

"It (q) is no less pleasant to consider than admirable to conceive, how the exiles subsisted so long, and so far from their native country, in so comfortable a condition. Especially, seeing Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, solemnly vowed so to stop the sending of all supplies to them that for very hunger, they should eat their own nails, and then feed on their fingers' ends. But threatened folks live long; and, before these banished men were brought to that short bill of fare, the bishop was eaten up of worms himself."

During the remainder of Mary's evil reign, Mr. Jewel and the other English Protestants, who had taken refuge in Germany, subsisted, on the whole, very comfortably beyond sea. It is pleasing to trace the various (r) methods by which God's kind providence supplied the wants of all those excellent men who had quitted their native land for the sake of Christ and his gospel.

1. Many of them were clergymen, and had been richly beneficed in the foregoing reign of king Edward. These prudent men perceiving the rapid decline of that good monarch's health, and dreading the religious revolution which his advancing death might occasion, had managed their revenues so frugally as to feather their nests before the storm came on. By this means they afterwards had it in their power, not only to support themselves in a foreign land, but likewise to administer to the maintenance of their poorer brethren.

2. Some of the English refugees were lay-persons of high birth and great opulence. Among these were Sir John Cheeke, Sir Richard Morison, Sir Francis Knollys, afterwards privy counsellor to Queen Elizabeth, Sir Anthony Cook, father-in-law to that Cecil who was afterwards lord Burleigh, Sir Peter Carew, renowned for his valour in Ireland, where he died in 1576, lady Elizabeth Berkeley, and lady Dorothy Stafford, afterwards lady of the bedchamber to Queen Elizabeth. These and other exiles of wealth and rank, were eminently liberal to their companions in the kingdom and patience of Christ.

3. A great number of pious Protestants, still resident in England, found means to remit with secrecy and safety large sums of money, from time to time, for the relief of their Christian brethren abroad. Fuller tells us that the greater part of these home benefactors were Londoners; and adds a remark which holds as true now as it did two centuries ago, viz. that "London commonly counterpoiseth the charity of all the land besides."

4. One Mr. Thomas Eaton, a London merchant, but living in Germany, contributed much by his princely hospitality to the well being of his exiled countrymen; for he was communis hospes, the entertainer general of as many of them as had either occasion or inclination to avail themselves of his unlimited generosity.

5. The king of Denmark, the prince Palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Wirtenburgh, the duke of Bipont, together with all the states and free cities where the English sojourned, were nobly bountiful to them.

6. The Dutch clergy, and also those of Switzerland (particularly at Zurich), vied with each other in acts of kindness to the Protestant strangers. Among the foremost in beneficence were Bullinger, Pellincan, Bibliander, Simler, Wolphius, Lavator, and Zuinglius: divines, says Fuller, "whose short stipends would scarce reach to maintain themselves; and yet their thrift and charity stretched their stipends so as therewith to relieve others." The learned Gesner, the famous natural historian, was likewise eminently liberal.

7. Some of the English, who were men of erudition, maintained themselves by writing treatises of religion and of science, and then disposing of their manuscripts for

(p) When Mary came to the crown, and the tide was turning fast for the re-introduction of Popery, it was high time for Peter Martyr seasonably to provide for his own security. This great divine was, by birth, a foreigner; and had been invited hither by king Edward, who fixed him at Oxford, where he sat as Divinity Professor, until the death of that good prince. He had, therefore, the warrant of public faith, and the law of nations, for his safety.—Seeing how matters were likely to go under the mischievous government of the bloody female, he solicited for leave to return to his own country: and it was granted to him. And well it was that he had protection of proof: otherwise, such was the emphy of the Papists, and so sharp set were the teeth of some persecuting bishops against him, that they would have made Dr. Martyr brook his own name, and have sacrificed his life to their fury.—FULLER.

It is a debt of justice due to the memory of Bishop Gardiner, to acknowledge that, bad as he was, Providence made him the principal instrument of procuring Peter Martyr the requested passport from England. The Bishop revered him for his immense learning, and for the shining virtues of his life; and therefore exerted his influence with the new government to obtain him the favour (and it was a great favour indeed, as times then went) of a safe conduct to Germany.

a good price to the booksellers. Others acquired a competent livelihood by superintending and correcting the press. "Such sums," says Dr. Fuller, "though small in bulk were great in blessing; a divine benediction being always invisibly breathed on painful and lawful diligence. Persons industriously occupying themselves thrive better on a little of their own honest getting, than lazy heirs on the large revenues left to them.

8. "One thing much kept up the credit of the exiles with the merchants and bankers beyond the seas, namely, the certain and constant report of queen Mary's decaying condition. She was daily consuming, though increasing; wasting, though swelling with a dropsical distemper, which could not be kept so closely under the key of confession, but that it became the public discourse at home and abroad. This gave reputation to such English in Germany as were known to be possessed of estates in their own country; enabling them to borrow convenient sums from any creditors." Thus, in some way or other, did God's good providence take ample care of them all. His own grace had taught them to seek first his kingdom and righteousness, and every needful temporal mercy was added unto them.

We left Mr. Jewel at the house of his munificent friend, Dr. Peter Martyr, in Strasburgh. While there he was not a little serviceable, in return for the generous reception given him by that great man, whom he assisted in the publication of his [i. e. of Martyr's] Lectures on the Book of Judges. Mr. Jewel also tasted largely of Calvin's bounty, and of Melancthon's, who remitted him (as they did likewise to many others of the English) occasional sums of money, though their own (s) revenues were by no means affluent.

On Dr. Martyr's invitation to the divinity chair at Zurich, Mr. Jewel accompanied him thither, and was of great use to him in the discharge of the weighty office annexed to that dignity.

Queen Mary, departing this life, went to her own place, November 17, 1558, in the 43rd year of her age, after a bloody and disastrous reign of five years, four months, and eleven days. Her death was a most happy event for the Church of God both at home and abroad. Some time before she finished her course, such of the exiles as had their chief support from the charity of good people in England, were beginning to be anxious, the usual supplies being in a great measure cut off. This was owing to the malicious vigilance of bishop Gardiner, who, gaining intelligence of their benefactors here, threw some of them into prison, and impoverished others by various modes of oppression; so that the current of their bounty to the transmarines was almost entirely stopt. (†) Yet in this difficulty the exiles were liberally relieved by the seasonable humanity of several German princes and cities.

No sooner was the happy news of Elizabeth's accession to the throne publicly announced on the continent, than the exiles returned to England; and among the rest, Mr. Jewel. On his arrival, he spent his first six months at the house of Mr. Culverwell, a citizen of London; and then removed into the family of Lord Williams, of Tame. The 31st of March following, he was one of the eight Protestant divines who were appointed to hold an open disputation in Westminster Abbey, against eight Romanists. On this occasion, Fuller justly remarks that the issue of this conference was similar to "the general destiny of such public colloquies; which, like sycamore trees, prove barren; and the larger the leaves of expectation the less the fruits of success. The assembly dissolved; and it were hard to say which were louder, the Papists in complaining, or the Protestants in triumphing."

In July, (u) 1559, Mr. Jewel was appointed one of the Queen's commissioners to visit the dioceses of Sarum, Exeter, Bristol, Bath and Wells, and Gloucester; and to weed them as much as possible of Popery. And, not many months after (viz. Jan. 21, 1559-60), as a reward for his distinguished learning and merit, he was consecrated bishop of Salisbury.

So bright a luminary could not fail of moving to great advantage in so eminent a sphere. Even at a time when all the bishops of the Church of England were

(s) Calvin's whole stipend at Geneva amounted to about twenty-five pounds, sterling, per annum.—The senate pressed him to accept of more; but he peremptorily refused any addition. Supposing more, at that time, to be four times as valuable as at present, his income was worth about £100 per annum, according to the modern estimation of specie. Even Monsieur Bayle admires and celebrates this extraordinary proof of Calvin's disinterestedness and deadness to the world: "That a man," says he, "who had acquired so great reputation, and such authority, should yet have had a salary but of an hundred crowns, and refuse to accept of more; and, after living 55 years with the utmost frugality, should leave but three hundred crowns to his heirs, including his library, which sold very dear, is something so heroic, that one must have lost all feeling not to admire it."

Melancthon's salary was not a great deal better, considering he had a wife and family to take care of. His income (see the Biographical Dictionary, vol. viii. p. 325.) was but three hundred German florins per annum. A German florin is 2s. 4d. English. Consequently, his finances amounted to thirty-five pounds, yearly; which, quadrupled, make 140 per annum, according to the then value of money.

sound in the faith and eminent for holiness, Dr. Jewel was remarkable for the fervour of his graces, the sanctity of his life, and his laboriousness in the vineyard of Christ.

In his first episcopal visitation he began (what he afterwards happily perfected) such a thorough reformation, not only in his cathedral and in the parochial churches, but also in the courts of his jurisdiction, as procured both to himself and to the whole order of bishops the utmost reverence and esteem. He was a strict overseer of all the clergy and of all the parishes in his large diocese; and so narrowly watched the proceedings of his chancellor and archdeacons, and of his stewards and receivers, that they had no opportunity of conniving at error or at vice, much less of being guilty themselves of oppression or injustice. To prevent those abuses for which the episcopal courts were sometimes too deservedly censured, he frequently presided in person. And being, moreover, in the commission of the peace, he was no less useful as a civil magistrate, than exemplary as a bishop, and equitable as an ecclesiastical judge.

With regard to his more private conduct he usually rose at four in the morning; and after prayers with his family at five, and divine service in the cathedral at six, he was so fixed to his studies, all the remainder of the forenoon, that he could not without the greatest difficulty be persuaded to interrupt them. After dinner, his doors and his ears were open to all comers; and what had been said of the emperor Titus was justly applied to this Christian prelate, that he never sent any person away from his presence dissatisfied or grieved. Suitors being thus dismissed, he heard with singular patience and impartiality those causes which were either debated before him as judge or referred to him as an arbitrator; and as much of the day as remained unoccupied by these public duties he considered as clear gain to his studies.—About nine at night he called all his servants to a spiritual account how they had spent the day; and thence went to prayers with them in his chapel; whence he directly repaired again to his study, and read or wrote until about midnight.

He greatly distinguished himself by preaching and writing in the defence of the Church of England, and against the errors of Popery. In 1560, he gave a public challenge (in a sermon which he preached at St. Paul's Cross, London) to all the Papists throughout the world; defying them to produce but one clear and evident testimony out of any father that flourished within six hundred years after Christ, for any one of the various articles in which the Church of Rome dissents from that of England. His text (x) on this celebrated occasion was 1 Cor. xi. 23. This vigorous attack involved him in a long but very useful controversy, for the Romanists mustered their utmost forces to defend their sinking cause. And to their fruitless attempts we are indebted for that inestimable work of the bishop's, published in 1562, and entitled, An Apology for the Church of England; written by his lordship in elegant Latin, that all the learned men in Europe might judge on which side the stress of argument lay; and afterwards translated into English; and then into Greek, for the benefit of the Eastern Churches. Many Popish champions, both foreign and domestic, entered the lists against this masterly and unanswerable defence of the gospel. To these (and particularly to the cavils and calumnies of Harding the Jesuit) our prelate replied in A Defence of the Apology for the Church of England; first printed, A. D. 1564. In so great esteem was this treatise held that it was ordered, by queen Elizabeth and King Jas. I., to be read in every parish church throughout England and Wales; and that each of those sacred edifices should be furnished with a copy, chained to the wall. In some of our country churches this excellent book is still to be seen.—Mr. Harding strenuously attacked the Defence in a treatise published at Louvain, A. D. 1568. To which the indefatigable bishop wrote a rejoinder, printed at London, in folio, A. D. 1568, and 1570.

On the 26th of May, 1565, the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity though he was then absent; and the year following he attended queen Elizabeth in the visit she made to that noble seminary, and sat as Moderator at the divinity-disputations which were held before her majesty.

Providence had furnished this great and evangelical prelate with such natural talents as most highly qualified him for the important departments he was destined to sustain. His memory was capacious and retentive almost to a prodigy. After hearing a remarkable incident he penned it down in his common-place book, and the trouble of once writing anything would impress it so strongly on his mind that he never afterwards forgot it. If he wrote down an intended speech or a sermon (which it was always his custom to do), he just gave it a single perusal and could then exactly repeat the whole. When the bell began to toll for church he began to run his eye over his discourse, and was perfect master of it in a few minutes. Such were his firmness of nerves and power of recollection, that he used frequently to say, If I was to deliver a premeditated speech before ten thousand auditors, and they were shouting or fighting all the while, I should still be able to pronounce the whole of what I intended to speak. After once (or at the most twice) reading the hardest and uncomest words in such languages as the Welsh, Irish, &c.; and meditating a little upon them, he would repeat any forty of them at a time, either backwards or forwards, without hesitation. In the year 1563, Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the great seal, having read to him, out of Erasmus's Paraphrase, the last clauses of ten lines, in a confused and imperfect manner on purpose to try him, the bishop, covering his face with his hand and sitting silent awhile, immediately rehearsed all those broken sentences, both the right way and the contrary, without mistake or embarrassment.—He attained to this amazing memory partly by the help of art. It is to be wished that his method of improving that important faculty had been recorded. But we only know that he taught it to some of his friends, and among them to bishop Parkhurst, who profited so effectually by Dr. Jewel's rules, that he (Parkhurst) was able, in 28 days, and by devoting no more than one hour each day, to repeat the whole 28 chapters of St. Matthew's gospel, both regularly and in any detached parcels.

Though bishop Jewel was a constant preacher, and endowed with as profound and lively talents as man could well be, yet he never presumed so far on his inherent powers as to preach an extemporary sermon. I do not mean to say that he carried written notes with him into the pulpit, for I cannot find that he ever did this so much as once; but he always premeditated, and generally committed the principal parts of each discourse to writing, prior to his preaching it. In the article of premeditation he acted properly and wisely. In penning his sermons before hand he incurred, what I should humbly think, a needless drudgery.

His moral and social character were such as might be expected in a bishop who was savingly regenerated by divine grace, and who walked in close communion with God. Devout, charitable, and liberal; modest, humble, and temperate. His serenity of soul rendered him happy, affable, and cheerful; and God gave him the most absolute mastery over all his passions.

His genius was bright and quick; his application to study indefatigable. Hence he was profoundly versed in the sciences, and thoroughly acquainted with the Greek, Latin, and Italian languages; with a competent knowledge of the French and German.

Long before his final sickness he predicted its distant approach, and, when actually overtaken by it, he foretold the precise day of his death. So far was he from shrinking back at the thoughts of his dissolution, that (y) by fasting, labour, and watch ing, he rather seemed to accelerate it: desirous to entertain death, and to meet his Saviour. When in a very weak and emaciated state, he was riding to Laycock (a beautiful village, near Melksham, in Wiltshire), with an intention to preach; a gentleman, who met him, tenderly advised him "to return home for his health's sake; it being better that the people should want one sermon than that the Church of God should lose such a preacher." To whom the holy invalid returned this memorable answer (hear it, ye modern dignitaries and blush!): "It becomes a bishop to die in the pulpit, preaching the gospel."<sup>(z)</sup> He went forward to Laycock, and preached as he intended. His text was, Gal. v. 16. Walk in the Spirit. It was the last sermon he ever preached; for his illness gaining ground on him more and more, he was conveyed from Laycock to the neighbouring parish of Monkton Farley; where, taking to his bed, he resigned his valuable soul to God, September 23, 1571, in the 50th year of his age. He was interred in the choir of his cathedral, at Salisbury, where his grave-stone with his name upon it yet remains.

With respect to his person, he was of a thin habit of body, which natural thinness was increased by his abstemious way of living, his want of exercise, and his intense studies. So that, in the latter part of his life, he was almost a breathing skeleton; or in the words of Dr. Humphrey, Ad incredibilem maciem perductus, et vivum quasi cadaver effectus.

He bequeathed the greater part of his estate to his servants, to indigent scholars, and to the poor of Salisbury. A short time before he departed, he called all his family into his chamber, and expounded the Lord's Prayer to them as they stood weeping round his bed. "It has always been my desire," said he, "that I might glorify God, by sacrificing my life unto death, in defence of his truth. But though God has not granted my desire, yet I rejoice that my body is exhausted and worn away, in the labours of my holy calling. And now my hour is at hand, I earnestly desire you to pray for me, and to help me with the ardency of your affections, when you perceive me, through the infirmity of the flesh, to languish in my prayers. Hitherto I have taught you, but now the time is come wherein I desire to be taught and strengthened by you." He then requested them to sing the 71st psalm, in which he joined with them, so far as his extreme weakness would permit. Among his dying ejaculations were these:—Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace.—Break off all delays.—Lord, receive my spirit. One of the company burst out into prayer, with tears, beseeching God to restore the bishop's health, and to continue him longer upon earth. The expiring saint overheard the supplications of his friend, and answered, "I have not lived so as to be ashamed of living longer; neither am I afraid to die, because we have a merciful Lord. A crown of righteousness is laid up for me. Christ is my righteousness. Father, thy will be done. Thy will, I say, not mine, which is imperfect and depraved. This day, quickly, let me see the Lord Jesus."

Dr. Fuller's summary character of the bishop deserves to be transcribed.

"A jewel sometimes taken for a single precious stone, is properly a collective of many orderly set together for their best advantage. So several eminences met in this worthy man; naturals, artificials (among which I recount his studied memory, deserving as well as Theodectes, the surname of Mnemonicus), morals, but principally spirituals.

"So devout in the pew where he prayed: diligent in the pulpit where he preached: grave on the bench of judicature where he assisted: mild in the consistory where he judged: pleasant at the table where he fed: patient in the bed where he died: that well it were if in relation to him secundum usum Sarum were made precedential to all posterity.

"He gave at his death to Peter Martyr a golden rose, more fragrant for the worth of the giver than the value of the gift. To the city of Zurich a present, which they converted into a piece of plate, with Jewel's arms thereon. To several scholars large legacies. To the church of Salisbury a fair library; and another to the church of England; I mean his learned Apology.

"It is hard to say whether his soul or his ejaculations arrived first in heaven; seeing he prayed dying, and died praying.

"He was buried in the choir by bishop Wyvil; two champions of the church lying together. One who with his sword professed to maintain the lands; the other, with his pen, defended the doctrine thereof.

"In the absence of Dr. Humphrey, designed for that service, Mr. Giles Laurence preached his funerals (i. e. funeral sermon); who formerly (being tutor to the children, of Sir Arthur Darcie, by Aldgate, in London), in queen Mary's days, preserved Jewel's life, and provided accommodations for his flight beyond the seas."

SOME ACCOUNT OF DR. CARLETON, BISHOP OF CHICHESTER.

GEORGE CARLETON, one of the ablest and devoutest prelates on record in English history, was born A.D. 1559, at Norham in Northumberland; of which castle his father was at that time governor.

He received his grammatic learning under the care of the celebrated Mr. Bernard Gilpin; whose faithful, judicious, and affectionate attention to his young pupil was so remarkably owned of God that the excellent tutor had the satisfaction of seeing him rise at once into a scholar and a saint. When Mr. Carleton became sufficiently qualified for the University, he was transplanted to Edmund Hall, in Oxford, where he was liberally supported by the munificence of his old master Mr. Gilpin, who loved him as his son, and who seems to have foreseen the eminence and usefulness for which God had designed him.

While at Oxford, our future bishop was a pattern to the rest of his fellow-students in piety, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity. Persons who are devout in very early life are sometimes prone to neglect, if not to despise, that literary cultivation of the understanding which at a more advanced age they know the value of too late. Mr. Carleton was blest with a measure of wisdom, to discern and avoid this mistake. Next to the care of his soul and the maintenance of communion with God, his grand business was to furnish his mind with as much important knowledge as he could grasp. Hence the solid and swift advances which Providence enabled him to make in the various walks of useful and ornamental science. In February, 1580, he took his Bachelor's degree with a pre-eminence of applause, which did him honour as long as he lived, and laid the first visible foundation of his subsequent promotions.

He was elected Probationer Fellow of Merton College in the course of the last mentioned year 1580; and proceeded Doctor in Divinity, A. D. 1613. From his long and constant residence at Oxford, he appears to have been extremely fond of an academic life; nor probably would any thing but the royal command have drawn him out of a sphere so suited to his regular and philosophical turn of mind.

On the 12th of July, 1618, he was consecrated to the see of Llandaff: to which elevation he was raised and entitled, not only by his amazing genius, learning and virtues; but chiefly on account of his masterly and resolute opposition to Arminianism, which had by that time found its way hither from the Dutch Provinces, and with which several of the English clergy were then beginning to be infected. Dr. Carleton in his sermons and University disputations had shewn himself so watchful against the encroachments of this newly imported poison, and was so accomplished a master of the whole controversy, that king James I. (who hated the Arminians with a perfect hatred, until he thought fit some years afterwards to make use of them for political purposes) first appointed him to the above bishopric, and then sent him as his religious plenipotentiary, and as one of the four representatives of the Church of England, to the famous synod of Dort, where his lordship assisted that most venerable assembly in their candid trial and just condemnation of the Arminian heresies.

So faithfully as a minister of God, and so ably as a man of talent, did our excellent bishop acquit himself at Dort, that, on his return to England, the States of Holland wrote king James a letter of thanks for sending to them a person whom they not extravagantly styled "imago atque expressa virtutis effigies:" i. e., a living image and counterpart of all virtue. His majesty likewise was so thoroughly satisfied with the whole of his conduct (a) that he translated him to the see of Chichester, in Sept. 1619.

What must endear his name to posterity, while sound religion breathes in England, are the invaluable works which his pious and learned pen has bequeathed to the Church of God. Among these, shines his famous "Examination" of Mr. Richard Montagu's "Appeal." This Montagu, in order to curry favour with Charles I. and with archbishop Laud, wrote a very shallow, but very insolent tract, entitled "An Appeal to Cæsar;" in which the author was so lost to all sense of veracity and shame as to aim at squeezing the articles and homilies of the Church of England into the new fangled mould of Arminianism. Many were the refutations which the paltry and daring pamphlet received from some of the best and greatest clergymen then living. Bishop Carleton was among the foremost to assert the scriptural and established doctrines in opposition to the innovations of error, and to that worse than Stygian flood of varnished Atheism which has since overwhelmed so great part of the Protestant vineyard, and which still continues (though in a much narrower channel than formerly) to roll its baneful stream. The great prelate foresaw and deplored the terrible effects which have redounded from the free-will system; and which once operated almost to the utter extirpation of Christianity, morality and sound philosophy, from off the face of this land.

Before our civil and ecclesiastical troubles in the seventeenth century arrived at their height, God was pleased to translate Dr. Carleton from earth to heaven. He expired aged 69, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, and richly laden with good works, in May, 1628, and was buried the 27th of that month in the choir of Chichester cathedral, near the altar.

The compilers of Biographia Britannica, who have supplied us with several of the above particulars, are so just to the memory of this profound and steadfast Calvinistic bishop, as to observe that "He was a person of solid judgment, and of various reading; well versed in the fathers and schoolmen; wanting nothing that could render him a complete divine." Echard, in his "History of England (b)," characterises him in terms of distinguished honour: as does the indefatigable Dr. Fuller(c), whose words are: "About this time, George Carleton, that grave and godly bishop of Chichester, ended his pious life. He was bred and brought up under Mr. B. Gilpin, that apostolical man; whose life he (i. e. Bishop Carleton) wrote in gratitude to his memory. He retained his youthful and poetical studies fresh in his old age."

The testimony of the great Mr. Camden shall close the present sketch (I wish the materials were more ample) of this admirable prelate's life and character. The learned antiquarian, in his account of Northampton and its castle, writes as follows: "This, and other matters were taught me (for I shall always own my instructors) by George Carleton, born at this place; whom for his excellent proficiency in divinity (whereof he is professor), and the other polite parts of learning, I love and am loved by him: and I were unworthy of that love if I should not acknowledge his friendship (d)." Mr. Camden wrote this in 1607, some years before Dr. Carleton's elevation to a bishopric.

(a) "Res à synodo gestas non nostrum est attingere: satis erit adnotasse, Landavensem hunc nostrum tantà cum eruditionis et pietatis laude controversias agitatas administrasse, ut, in patriam reversus, Jacobo regi carior factus, ad episcopatum icestrensem, vicesimo Septembris, 1619, promoveretur."

MEMOIRS OF JOHN, LORD HARINGTON, BARON OF EXTON(e).

THIS extraordinary young nobleman was the eldest son of that lord and lady Harington to whose care king James I. committed the education of his daughter Elizabeth, who was afterwards married to Frederick prince elector palatine. They were persons eminent for prudence and piety, and were unwearied in forming the mind of their son to learning, and his manners to virtue.

He soon manifested that the labours of his parents and tutors was not in vain in the Lord. Effectual grace laid hold on his heart betimes, and as he advanced in years, he gave brighter and brighter evidences of sound conversion and increasing holiness.

In very early youth he was able to read the common Greek authors, not only with ease but with taste. He spoke Latin with fluency, and wrote it with elegance; and could converse with foreigners either in French or Italian. He was not a perfect speaker of the Spanish, but had enough of it to read and understand several books written in that language. Logic, natural and moral philosophy, and the mathematics, he was more than competently master of; and excelled in the theory of tactics and of navigation. What added lustre to all were, his deep experience, and his admirable knowledge of the great things of God. Theology was his grand and favourite study, and there were few even of the sacred order (though at that time bishops and clergymen merited the name of divines), who could disembarass an intricate question, or resolve a difficult case of conscience with more ability, judgment and spirituality, than he.

Being well grounded in religion and learning, his noble father sent him to make the tour of France and Italy, under the care of the excellent Mr. Tovey, who had formerly been head master of the free school at Coventry. During their travels on the continent, they seem to have been imprudently zealous in their avowal of the Protestant faith; by which having given offence to some Jesuits, the latter took an opportunity to administer a slow, but sure poison, to the noble traveller and his religious tutor; that (says the original writer of this memoir) "seeing they had no hope of being able to corrupt their minds, they might at least destroy their bodies, and bring them to their graves."

Mr. Tovey, who was in years, and less able to encounter the strength of so potent a poison, died quickly after his return to England. But Lord Harington, who was of a strong constitution, and in the prime of life, did not so soon yield to its effects, though its violence presently shewed itself in his countenance, and a very few years afterwards terminated in death.

On his lordship's arrival in England from his travels, he testified his gratitude to God, by giving twenty pounds to the poor, which donation he continued annually while he lived. The second sabbath after his landing (having spent the preceding Saturday with his tutor, Mr. Tovey, in prayer, fasting, and thanksgiving), he devoutly attended on the preaching of the word, received the Lord's supper, and distributed five pounds to the poor of that parish, together with forty pounds besides for the relief of indigent ministers, and of other distressed Christians. At all times, his constant rule was, never to devote less than a tenth part of his income to charitable purposes.

From the first day of his last sickness, he strongly apprehended the approach of death; and exercised himself in such thoughts and duties as might tend to loosen him more and more from the world, and aid his affections in their flight to heaven. Much of his time was spent in social and private prayer, and his conversation, with his friends and domestics, turned chiefly on continual confessions of his own sinfulness, declarations of his faith, and professions of his sure and certain justification through Christ Jesus. So strong was his assurance of interest in the covenant of grace, that not one cloud of misgiving seems to have darkened his mind; but he was enabled to testify, with joy unspeakable and full of glory, that he feared not death, in what form soever it might come to him.

Great were his desires to be dissolved and taken home to the Lord. About two hours before he departed, he witnessed to those about him that he still felt the assured comforts and joys of his salvation by Christ. When the last agonies were upon him, he was heard to say, O thou, my joy! O my God! when shall I be with thee? In the midst of which holy breathings, he placidly and triumphantly surrendered his soul to God, A. D. 1613; aged 22 years.

His manner of life had been eminently and uniformly religious. He usually rose every morning at five; and sometimes at four. When he first waked, his constant care was to cultivate communion with God, by offering up the first-fruits of the day, and of his thoughts to the uncreated Majesty. So soon as dressed, he endeavoured to put his heart in tune for family worship, by reading a portion of scripture; after which, he prayed with his servants. This duty concluded, he spent about an hour in reading some valuable book, calculated to inform his understanding, and to animate his graces. — Calvin's Institutions, and Mr. Rogers's Treatise, (f) were among the performances which he highly esteemed, and which he carefully studied.

Before dinner and before supper his family were called together to wait on God in reading, singing, and prayer. After supper prayer was repeated: and, if he was at leisure from company or business, he then retired to write his diary; in which he faithfully recorded the temptations, sins, and spiritual mercies of the day. When in bed, some or other of his devout servants read to him, out of the scriptures, for an hour or longer, until he betook himself to sleep. Thus he both lay down and awoke with God.

He was a most strict observer of the Lord's day: and, as far as possible, devoted the whole of it to private and public duties: yet so as to shew that in his estimation public ordinances should have the preference to private ones: knowing that the Lord loveth the gates of Sion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. Hence, though he had a household chaplain, he constantly attended the public service twice every sabbath: nor did he violate this rule, even when he was called to attend the royal court. If business, or other providences, cast his lot occasionally where the word was not preached, he would ride many miles to some other place at the proper seasons, rather than defraud his soul of spiritual food. Immediately after sermon, he would seclude himself from company for about half an hour, in order, by prayer and meditation, to digest what he had heard. After evening sermon, two of his servants repeated in the family, before supper, the substance of that and the morning discourse, from notes which they had written at the times of preaching; and so great was his memory that he himself would usually repeat more than they had committed to writing. He then entered the heads, and principal passages of each sermon, in a plain paper book which he kept for that purpose; and afterwards dismissed his domestics with prayer, in which he had a very extraordinary gift.

By way of preparation for the sabbath, he called his soul to a strict account every Saturday night; and with confession, supplication, and thanksgiving, committed himself to the grace of God in Christ. On the Lord's-day morning, rising as usual very early, he repeated to the attendants who waited on him while he was rising, a summary of the two sermons which they had heard the Sunday before.

Every month he received the holy communion; and sanctified the preceding day as a solemn private fast: reviewing the memoirs of his experiences and conduct in the month before, and spending the whole day in prayer, meditation, and self-examination. He carefully noted, on this occasion, how it had been with him since his last appearance at the holy table; what progress he had made in piety; how he had thrived in grace, and what additional strength the Lord had given him over his corruptions. Thus he spent his monthly fast (besides which, he frequently kept other days of private humiliation); not coming out of his study until about supper-time. On the sacrament morning, he constantly read 1 Cor. xi: wherein the institution of that holy ordinance is treated of: and, to his servants who were to communicate with him he read part of a spiritual treatise upon the same subject.

He was deeply attentive to the word preached, sensible that he was, then, eminently in the presence of God; and demonstrated, by the awfulness and circumspection of his behaviour, that he came to hear, not the preacher, but Christ speaking in his word.

To avoid all appearance of ostentation, it was his custom not to admit any visitant or acquaintance, either to his prayers, or to the repetition of sermon, in and with his family, except one intimate friend only, who used to be indulged in bearing a part in these heavenly devotions. How far lord Harington judged exactly right, in this extreme scrupulousness, is not for us to enquire. But it certainly resulted from a very high sense of modesty and religious delicacy.

He is now engaged in still more exalted family worship, and sings, with angels and glorified saints, the song of Moses and the Lamb. Reader, be not slothful in the works of God; but a follower of them, who, through faith and patience, inherit the promises.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE LIFE OF HERMAN WITSIUS, D. D. TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN ORATION WHICH MARCKIUS DELIVERED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF LEYDEN, AT HIS INTERMENT.

ENCHUUSEN is a noted and considerable city of West Friesland, and remarkable for being one of the first towns in the United Provinces, which, A. D. 1572, shook off the Spanish yoke. It was eminent, moreover, on another account; namely, that having embraced the pure faith of the gospel, this city was inflexibly tenacious of the truths it had received, and made a most strenuous and successful stand against the insolent innovations and incroachments of the Arminians, at a time when that pestilent sect was newly started up, and had rendered itself, by the number of its adherents, very formidable to the whole reformed interest in Holland. And although this city, from the convenience of its situation (being a seaport), had been for a long series of ages famous for its extensive commerce; yet it has been so happy as to produce many very learned men, and able ministers of the gospel: and perhaps, amidst all its advantages, it has not more reason to boast of any thing than for being the birth-place of our Hermanus Witsius; who was born here on the 12th of February, 1636. Which same month and year were rendered further memorable, by the erection of the famous school of Utrecht into an University.

His father, Nicholas Witsius, served the Church of Enchuysen, first as deacon, and then as presbyter: and in course of time, being advanced to civil honours, he was made treasurer and chief magistrate of the city: in all which stations, his piety, integrity, and humility, exceedingly endeared him to all his fellow-citizens. He also composed a book of sacred poems and hymns: which were in their matter so evangelical, and in their manner so accurate and lively, that they seemed dictated by heaven to inspire devout affections, and cultivate holy joy and spiritual-mindedness.

The mother of our Witsius was Joanna, daughter of Herman Gerardus: who, suffering greatly in his own country on account of his religious principles, after sustaining many losses and running various hazards, got safe to Enchuysen; where he settled with his family, and became an eminent minister in the church. Here he continued preaching the gospel for upwards of thirty years, and discharged his important trust with singular faithfulness and zeal: admired by all, no less for his eloquence than learning. And so hearty were his attachments to his flock in this place, that he refused many invitations sent him from several churches in Holland, of greater dignity and much larger revenues than his own.

Witsius, thus descended on both sides from such worthy persons, looked upon himself as under an additional obligation so to behave and adjust his conduct, throughout the course of his life, as, by the blessing of divine grace, to bring no stain or dishonour on a family thus happily distinguished by their extraordinary love to God and reverence for his laws.

Before he was born, his pious parents made a vow to the Lord that, if they had a male child, they would, from his earliest years, endeavour to devote him to the ministry and service of the sanctuary. At length, a son came; and they called him, after his pious grandfather, Hermannus: beseeching God, at the same time, that the spirit of that holy man whose name he bore, might, as it were, revive in this his grandson; and that their infant offspring might not only equal, but if possible, even go beyond, him in Christian graces and ministerial abilities. And their prayers were indeed signally answered.

I must not forget to inform the reader that Witsius came (as it is called) before his time: and this premature birth had well nigh cost both mother and son their lives. In consequence of this, he was, when born, so uncommonly small and weakly that the midwife and the other women present concluded he must die in a few hours. But herein God disappointed their fears, and (for what can make void his purposes?) raised this puny infant afterwards into a very great man (not in body, for he was always spare and thin): a man of vast intellectual abilities, brightened and improved by deep study, and whose fame diffused itself throughout the whole Christian world by his useful, numerous, and learned labours.

His parents, after this danger, took particular care of his education, and were obliged to be extremely tender of his health. Above all, they endeavoured (and their endeavours were crowned with success equal to their largest wishes,) to bring him up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord: teaching him, ere he could speak distinctly, to lisp out the praises of God, and unfold his wants in prayer before the throne of grace.

In the sixth year of his age, he was entered at the public school of his native town, to learn the rudiments of Latin. There he continued three years; at the end of which space, his mother's brother, Peter Gerardus, took him to his own house, and under his own immediate tuition. This worthy person was a great master of philosophy and the learned languages; but chiefly devoted his time to the study of divinity: and not being then in any public employment, enjoyed a comfortable and useful retirement, addicting himself much to the instruction and improvement of his nephew, whom he loved as his own son.

Under the care of his good uncle, Witsius made so rapid a progress in learning that before he was fifteen years old, he could not only speak and write the Latin language correctly, and with some degree of fluency; but could also readily interpret the books of the Greek Testament, and the orations of Isocrates, and render the Hebrew commentaries of Samuel into Latin at the same time giving the etymology of the original words, and assigning the reasons of the variations of the pointing grammatically. He had, likewise, now acquired some knowledge of philosophy; and had so far made himself master of logic that, when he was removed to the University, he needed no preceptor to instruct him in that art. He learned also, while he continued with his uncle, Walæus's and Burgersdicius's Compendiums of Ethics: which latter author he plied so diligently, that he could at any time repeat by heart the quotations cited by him from any of the ancient writers, whether Greek or Latin. He acquainted himself too with the elements of Natural Philosophy and Metaphysics; and as his uncle always kept him usefully employed, he was likewise master, and that almost by heart, of Windelin's Compendium of Theology: the good man deeming it an essential and special part of his duty to make his nephew from his earliest youth intimately versed in matters of divinity.

His uncle himself had from his own childhood been inured to sanctify the ordinary actions and offices of life, by sending up ejaculatory aspirations to God, suitable to the business he was about; in order to which he had made his memory the storehouse of some more eminently useful and familiar texts of Scripture, both of the Old and New Testament, which related or might be accommodated to every part of common life; so that when he lay down, rose up, dressed, washed, walked abroad, studied, or did any thing else, he could repeat apposite passages from the holy Scriptures in their original languages of either Hebrew or Greek; thereby in a very eminent manner acknowledging God in all his ways, and doing whatsoever he did to his glory. This same excellent practice he recommended to his nephew; which had so happy an effect that very many portions both of the Hebrew Bible and the Greek Testament were, in his youth, so deeply impressed on Witsius's memory, that even in his old age he never forgot them. Were all who are intrusted with the education of others equally diligent in forming the minds of their pupils betimes to piety and learning, and were all young men equally attentive and obsequious as Witsius, they would be better scholars at their entrance into the University than the generality of them now are when they leave it.

Having made so swift and deep a progress in most kinds of learning, Witsius began to think of removing to some University, and fixed on that of Utrecht, which was very eminent for the excellency of its course, the strictness of its discipline, the reputation of its professors, and the number of its students. What chiefly recommended this place to him were the advantages he hoped to gain from the lectures and conversation of those very famous divines, who at that time flourished there; especially Maatsius, Hoornebeck, and Gisbert Voetius. Hither, therefore, he came A.D. 1651, and in the fifteenth year of his age. But just before he reached Utrecht, Maatsius was gathered to his fathers; so that on his arrival he had only the melancholy satisfaction of hearing the great Hoornebeck pronounce the funeral oration over his much loved friend and colleague.

Being thus entered at the University he assiduously applied himself to metaphysics, using for that purpose the Manuductio of Paul Voetius; and being greatly taken with the Oriental languages, he studied them under the ever memorable John Leusden, then professor and teacher of those tongues there. Under the direction of that eminent linguist he went through the greater part of the Hebrew Bible; as also made himself master of the Hebrew commentaries of R. Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and Kimichi, on Hosea; Jonathan's Chaldee paraphrase on Isaiah; and the Onkelos, on part of the Pentateuch. He likewise, under the tutorage of Luesden, acquainted himself with the mysteries of the Masora, and the intricacies of the Talmud, as set forth by Cocceius and L'Empereur. Through his instructions, he acquired the knowledge of Syriac and the rudiments of Arabic. He very early gave a specimen of his great proficiency in the Hebrew tongue by composing a most elegant and masterly oration in that language, De Mosis Judæorum et Christianorum; which at the request of his master Leusden he pronounced with great applause before the University, A. D. 1654, and in the eighteenth year of his age.

Though he was thus devoted to matters of literature, he nevertheless set apart the major portion of his time for the study of divinity; to which, as he rightly judged, the others were to act in subserviency. In order to proceed properly in this greatest and best of sciences, he put himself under the guidance of such theological professors as were most eminent for profound learning and the exactest skill in the sacred volumes; and who might consequently be most serviceable to him in the prosecution of such studies. These were Gisbert Voetius, John Hoornebeck, Walter Bruinius, and Andrew Essenius. Assisted, therefore, with such preceptors and adding to their instructions indefatigable labour on his own part, and both being crowned with the grace and blessing of God, the reader may form some judgment how vast a proficiency such a student with such advantages must needs make.

About this time he had a great desire of repairing to Groningen, chiefly with a view to see and hear the celebrated Maresius, then professor of divinity in that University. Hither, therefore, he repaired towards the latter end of the year 1654. Being arrived, he devoted himself entirely to divinity under the sole guidance of Maresius; and entered on the exercises previous to preaching. These he performed in the French tongue; and so well did he acquit himself to the satisfaction of his tutor Maresius that, notwithstanding that great man was so much taken up with various business of importance, he nevertheless condescended to look over and with his own hand to correct Witsius's declamations before he pronounced them in public.

Having spent a year at Groningen, and obtained ample testimonials of his good behaviour and great abilities from the college of divines, he determined for Leyden; but having received information that the plague was making great havoc in that city, he changed his mind and resolved to revisit his beloved Utrecht, that he might there perfect himself in divinity, in which he had already made such large and happy advances.

On his return to Utrecht, he not only as formerly attended all the divinity lectures both public and private of the several professors, but entered into a strict and thorough intimacy with that very excellent divine Bogaerdus, than whom, Witsius was of opinion, a greater man never lived. From his lectures, conversation, example, and prayers, through the blessed energy and grace of the divine Spirit, Witsius was enlightened into the mysteries of the Redeemer's kingdom, and led into the comfortable, heart-felt enjoyment of inward, spiritual, and experimental Christianity. Through his means he first learned how widely different that knowledge of divine things is which, flows from mere learning, study, and acquisition, from that sublime and heaven-taught wisdom which is the result of fellowship with Christ by the Holy Ghost; and which, through his own powerful influences on the heart of his elect, gloriously conforms the believing soul more and more to the blessed image of its divine Saviour.

Witsius always humbly and thankfully acknowledged that Bogaerdus was the instrument God made use of to lead him into the innermost temple of holy love and gracious experience; whereas until then he stood only in the outer court; but thenceforward disclaiming all vain wisdom and self-dependance, he was happily brought to sit down at the feet of Jesus, simply to learn the mysteries of his grace from his blessed teachings alone, and to receive his kingdom as a little child.

Nor yet was he so taken up with these delightful and sublime matters as to omit, or slight, his academical studies, which appeared, from his Theses concerning the Trinity, written about this time; wherein with great learning and singular dexterity, he proved that important doctrine from the writings of the ancient Jews, and showed how very far the modern ones were degenerated in that article from their rabbis and forefathers. These Theses he debated publicly in the University, under the presidency of Leusden; and, although they were opposed by some of the oldest standers and ablest disputants in the college, yet Leusden was of opinion that his young pupil defended his positions so well, and maintained his ground in so firm and masterly a manner, as to stand in need of no assistance from him; wherefore he sat by the whole time without interposing one word, but left Witsius entirely to it himself. And it being customary there when disputations are over for the defendant to return thanks to the President for his care and assistance; when Witsius did this, the President replied with equal truth and politeness, "You have no reason, sir, to make me such an acknowledgment, since you neither had, nor stood in need of any assistance from me." This was in the year 1655, and in the nineteenth year of his age.

Being by this time very famous in the two Universities of Utrecht and Groningen, it was thought high time for him to enter on an office wherein he might be made of general service to the church. In order to this, it is expected there that all candidates for the ministry give some previous specimen to the church of their knowledge in divine things, and of their abilities for so important an undertaking. Wherefore he presented himself for his preparatory examination, at Enchuyzen, A. D. 1656. Here he was admitted to preach publicly, which he did with extraordinary reputation and universal applause. So great was the satisfaction he gave, that there were scarce any country churches in North Holland, which were without a pastor, that did not put down his name in the list of the candidates, out of whom the choice was to be made.

At the instigation of that reverend man, John Boisius, minister of the French Protestant Church at Utrecht, Witsius, though naturally exceedingly bashful and diffident, was prevailed with to solicit the assembly of French divines convened at Dor, for license to preach publicly and in the French language in their churches. This he easily obtained; partly by the influence of the celebrated Anthony Hulsius, to whom, at the request of Boisius, Witsius had written a very elegant epistle in Hebrew.

From that time forward he often preached in French, both at Utrecht and Amsterdam; as in the course of his ministry he had done a considerable time before out of the French pulpit at Leuwarden. But thinking himself not quite perfect in that language, he proposed taking a journey into France for that end; as also that he might have an opportunity of seeing the many eminent divines and university professors who then flourished in the Protestant parts of that kingdom. But divine Providence was pleased to order matters otherwise; for in the year 1657, and the twenty-first of his age, he had a regular call from the church of Westwouden to be their minister; and into this office he was initiated on the 8th of July in the same year. Westwouden is a town situate between Enchuyzen and Hoorn, at about an equal distance from both; and, in ecclesiastical matters, is united to the adjoining parish of Binne Wiisent. Here he waited on God and his church for upwards of four years; and, being in the prime of life, was the better able to discharge the duties of his function with activity and diligence. He had the satisfaction to see his labours succeed, especially among the younger sort, whom he very frequently catechised with great sweetness and condescension, accommodating himself to their understandings; insomuch that both the children and youth of the place, who, at his first coming there, were quite ignorant of every thing, could not only give a judicious account of the principal heads in divinity, but could also confirm and support the account they give with numerous and pertinent quotations from Scripture; and when they came home from church and were at any time questioned as to the sermon they had heard, they could without any trouble recapitulate the chief particulars of the discourse, its subject, divisions, doctrines, and improvements.

When the fame of our learned and able pastor began to reach far and wide, he received an invitation from the church of Wormeren, in the same province of North Holland, to be their minister; a church famous for its numbers, but at that time sadly harassed with intestine jars and divisions; and who therefore thought they could not possibly choose a pastor more capable of edifying his flock and of calming their dissensions than Witsius. To this call of theirs he acceded, and undertook the ministry of that church in the month of October, 1661, and the 25th year of his age. Here he staid four years and a half; so reconciling all parties, and building them up in the knowledge of Christ, and the obedience of faith, that on one hand he had the comfort to see himself the object of his people's most affectionate regard, and on the other that his pious and pacific labours were not in vain in the Lord. This being his situation he could not be prevailed with to change it by complying with the earnest and repeated invitations sent him by the inhabitants of Sluys, a town in Flanders, to take on him the pastoral care of that place and to preach to them alternately in French and Dutch. However, being afterwards invited to Goës, in Zealand, he thought it advisable to accept the call; and repairing thither about Whitsun-tide, A. D. 1666, was universally admired for his purity of doctrine, depth of learning, diligence in his office, and holiness of life. Here he had three pious and learned co-adjutors; two of whom, being considerably older than himself, he revered as parents; and the third, being much about his own age, he loved as his brother; maintaining with them all a most pleasing harmony and profitable intimacy. While he continued here, he enjoyed such opportunities of study and retirement, and was in all respects so comfortably situated, that he would often afterwards declare he never spent his time with greater pleasure and improvement, and could have wished to have passed his days in a connection so agreeable.

But these wishes were superseded by the inhabitants of Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland; who, in November, 1667, invited him to their metropolis; that so burning and shining a light might, by being fixed in so conspicuous a place, diffuse its useful rays in a manner over the whole province. Hither, therefore, he came in April, 1668; the church at Goës having dismissed him with great reluctance and concern, and contrived all the methods they could devise, if not to prevent, yet at least to retard his journey, and detain him with them as long as they could.

During his stay at Leeuwarden, it can scarce be conceived with what vigilance, faithfulness and prudence, he laid himself out for the edification, comfort and discreet guidance of that church; which was a matter of the greater difficulty, as the public affairs were in a very critical and precarious situation; the United Provinces being at that time engaged in a dangerous war, and the enemy making frequent inroads into their territories. At this season of exigence and distress, I much question if there ever lived a man whose labour for the good both of church and state were more remarkably successful, and who by his great talents, as well in civil as religious matters, rendered himself more useful and pleasing to persons of all ranks and stations. One signal proof of the high esteem in which he was held, was his being made tutor to Henry Casimir, prince of Nassau, and hereditary governor of the province of Friesland. He was also singled out to be the religious instructor of Amelia, the fore-mentioned prince's most illustrious sister; and who was afterwards married to the duke of Saxony Eisenach. Witsius was made very useful to the soul of this excellent princess, by his prudent and pious informations; and about this time he had the framing and drawing up of the Confession of Faith, published by that princess and her brother (with the approbation and concurrence of their mother, Albertina, Princess of Orange), to the no small joy and edification of the churches in their dominions.

In the year 1675, that very reverend and learned divine, John Melchior Steinberg, professor of theology in the university of Franeker, departed to a better world; and, that they might the better repair so great a loss, it is no wonder that that university made choice of Witsius to fill up the vacant professorship; especially as they had abundant experience of his integrity and great abilities during his seven years' residence in their province of Friesland. And, which, seemed to add still greater weight to their invitation, and made it appear yet more providential, the church at Franeker being about the same time deprived of one of their pastors, embraced the present occasion of calling him to be over them in the Lord.

Witsius, on the offer of these two important charges repaired to Franeker, and after the university had conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity, he was solemnly invested with the professorship on the 15th of April, 1675, having first, as is customary, delivered a most beautiful oration, De vero Theologo, to the great satisfaction of a vast auditory, who flocked to Franeker on this occasion from all parts of the province.

During his presidency, the university was remarkably thronged with students, many who were designed for the ministry repairing thither on his account, from various parts of Europe; who, having finished their studies under his tutorage and direction, returned back to their own several countries, equally built up in piety and advanced in learning. And, that he might be defective in no part of his duty, but every way answer the large expectations of those who promoted him, he had scarce entered on his professorship before he began (surrounded as he was with business of great importance, both public and private, all which he faithfully and ably discharged) to set about writing; and published in a very short space (besides some select academical disputations, and a smaller discourse), two learned and pretty large treatises in Latin; to wit, his immortal book on the Economy of the Covenants, and his Exercitations on the Apostle's Creed. These had a prodigious sale, being soon vended throughout Holland and all Europe; and, going through several editions, were read with great applause and admiration of their author.

About this time, he became acquainted with the famous John Marckius (afterwards his colleague), who, being originally a native of Friesland, though educated at Leyden, after he had finished his studies there, now returned to his own country; and Witsius having, by authority from the ecclesiastical synod, examined him as to his abilities for the ministry, solemnly set him apart as pastor of the church at Midluman, situate between Franeker and Harlingen. Soon after Marckius commenced D. D. and was, by Witsius's influence with the prince and senate, made ordinary professor of divinity in Franeker, A. D. 1676.

Friesland, thus happily possessed of so inestimable a treasure as Witsius, began to be the envy of the neighbouring states and universities, who were each desirous of enjoying so eminent a man themselves. The University of Groningen was the first that invited him to leave his settlement at Franeker; for, having lost their great professor, James Altingius, they scarcely knew where to avail themselves of a successor equally capable of discharging the several weighty duties of theological and philological professor, and likewise that of being pastor of the university church. Wherefore, in the latter end of the year 1679, they deputed a reverend and learned member of their society to wait on Witsius at Franeker, who, being arrived, offered him very advantageous terms if he would remove to Groningen.

Witsius immediately communicated the proposal to the prince, and to the heads of the university of Franeker, and desired their advice. They, with one voice, testifying the great esteem in which they held him, and uniting in a most earnest request that he would not think of leaving them, he very modestly and respectfully excused himself to the university of Groningen.

In the beginning of the year 1680, the university of Utrecht (their professor, Burmannus, being dead) looked out for some eminent person to make up his loss; and without much hesitation fixed their eyes on Witsius for this purpose. In order to prevail with him to accept the overture, they dispatched an honourable deputation to Franeker, by whom they importuned him to come over to Utrecht, and adorn that church and university with his residence.

Although Witsius was cordially attached to Friesland, as being the place of his nativity, and where he had spent the major part of his life; yet from the love he bore to Utrecht, the place of his education, the messengers had not much difficulty in gaining his consent. Therefore, being with great reluctance on their part dismissed by the university of Franeker, he repaired to Utrecht, where he and the famous Triglandius were jointly invested with the ministry of that church on the 25th April, 1680; and four days after he commenced divinity professor; having first delivered a most elegant oration (afterwards printed) De Præstantiâ Veritatis Evangelicæ.

In this elevated station he continued more than 22 years; during which time it is incredible with what application and success he guided the affairs both of the church and university; each of which flourished exceedingly under his faithful and laborious administration.

He was singularly happy in his colleagues; having for his assessors in the university those illustrious divines, Peter Mastricht, Melchior Leidecker and Herman Halenius. For his assistants in the church he had many equally eminent for piety, learning, zeal, and moderation; among whom were Peter Eindhovius, and John Ladstrager, formerly his colleagues in the church at Leeuwarden. He had likewise in the university, besides those already mentioned, that immortal linguist, John Luedsen, formerly his tutor; together with Gerard Uriesius, and John Luitsius, both very eminent in philosophy, and to whose care for instruction in matters purely literary, those youth were committed who were designed for the ministry.

His congregation at Church consisted chiefly of the magistrates and inhabitants of the city, who were all no less edified than astonished at the energy which accompanied his preaching, and the masterly freedom and propriety of his elocution.

As a public and private tutor, he had a most numerous circle of excellent youths, who flocked on his account to Utrecht from every part of the Protestant world; and who hung, with no less rapture than improvement, on his learned, pious, and eloquent lips. Even his private lectures were attended daily, not only by these his pupils, but likewise by great numbers of doctors in divinity, and professors of the several sciences.

This great man, therefore, seeing his labours crowned with such abundant success, spared no pains nor fatigues whereby he might advance the interests and diffuse the knowledge of religion and learning. In consequence of this he would spend many nights totally without sleep; nor was he content with serving the church and the university by preaching, lecturing, conversing, and disputing in the public halls, but committed his treasures of knowledge to writing, and published many books truly invaluable, which will transmit his name with renown to succeeding generations; nor can they ever sink into oblivion, so long as true religion, unaffected elegance, and profound literature, have a friend left in the world.

The people of Utrecht, from the highest to the lowest, were thoroughly sensible of the worth of such a man; whence we find them heaping all the honours upon him which, being a minister, he was capable of receiving. He had always the preference given him in their synods, and was twice honoured with the supreme government and headship of the University: namely, in the years 1686 and 1697. Nor must we omit that when, in the year 1685, the States of Holland sent a splendid embassy to James the Second, king of Great Britain, who at that time was pursuing measures which at last justly ended in his total ruin; and Wassenar, lord of Duvenwarden, and Weddus, lord of Dykevelt, and Cittersius, were the persons nominated to execute this sumptuous commission; the second of these noble personages easily convinced the other two that none was so proper to attend them to England, in quality of chaplain, as Witsius; who might not only by his uncommon knowledge in religious and civil matters be of great service to them in both respects; but also be no small credit to the reformed churches of Holland, by letting the English nation see what great divines flourished there. The design being intimated to Witsius, he cheerfully closed with it; though he was at that time very ill and weak in body. After some months' stay in England, he confessed, on his return, that he had conversed with the (g) archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London (h), and many other divines, both conformists and dissenters; "by which conversations," he would say, "I was much furthered in learning, experience, and moderation." (i) From that period forward the principal prelates and clergymen in England did not conceal the respect and esteem in which they held this great man; especially as he came to be more and more known to them.

(g) Dr. William Sandcroft. (h) Dr. Henry Compton.

(i) Marckius's words are, "Fassus est.—haud paucæ observasse, quæ ad doctrinæ suæ facerent augmentum, et quibus ad omnem prudentiam redederetur instructor."

By this time there were few places in the Christian world which the fame of Witsius had not reached. And now it was that the commissioners of the University of Leyden, and the magistrates of that city, resolved on inviting him thither; and the rather as the very eminent Spanhemius, junior, was judged to be ill past recovery; and it pleased that most excellent prince, William, king of Great Britain, and governor of Holland, to ratify their choice with his royal approbation. The professorship of Leyden being tendered to Witsius in form, he accepted it. Though the people of Utrecht were loth to part with so great an ornament, he had solid and sufficient reasons for removing; as he judged he might be more useful, if for the few remaining years of his life (which, according to the course of nature, could not be many), he should desist from preaching, and devote himself entirely to University business. He was the more confirmed in this resolution when he received information from Heinsius, the illustrious administrator of Holland, that king William heartily concurred in his removal. Some time afterwards that truly great monarch, having admitted Witsius to a personal conference, was pleased with his own mouth to ratify the same, in terms very affectionate and obliging; assuring him "how highly agreeable it was to him that he obeyed the call to the professor's chair at Leyden, of which call he [i. e. the king] himself was the first mover; and that for the future he might depend on his omitting no opportunity of testifying the favour he bore him, and the reverence in which he held him." And the king was ever after as good as his word.

On his entrance upon the professorship at Leyden (i. e. on the 16th of October, 1698), he delivered his fine oration De Theologo modesto. And with what integrity he discharged his high office for the remaining ten years of his life; how incessant his labours were; with what wisdom and skill he taught; with what resistless eloquence he spoke; with what alacrity he went through the academical disputations; how holily he lived; with what nervous beauty he wrote; with what sweetness of address, with what humility, candour, and benignity of demeanour he behaved in common life; and what an ornament he was to the University; were almost impossible, and altogether needless, to say.

He had scarce been a year at Leyden, when the States of Holland and West-Friesland, at the recommendation of the governors of the University, made him the regent of their Theological College, in the room of their lately deceased regent, Marcus Effius; which he could superintend without omitting any part of his duty as professor; having for his associate in the professorship the famous Antony Hulsius. When he was invested with this new office of trust and dignity, that illustrious nobleman, Hubert Rooseboomius, president of the supreme court of Holland, principal of the University of Leyden, and lord of Sgrevelsrecht, made a most elegant oration (registered in the college acts, and worthy of being universally read); wherein, in the name of the heads of the University, he not only largely set forth the just praises of the new regent, but likewise fervently exhorted the Fellows of the Divinity College to shew him all due veneration, and give him every other mark of becoming duty and esteem.

Witsius entered, with great reluctance, on this new stage of action; and it is well known that he would have absolutely declined it, had he not considered himself bound in duty and gratitude both to accede to the pleasure of the States, and to spend and be spent in the service of the Church. However, he went through this weighty office with fidelity and indefatigable zeal; and his care for the youth under him was rendered easier from the affection he bore them, and from the apparent success with which his instructions were attended. At the same time he was equally attentive to his duty as professor.

Thus usefully he went on till, upon the 8th of February, 1707, partly on account of his advanced age, and partly through infirmities of other kinds (his strength being almost exhausted by heavy and frequent sicknesses for some years back), he with great modesty resigned his important charge as regent, in a full assembly of the University heads and governors; who with one voice, and without intermission, even stooped to intreat his continuance in that office, but in vain, for Witsius, well nigh worn out with a series of years and labours, was as deaf to their intreaties as to the consideration of the very great revenues he must forego by quitting that exalted post. At the same time he was, at his own particular request, favoured with a discharge from the public exercise of his office as University professor; for the execution of which, with his usual accuracy and diligence, his great feebleness of body rendered him less able. And he declared, on the occasion, to an intimate friend, that "He had much rather desist altogether from the exercise of his function, than not go through with it in a becoming manner."

It would have been impossible for Witsius to have undergone so many and incredible fatigues for the public benefit, had he met with domestic troubles and family disquiets. To prevent these, A. D. 1660, he married Aletta Van Borchorn, the daughter of Wessalius Van Borchorn, a wealthy citizen and merchant of Utrecht. She was a woman happy in the singular sweetness of her temper; and, indeed, excelled in every Christian grace and social virtue. It was hard to say whether she more loved or revered her husband; between whom subsisted an interrupted harmony until her death, which happened in the year 1684, after living together 24 years. She was always the companion of his travels; having lived with him in North Holland, Zealand, Friesland, and Utrecht. Her last illness was very long and painful, which, however, she bore with fortitude and resignation truly Christian; and at last departed in great peace and comfort of soul.

He was no less happy in his children. For, not to mention two sons who died young, he had three most pious and accomplished daughters; Martina, who afterwards married Henry Dibbetsius, an eminent doctor in divinity in the Church of Leyden; Joanna, married to Luke Walckier, a judge and senator of Utrecht; and, lastly, Petronella, who would never leave her father, but always staid with him; and who a little before his last sickness was herself almost brought to the gates of death. So great were his trouble and concern on her account, that, in all human appearance, his grief would have been too much for his feeble spirits, had not Providence been pleased to recover her.

From the little that has been related concerning this great man, we may form some idea of his vast abilities and singular virtues. How great the force of his genius was in tracing, comprehending, and illustrating the abstrusest matters; how solid and how quick his judgment in the careful separation, determination, and disposition of them; how tenacious his memory in retaining and readily suggesting what was once committed to its trust; his elocution, how captivating, how powerful to explain, set off, establish, and enforce; they who have heard him speak, whether in public or private, can testify. How complete a master he was of the Latin tongue they well know who have conversed with him personally or read his writings. And, as he was thoroughly versed in the Dutch, wherever he spoke or preached, his apposite and becoming gesture, his justly modulated voice, aided by all the exactest propriety and harmony of language, crowned with the power and presence of the Holy Ghost, sweetly established the faith of God's people, and struck the unbelieving and the unholy with astonishment, shame and fear.

sioned by the death of that princess, and afterwards published; so was he also very happy in his talent at sacred poetry: having presented the world with many spirited, elegant, and devout hymns. Indeed, what excellency befitting the most accomplished divine was wanting in him? He was a most accurate philosopher; absolute master of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; a very considerable Orientalist; perfectly versed in the history of all nations, ancient and modern, sacred and profane; and, for his consummate knowledge of theology in all its branches, it would be superfluous to speak. How happy he was at asserting and vindicating the truths of the gospel every one knows. With the holy Scriptures he intimately conversed night and day: and so perfect was his familiarity with these that he could at once, and on any occasion, quote by heart any text of either testament in its original language: and solve extempore with the utmost skill and propriety, the critical and theological difficulties of any passage, how nice or intricate soever.

With respect to his temper, it was as sweet, humble, and benevolent as can be imagined. Hence arose both his aversion to all unreasonable novelties in doctrine, and at the same time his great moderation toward such persons as differed from him. He neither chose to be dictated to by man, nor yet to dictate: his favourite maxim being always this, In necessariis, unitas; in non-necessariis, libertas; in omnibus, prudentia & charitas. (k) He foreboded the sad declension in doctrine and experience which was coming on the Protestant churches of Holland; and blessed God that he was too old to live long enough to see it. And, though he could not help (such was his zeal for truth) taking notice of such of his reverend brethren as were desirous of striking out, and introducing into the Church, unscriptural novelties and forced constructions of Scripture; yet so far had he drunk into the mind of Christ, that he did this with all tenderness, deference, and caution: and if any were angry at the freedom of his remarks, he received their resentment in a spirit of meekness, and either took no notice of those who reproached him, or repaid their slanders by giving them those commendations which were due to them on account of their commendable qualities in other respects.

Nor can it be wondered at that a man so learned, holy, humble, and diligent, should, wherever he was, be attended with a vast concourse of pupils from every part of the reformed world; from Holland, Germany, France, Poland, Prussia, Switzerland,

(k) Agreeable to which was the motto upon his seals, Candidé:

Great Britain, and even from America (among which last were some native Indians too); and that his acquaintance should be sought for by the most eminent scholars and divines throughout Europe. To mention his learned works, which are so well known, would be superfluous. I cannot, however help observing that, in the year 1660, he published, 1. his Judæus Christianizans circa principia fidei & S. S. Trinitatem: and 2. A. D. 1665, at Wormeren, he published in Dutch, The Practice of Christianity, with spiritual representations, first, of what was laudable in the unregenerate, and then, of what was blameworthy in the regenerate: 3. At Leovarden, he set forth an Explanation of the Parable of God's Controversy with his Vineyard.—At Franeker, he published, besides several lesser treatises, 4. his Oeconomia Fæderum; afterwards translated into Dutch, by the Rev. Mr. Harlingius; as also, 5. his Exercitationes in Symbolum, which were also translated into Dutch, by Mr. Costerus, at Delft. At Utrecht, he set out, 6. Exercitationes in Orationem Dominicam: 7. his Egyptiaca, with several lesser pieces annexed: and 8. his first volume of Miscellanea Sacra: and at Leyden, he, 9. published his second volume of Miscellanea Sacra, complete; and likewise, 10. his Meletemata Leidensia.

We now draw near to the last scene of this great man's life: for as from his childhood his thin weak body had often struggled with many severe disorders, whence most people were apprehensive he would die young; so now, being far in years, he advanced apace to the house appointed for all living. However, he constantly retained, under all his sickness, his senses and intellects in full vigour; insomuch that, until within a little before his death, he could, with all readiness, read the Greek Testament of the smallest type by moon-light. But as he advanced farther in life, he suffered the most dreadful tortures from the gout and stone: and so far back as six years before he died, he was seized for the first time with a temporary dizziness, accompanied with a suspension of memory and absence of thought: and this, too, as he was sitting in the professor's chair, and delivering an academical lecture. By the help of an able physician, these evils were a little mitigated; but returning by degrees, they threatened future and more violent attacks. His last illness was ushered in by a reeling and universal languour. On the 18th of October, 1708, he was seized with a fever about one o'clock in the morning: which suddenly subsiding, a total feebleness and relaxation diffused itself over his body, and a torpor over his mind. The holy man considering these symptoms, told, with great serenity and composure, some friends who attended him, that "he knew they would issue in death." He slept much, and had very pleasing dreams: and departed in much peace and tranquillity, on the 22nd day of October, 1708, about noon; and was interred at Leyden, on the 29th of the same month.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE REVEREND MR. ALSOP.

VINCENT ALSOP, A. M. the admired author of Anti-Sozzo, was born in Northamptonshire, and received his academical education at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took the two first degrees in arts. On quitting the University, he removed to Okeham, in Rutlandshire; and became for a time assistant to the master of the free-school at that place.

His genius being very quick and brilliant, and his disposition remarkably cheerful, he was, before his conversion, what the world calls a lively, entertaining companion. After effectual grace had formed him anew, his wit and humour were consecrated to the service of the sanctuary; and his acquired parts, which were not inferior to his natural talents, were also devoted as a whole burnt-offering to the glory of God and the salvation of men. His politeness and affability, his engaging sweetness and vivacity of temper, never deserted him to the last. They were not extinguished, but refined and sanctified, and rendered still more lovely and respectable than before, by being born again of the Holy Ghost.

Mr. Benjamin King (an eminent puritan minister, at, or near, Okeham) seems to have been, in God's hand, the instrument of Mr. Alsop's conversion; who, soon after, married Mr. King's daughter, and removed to Wilbee, in his native county of Northampton, where he was fixed as parish minister, and where we hear little of him until 1662, when he was ejected from Wilbee by the act of uniformity. An act which (through the cruel and unprotestant manner of its first enforcement) gave the true Church of England so severe a bleeding that she has never entirely recovered herself from that time to this.

On being displaced from Wilbee, Mr. Alsop and his family settled at Wellingborough; where, and likewise at Okeham, he sometimes ventured to preach, notwithstanding the rigorous execution of the then persecuting laws. Justice compels me to own that Charles the second stood partly indebted for his restoration to the zeal and activity which the Protestant dissenters had exerted in his behalf. And he rewarded them well! Among other effects of civil and ecclesiastical tyranny in conjunction,

Mr. Alsop suffered six months' imprisonment for having dared to pray by a sick person.

In 1674, Dr. William Sherlock (afterwards dean of St. Paul's, London) published a treatise, entitled, "A Discourse concerning the Knowledge of Jesus Christ." The Dr. was an Arminian; and, as such, could not avoid Socianizing on many important articles: Socinus and Arminius being the two necessary supporters of a free-willer's coat of arms. Good Mr. Alsop would not suffer a performance so horrid and so shameless as that of Sherlock to walk abroad without chastisement. He therefore, in the year 1675, published a confutation of it; which he entitled Anti-Sozzo (i. e. a book in opposition to Socinus; the real unlatinized name of Socinus, who was an Italian, being Sozzo).

The editor (such an editor as he was) of Mr. Hervey's letters, observes, (l) very properly on this subject, that "In the reign of Charles the second, the Socinian tenets were gaining ground in England." And no wonder. For Arminianism is the head, and Socinianism the tail, of one and the self-same serpent: and where the head works itself in, it will soon draw the tail after it. In the above-mentioned critical days of the unmartyred Charles, the said editor goes on to inform us, "Mr. Alsop, one of the wittiest, as well as one of the best men in that age, wrote this book, called Anti-Sozzo. He [i. e. Mr. Alsop] and Dr. Sherlock had been pupils at college under the same tutor. And [uow], when he saw that Sherlock had no more reverence to the majesty of God, no more regard to the authority of Scripture, than to write as above, he was determined to attack him, and to plead for Christ and his truth here at the footstool, who pleads for us according to his truth at the throne.

"Nor was any man better qualified than himself either to give a check to a man of Sherlock's talents and imperious disposition; or to the growing petulancy of the then daily encroaching profaneness. On grave subjects he appeared as he was the truly reverend Mr. Alsop, and wrote with a becoming seriousness. But where wit might properly be shown he displayed his to great advantage, as may be seen in his Anti-Sozzo.

Controversy, when either frivolously or captiously founded seldom brings any advantage or honour to the cause of God. But the controversies which have from time to time taken place between the orthodox on one hand, and the Arminians and Socinians on the other, have been attended with the most important utility to the church and visible interests of Christ "If," as Mr. Alsop observes, "the Socinians oppose, every true Christian should defend, the gospel of Jesus Christ. For the dispute is not now about decency and order, about fringes and phylacteries, about the tything of mint, anise, and cummin; but about the influence of the righteousness of Christ's life, and the sacrifice of his death upon our acceptance with God; about the influence of the blessed Spirit in the glorious work of the new creation. Whether Christ be a proper priest or not? Whether, as a priest, he offered himself as a proper sacrifice to God, or not? Whether God and man are reconciled, and we redeemed from the curse of the law by the blood of Jesus, or not? Whether we are justified before the just and holy God by our own righteousness, or by the righteousness of a mediator? In which the concerns and all the eternal hopes of every Christian are wrapt up.

The excellent Mr. Hervey's character of this work, in a (m) letter which he wrote not quite seven weeks before his departure to eternal rest, deserves to be admitted here. "I could wish, methinks, at this critical juncture, that Alsop's Auto-Sozzo, which made its first appearance in 1675, was judiciously abridged; and in the neat Glasgow type, reprinted in a duodecimo volume. Though it is almost pity to abridge it (unless it were well executed), as the whole is so interesting. It is, I can assure you, a very smart book; and one of the best defences of the evangelical doctrines I ever saw, or ever expect to see; even if my life, which now draws very near its end, could be prolonged to the next century. In short, I think it an unanswerable performance; and divines of every denomination would do well to make themselves thoroughly masters of this spirited and entertaining writer; as they would then be able to defend the truth as it is in Jesus, against all kinds of opponents, how witty, keen, subtle, or malignant soever the attack might be. I would therefore beg you to recommend this book as a specific against Socinianism."

The learned, pious, and candid Dr. Edmund Calamy bears a testimony no less honourable to Mr. Alsop. "(n) Dr. Sherlock's affecting to treat the most sacred things of religion in a jocular way, gave no small offence to a number of persons famous for piety and prudence; and was the very inducement to Mr. Alsop to draw his pen against him. And though in his management of the controversy with him he treated serious matters with abundance of gravity; yet where that gentleman, viz. [Sherlock] was upon the merry pin, he [viz. Alsop] being an ingenious and facetious man, so wittily and sharply turned the edge upon him, that he beat him at his own weapon; so that that celebrated author never cared to answer him, nor was he ever fond of that way of writing afterward. Though Mr. Wood endeavoured to pour contempt on him, yet Dr. South, who was as famous for his wit and drollery as any one of the age, and as bitter an enemy of dissenters as any one whatever, acknowledges that Mr. Alsop obtained a complete victory.*

The merits of this book against Sherlock, induced Mr. Cawton who had the pastoral charge of a congregation in Westminster, to cast his eye on our author as a proper person to succeed him in the spiritual care of that people. Mr. Cawton dying soon after, Mr. Alsop left Northamptonshire to settle in London, where he was very assiduous both as a preacher and a publisher. "His living in the neighbourhood of the court," (n) say the compilers of a celebrated work, "exposed him to many inconveniences. However he had the good fortune to escape imprisonment and fines by an odd accident; which was the informers not knowing his Christian name; which for this reason he studiously concealed. His sufferings ended with the reign of Charles II., or at least in the beginning of the next reign; when Mr. Alsop's son engaging in (what were termed) treasonable practices, was freely pardoned by king James. After this, our divine went frequently to court; and is generally supposed to have been the person who drew the address to that prince for his general indulgence. After the revolution, Mr. Alsop gave very public testimonies of his affection for the government; yet upon all occasions he spoke very respectfully of king James, and retained a very high sense of his clemency in sparing his only son. The remainder of his life he spent in the exercise of his ministry, preaching once every Lord's day; had a Thursday lecture, and was besides one of the lecturers at Pinners' Hall. He lived to be a very old man, and preserved his spirits to the last."

Dr. Calamy, whom we have already quoted, gives the following instance of that intellectual vigour which Mr. Alsop was so happy as to retain even to old age. "I was," says the doctor, (o) "very strictly examined by him before my ordination; at which time it falling to my lot to make and defend a Latin thesis upon this question which he himself gave me, An Christus officio sacerdotali fungatur in caelis tantum? he (for argument sake as is the way of the schools) opposed me with all the vigour, smartness, and fluency, of a young man, though he was then considerably advanced in years. This was in the year 1694.

At length this great and good man, full of days and of renown, slept in Jesus, on the 8th of May, 1703, at his house in Westminster.

It may not be unacceptable to the religious reader, if we acquaint him that the place of worship, where Mr. Cawton, Mr. Alsop, and Dr. Calamy, were successive pastors, was very lately repaired and enlarged, by the pious munificence of an (p) elect lady, aided by the zeal and liberalities of other devout persons. So that the glorious gospel of the blessed God is again preached, with power and with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, on that spot and within those walls.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE RIGHT REV. DR. THOMAS WILSON, LATE BISHOP OF SODOR AND MAN.

FEW as the modern instances have been, of sanctity in lawn, even the present century has seen a prelate, whose purity and simplicity of manners would have done honour to the primitive ages.

He was born December 20, 1663, at Burton-Wirral, near Chester; and having received his school education in England, was sent, A. D. 1681, to perfect his studies in the University of Dublin; where he continued about eight years, and at the stated periods took his two first degrees in arts, with singular reputation, on account of his literary attainments, and the unblameable regularity of his life. When of age for holy orders, he was ordained deacon, A. D. 1686, by the then Bishop of Kildare; and priest, A. D. 1689.

Not long afterwards he quitted the University on being appointed travelling tutor to Lord Strange, eldest son to the Earl of Derby. But before the young nobleman had completed the tour of Europe, he died in Italy, at the end of three years from their first setting out; and good Mr. Wilson returned with a heavy heart to England. He had, however, acquitted himself so faithfully, and so well, in his care of his deceased pupil, that the Earl nominated him to the bishoprick of Man; and King Wm. approving the choice, our bishop was admitted to a Lambeth degree of Doctor in Laws, and received his episcopal consecration at the Savoy chapel, in London, on the 16th of January, 1697, from the hands of Sharp, archbishop of York; assisted by Moore, Bishop of Norwich, and Stratford, Bishop of Chester.

From his first acceptance of this see he determined to reside with his flock, that he might watch over them as one that must give a speedy and solemn account of his spiritual stewardship. Repairing, therefore, to the Isle of Man, he took possession of his bishoprick with the usual formalities (which, there, are very peculiar); and by the strictness of his life and conversation, soon began to shine as a light in a dark place.

The year after, viz., in October, 1698, he gave his hand to Mrs. Mary Patten, daughter of Thomas Patten, Esq., of Warrington, in Lancashire; who was directly descended from the elder brother of William Patten (commonly called, from the place of his nativity, William Wainfleet), the devout and munificent bishop of Winchester, who founded Magdalen College, in Oxford, and who died A. D. 1486. This great prelate was hardly more distinguished by his works of piety and liberality than by his invariable gratitude to his patron king Henry VI.; to whom he stedfastly adhered, and for whose sake he suffered many mortifying inconveniences when that prince was deposed and the house of York became the reigning family. Wainfleet's monument is still remaining in the cathedral of Winchester. He lies over-against Cardinal Beaufort; and his tomb, which does not appear to have received any injury during the civil wars, is one of the most elegant and majestic pieces of Gothic architecture in England.

If a bishop ever merited the title of Right Rev. Father, it was Dr. Wilson; who might truly be styled the father of his clergy, and of the whole island. His benevolent care to augment the revenues, to improve the knowledge, and to regulate the lives, of the parochial incumbents; his care to put the various schools in his diocese on such a footing as to render them seminaries of strict morals and of sound learning; the zeal he shewed, and the expenses he sustained, in causing the Bible, the Liturgy, and other useful books, to be translated into the Manks language, and distributed through the country; together with many instances of piety and liberality, not confined to his own immediate connections, but extending to England, and even far beyond the boundaries of Europe; demonstrated that, where the heart is fully bent on promoting the glory of God, great things may be done without the assistance of extraordinary opulence.

He rightly judged that to employ the young and healthy poor was rendering them a more substantial service than by giving them small pecuniary supplies. Hence he constantly found something for a considerable number of them to do. His method was to assemble all his workmen and domestic servants, in his chapel belonging to his palace, before they entered on the various business of the day, at six in the morning during the summer season; and, in the winter, at seven. On these early occasions he hardly ever failed being his own chaplain; making it a rule to read the whole service himself, and to dismiss his domestics and his labourers with his blessing, which he pronounced in the true spirit of prayer, with peculiar solemnity and affection. At meal times his hospitable table was open, not only to his friends and neighbours, but also to his (r) meanest workmen, and to such of the honest poor as he was not able to employ.

His concern for the whole people of his charge reached even to their secular interests. He studied physic, and distributed medicines with success. He imported the finest cattle, and procured the best grain of every kind for seed. And it appeared that, by the year 1744, he had expended more than ten thousand pounds in acts of charity and beneficence. Nor did he forget to take thought for the welfare of his successors in the bishoprick, of which when he first took possession, the episcopal demesne was rented at no more than thirty pounds a year; but, through his long and many improvements of the soil, he left it fairly worth four hundred pounds per annum.

His tempers, words, and works, all tended to promote the temporal and moral benefit of his diocese. His unaffected gravity of demeanour was softened and brightened by the most amiable and condescending affability. Every body had free access to him, and very few who had been once admitted to his conversation were so lost to virtue and the fine feelings as not to love and admire him.

(r) How different his conduct from that of a certain great churchman now living in Ireland. Not long ago, he was repairing his palace there, and the labourers were allowed a moderate quantity of small beer daily. But when his lordship paid them off they found themselves obliged to abate part of their wages in proportion to the quantity of small beer which they had respectively drunk. One of the men, more arch and less ceremonious than the rest, addressed him as follows: I believe your lordship is the first b——p that ever sodd small beer. I have a good mind to prosecute you for presuming to sell malt liquor without a license. This anecdote is authentic.

On one occasion, indeed, his lordship experienced for a time the iron hand of savage insult and oppression. I shall relate the circumstances first in the words of another; and then add some additional particulars exactly as they were related to me by a person of high rank, who is still alive, and who well remembers the whole transaction.

“The person who was governor of Man, from 1713 to 1723, having a difference with his lordship about some matters of right, which the bishop conscientiously denied to give up, that ruler stretched forth the hand of power and committed his diocesan to the damp and gloomy prison of Castle-Rushin, where he remained many weeks, until the affair was determined by king George I. and his privy-council in favour of the bishop.—This treatment of their patron and benefactor so affected the Manks that they came from all parts of the island to Castle-Town, at least once every week, to express their concern about him, and, with tears and lamentations, kneeling down before the castle walls, they had their pious pastor’s prayers and blessings from the grated loop-hole.”(s)

What was communicated to me by the noble person above mentioned is as follows. After the good bishop had been a considerable time in confinement, his hard usage was reported (seemingly by accident) to one of the two Turks whom King George I. then retained about his person. The honest Mahometan gave his majesty an account of the unmerited severities under which the pious prelate laboured; and the king ordered his lordship to repair to London and stand on his defence against the allegations of the governor. The bishop was soon acquitted on being heard, and the next court day attended the royal levee to thank his majesty for the equity that had been shewn him. His appearance in the drawing-room struck every body with veneration and surprize. He came in his usual manner, very simply habited, with his grey locks, a small black cap on the crown of his head, and leather thongs in his shoes, which last he constantly wore in lieu of buckles. A number of English bishops were in the circle, but the king passing by them all, walked up to the bishop of Man, and taking him by the hand, said, “My lord, I beg your prayers,” laying a particular emphasis on the word your.—Nor must the disinterestedness of the worthy Turk be forgot. A near relation of the bishop’s pressed the generous Mussulman to accept of 50 guineas, as a testimony of that person’s gratitude for the kind services he had rendered to the suffering prelate: but no arguments could induce the Mahometan to accept the offered acknowledgment. “I will have no return,” said he, “for it is reward enough to do good to a good man.”

Mr. Whiston accounts for bishop Wilson’s commitment to prison in a different manner from the authors of Biographia Britannica. Probably both he and they were equally in the right. The offence taken by the governor’s lady was, perhaps, the real, and the civil claims of the governor himself might be the pretended, cause of that brutal and unwarrantable persecution. Mr. Whiston’s (t) own words deserve to be transcribed.—“About this year it might be, that Dr. Wilson, the bishop of Man, was heard before the privy council, in a cause wherein he had been put in prison, by the earl of Derby’s governor of the Isle of Man, for executing, as tenderly as he could, the ecclesiastical law for defamation of an innocent woman by the governor’s wife. I heard the cause, and, with Dr. Nathaniel Marshall, did the bishop what good offices I could. He carried his cause, but was almost ruined by the suit, the charges were so great. The bishop had long been my acquaintance, and had, many years before, given me the first, or rather the only book then printed in the Manks language, being an Explication of our Church Catechism.—He has always appeared to me as one of the best bishops of our modern ages; and so much the better as he is clear of the snares and temptations of a lord of parliament. His great worth has been principally acknowledged in the plentiful provision made for his (u) son, who told me, very lately, that his father still preaches every Lord’s day at eighty-three years of age. May the Divine Providence” [adds honest Whiston] “send forth more such labourers as this bishop into his vineyard, which, perhaps, never stood in greater need of them than at this day.” What would Mr. Whiston have said had he lived to our day 1776?

Having seen the bishop honourably and happily extricated from the principal difficulty that ever befel him, we will attend him back to the Isle of Man, where, on his return from London, he was received with the most affectionate demonstrations of joy. The iniquitous hardships which he himself had experienced under colour of legal authority, made him thenceforward peculiarly attentive to the due execution of equitable law, for in that island the bishop has some share in the public administrations of justice. Britann.*

To all his other great and useful talents he added the cultivation of learning, and in particular, a deep acquaintance with history and antiquities. He was the person who furnished bishop Gibson with those (y) particulars concerning the Isle of Man, which that prelate inserted into the second edition of his Camden's Britannia.

The high esteem in which bishop Wilson was held may appear from the following instance. As queen Caroline, consort of his late majesty, was once in conversation with several of our English bishops, his lordship of Man came in to pay his respects. She no sooner glimpsed him at a distance than she said to the prelates who were present, "My lords, here comes a bishop whose errand is not to apply for a translation, he would not part with his spouse (his diocese) because she is poor."<sup>(z)</sup>

No pastor could be more intensely vigilant. Scarcely a Sunday passed without his preaching himself, either at his own cathedral, or in some of the parochial churches. Exclusive of his general visitations of his whole diocese (which visitations he constantly held four times in every year); he privately visited each parish church, occasionally, that he might judge how both clergy and people went on. With regard to the rights of conscience in others, he exercised the most candid and benevolent moderation. He admitted dissenters to the holy communion; and administered it to them, either sitting or standing, as they themselves approved. Such amiable and uniform moderation had so favourable an effect that, a few years after his settlement in the island, not a single dissenting congregation of any kind was to be found in it. Never was episcopal authority (which he knew how to maintain when occasion required) more happily blended with paternal mildness. Nor was the learned lord chancellor King at all beyond the mark in delaring that, under this bishop, the true form of the primitive church, in all its purity, might be found in the Isle of Man.

At length, this excellent prelate having served his generation by the will of God all the days of his appointed time, was translated to heaven, the beginning of March, 1755, in the ninety-third year of his age, and the fifty-eighth of his episcopate. He died of a cold, which he caught by taking an evening walk in his garden, after having read prayers in his domestic chapel.

SOME OUTLINES OF THE LIFE OF DR. ISAAC WATTS. (a)

THIS great and good man was born at Southampton, July 17, A. D. 1674, of eminently religious parents; who, being conscientious non-conformists, had suffered much by those persecuting measures which dishonoured the reign, and will for ever disgrace the memory, of Charles II.

It is unspeakably beneficial to a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. Whoever is entrusted with the education of a young person, and wishes him to excel in solid literature, should take particular care to initiate him betimes. By which just precaution, useful knowledge becomes insensibly familiar, and almost natural to the mind; before the poisonous habits of ease, idleness, and trifling (so hostile to every manly and valuable pursuit), have entirely and irradicably overspread the soil.

Dr. Watts enjoyed the full advantages of this early cultivation. He began to learn Latin at four years of age; and at a proper interval the Greek; under the care of Mr. Pinhorne, a clergyman of the Church of England, to whom we find a Latin ode addressed by the doctor in his lyric poems. His progress in the languages, though rapid, was solid. He ran fast; but (which was of far greater consequence) he mastered every inch of ground as he went.

The precise time when effectual grace laid hold of his heart, and spiritually con-

(y) "To have rendered this little history as complete as possible, Dr. Wilson addressed an elegant Latin epistle, dated May 1, 1710, to the archbishop of Drontheim in Norway, (episcopo Nidreseusi) to which see the bishoprick of Man had formerly been a suffragan; desiring to have copies of such abstracts, papers, &c. relating to the bishoprick of Man, as were in the archives of that metropolitan: but was answered, that the old register proofs of Drontheim had been burnt." Biogr. Britann.

(z) The queen seems to have taken this phrase from the usual saying of Fisher, bishop of Rochester, whom Henry VIII. beheaded: who, in the days of his prosperity, was more than once offered a translation to a richer see; but his answer constantly was, I will not forsake my little old wife, to whom I have been married so long, for a wealthier. And to his friend, bishop Fox, he wrote thus: If other bishops have larger revenues, I have fewer souls to take care of: so that, when I give up my account for both to God, which I must soon do, I shall not wish my condition to have been better than it is. Biogr. Brit. vol. iii. p. 1929.

(a) Dr. Gibbons, in his Memoirs of Dr. Watts, attacks the validity of two anecdotes, and the date of a piece of poetry, which was printed in Mr. Topkady's Outlines of Dr. Watts, with a disposition bordering on asperity; the littleness of criticism upon such trifles is certainly derogatory to the dignity of a biographer. They may be false, or imperfect, from mistake or misinformation. To whatever cause they may be ascribed, it cannot be deliberate misrepresentation; they do not, in the least, affect to take one flower from the wreath which encircles the doctor's brow, whose name is enrolled in the tablet of literary merit by the united suffrages of the public. The hints derived from them, were made use of as a palliative for that eminent character's defalcation respecting the Trinity, which the doctor published to the world.—These few incidental remarks, which are exhibited to the reader, and delineated with a bold and masterly hand, have received no alteration except the expunging of the objectionable parts.

verted him to God, I am not at present able to find. But that great event (abstracted from which all besides is of little value) appears to have taken place in an early period of his life. Some tender and beautiful fruits of the Holy Spirit's work upon his soul appear in several of the doctor's juvenile productions, as well as in those of a later date; and warrant us to believe that (to use the phraseology of a divine long since with God) the "old angel" had been a young saint.

About the sixteenth year of his age, and A. D. 1690, he was sent up to London, that the academy might finish an education so happily begun. His tutor, Mr. Thomas Rowe (to whom also the doctor inscribed an ode, extant in his lyric poems), has been heard to declare that he never had occasion to reprimand Mr. Watts so much as once during the whole time of his residence in the academy: on the contrary, that his behaviour was so correct and exemplary that he often proposed Mr. Watts to the other pupils as a pattern worthy of their imitation.

In the year 1693, when he was but nineteen, he was admitted as a communicant by the congregation of which his tutor had the pastoral charge.

Having completed his academical studies at London, he returned (about A. D. 1694), to his father's house; where he spent two years in the private spiritual exercises of reading, meditation, and prayer, by way of humble prelude to his entrance on the work of the ministry; a work to which he believed Providence had called him, and which he justly considered as the most sacred and momentous of all human undertakings.

Hardly any thing can be of more important consequence to individuals, to families, and to society at large, than the wise and virtuous education of young people. Instruction, it is true, cannot impart the saving grace of God: but it is no less true that God often blesses human cultivation to very valuable purposes; and sometimes even deigns to make the religious efforts of Christian tutors and ministers, the channels, or means, through which he imparts his saving grace. The husbandman's duty is to plough and dress and sow his lands: and though, after all his efforts, their success depends on the blessing of heaven; and notwithstanding the crop may not constantly, and in every respect, correspond to the utmost of his wishes and his labours; yet some valuable fruits seldom fail to crown his industry, even if the seasons prove inclement, and the soil untoward. Sir John Hartopp, baronet, a gentleman of distinguished piety and erudition, was sensible of the importance of putting his son under the conduct of a wise, a learned, a polite, and a truly Christian tutor. Swayed by this view, it was no wonder that he should cast his eye on Mr. Watts, as one of the fittest persons in the world to discharge so arduous a trust. Witsius, in Holland; Rollin, in France; and Watts, in England; were, perhaps, of all the elegant scholars who then flourished, endued with the happiest powers to form young people to science and virtue, and to insinuate the delicacies of learning, without its thorns, into tender and unexperienced minds. Most young persons have a certain key, on which, if you touch discreetly, you may manage them as you please, without the usual methods of harsh severity and disingenuous punishments. To discern that key, but without letting your pupil perceive you discern it, and to touch it with judgment, are the great test of a sagacious tutor. Plutarch, in his Life of Alexander the Great, observes, concerning that prince, that he was, from a child, of an ardent and impetuous temper, incapable of being forced to any thing, but susceptible of persuasion, and easily won over by gentleness and reasoning. His father, king Philip, had sufficient penetration to perceive the key of Alexander's mind, and wisdom to provide him a suitable preceptor in Aristotle: who, by a judicious address to the finer passions of his royal charge, subdued the future conqueror of the world; and the prince being made to fall in love with knowledge, became a considerable proficient in the belles lettres, because he apprehended himself to be a perfect volunteer. I should, as a well-wisher to mankind, deeply lament the want of such tutors as Aristotle, Witsius, Rollin, and Watts; if Providence, in the present day, had not given us a Ryland. (b)

Pursuant to his friend's invitation, Mr. Watts accepted the care of young Mr. (afterwards Sir John) Hartopp, with whom he resided four years, in the family-house at Stoke-Newington. And it appears, from the dedication prefixed to our author's admirable Treatise on Logic, that the young gentleman's advancements in literature were such as might be expected from the happy pupil of so accomplished a superintendent.

While he was thus discharging the duties of a pleased and pleasing preceptor, with that meekness of wisdom, (c) which gave charms to science; and with that sweetness of the lips which increaseth learning; (d) he sedulously attended no less to his own literary improvements than to those of his promising disciple. It is with diligent tutors, as with faithful and laborious ministers: to both of whom that encouraging word is frequently made good, He that watereth, shall be watered himself (e). But, amidst all his other profound and important attentions, he never lost sight of that grand mark to which he made every human attainment subserve; viz., the edification of his own heart in faith and holiness. Hence he devoted much of his time to God: and carefully studied the inspired volume, in its original languages, and with the assistance of the best ancient and modern expositors.

He preached his first sermon on his birth-day, viz. July 17, 1698, when he completed his four and twentieth year: and was shortly after chosen assistant preacher to that independent congregation of which Dr. Isaac Chauncey was the pastor. His pulpit exertions, supposed to be more zealous and vehement than his constitution could well sustain, were soon followed by a severe and menacing illness of five months' duration. But the ambassador of Christ had not yet finished his appointed course, nor fulfilled the work which was given him to do. He recovered, and, determined, through grace, to spend and be spent for God, he plied his ministerial labours with as great intenseness as before.

On the decease of Dr. Chauncey, he was ordained (March 18, 1702, N. S.) to the patorship of that church; presently after which event, another long confinement by sickness threatened the extinction of his valuable life. His recovery was so gradual that it was deemed necessary to lessen his public fatigues, by appointing Mr. Samuel Price to be his assistant, in the summer of 1703.

Men of the finest talents have frequently the infirmest bodies. Mr. Watts was of that number. His health, for some years after the above mentioned period continued extremely precarious. Yet he appears to have spared himself as little as possible; and to have intermitted his private studies and public ministrations no more than necessity obliged.

To increase, and to perpetuate, as far as he was able, the life and power of godliness among the younger part of his spiritual charge, he formed them into a society for the excellent purposes of prayer, and conference on religious subjects. When his health would permit, he met them himself: and to his instructive and pious oversight of these young people, we owe the occasion and the rudiments of his treatise, entitled, A Guide to Prayer.

In September, 1712, when he had little more than entered his 38th year, a violent fever (occasioned, probably, by too devoted application to study) almost quite broke him down. From the effects of this visitation he never totally recovered. His nerves continued more or less in a shattered state, from that time forward until his spirit returned to

God. A sad proof, that the famous Sir Francis Walsingham's maxim (viz. knowledge cannot be bought too dear) is to be adopted with very considerable limitation.

Notwithstanding those severe constitutional shocks, this faithful servant of God had not, at the time last specified, measured much more than half the race he was to run: for his life was extended to an additional period of six and thirty years. But he could truly say, with the apostle before him, We, who are in this tabernacle, do groan, being burdened. Yet, though he could not help feeling his bodily infirmities, he was preserved by grace from murmuring under them. He does not appear to have entertained one hard thought of God; but lay, at the divine footstool, passive as blank paper to the hand of the writer, or as softened wax to the impressing seal.

In the year 1728, the University of Edinburgh, and also that of Aberdeen, did honour to themselves by conferring on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity, not purchased for five pounds, nor even solicited; but transmitted to him entirely without his knowledge. Learned seminaries would retrieve the departing respectability of their diplomas, were they only presented to (I will not say such men as Dr. Watts, for few such men are in any age to be found: but to) persons of piety, orthodoxy, erudition, and virtue.

The good doctor, though frequently, and for long seasons together, restrained by illness from the public exercises of his ministry, strictly so called, was a hard student, almost to the very last. At length, exhausted by a progressive, but deep decay, his mortal body was forsaken by its deathless inhabitant, Nov. 25, 1748: after an union of seventy-four years, four months, and eight days.—His funeral sermon (which has supplied me with the foregoing facts and dates) was preached by the learned Dr. David Jennings, on the latter clause of Hebrews xi. 4. And a concise, but not very animated oration was spoken over his grave, at the time of his interment, by Dr. Samuel Chandler.

I have been told, by the late excellent Mr. Whitefield (between whom and Dr. Watts a long and very tender friendship subsisted,) that, for several years together, the doctor was so grievously and frequently afflicted with insomnia, or continual wakefulness; and his health, strength, and spirits were thereby reduced to so low an ebb; that he might, on the whole, rather be said to gasp than to live. Very often, he could obtain no sleep, for two or three nights successively, but what was procured by art; i. e. by dint of medicinal preparations. Sometimes, even opiates failed to win the courted repose: and our modern Job might sing, like him of Chaldea, Wearisome nights are appointed unto me. When I lay down, I say, when shall I rise, and the night be gone? I am full of tossings to and fro, unto the dawning of the day. Job. vii. 3, 4.—

“Tired nature’s sweet restorer, balmy sleep,”
Grata laborata referens obliviam vitam

is a visitant, which, like every other blessing, is the gift of God, and comes not but at his command. He giveth to his beloved sleep: Psal. cxxvii. 2. And, when he gives it not, faith will acknowledge the finger of Jehovah’s providence, and say, Thou holdest mine eyes waking. Psal. lxvii. 4.

But the divine will operates through the medium of second causes. Too intense and unintermitted exertions of mind, in the pursuit of knowledge, and in the communication of it to others by writing, were the direct occasions of unehing Dr. Watts’s intellectual powers, and of shattering a constitution naturally firm.

“With curious art the brain, too finely wrought,
Preys on itself and is destroyed by thought.
Constant attention wears the active mind,
Blots out its powers, and leaves the blank behind.”

If grandeur, elegance, and poignancy, of genius;—if a strong, extensive, and highly cultivated understanding;—in a word, if the richest native and acquired talents of the head, added to the most amiable virtues of the heart;—could have secured to a human being the felicity of calm and constant self-possession, Dr. Watts had never written his unhappy Dissertations on the Trinity.

Gladly would I throw, if possible, an everlasting veil over this valuable person’s occasional deviations from the simplicity of the gospel, relative to the personality and divinity of the Son and Spirit of God. But justice compels me to acknowledge that he did not always preserve an uniform consistency with himself, nor with the Scriptures of truth, so far as concerns that grand and fundamental article of the Christian faith.

“How narrow limits are to wisdom giv’n!
Earth she surveys, and thence would measure heav’n.
Through mists obscure, now wings her tedious way,
Now wanders, dazzl’d with too bright a day.
And, from the summit of a pathless coast,
Sees infinite—and in that sight is lost.”

The inclusiveness (to call it by the tenderest name we can) of his too wanton tamperings with the doctrine of the Trinity, has been largely and irrefragably demonstrated by more hands than one. Among others, by the learned Dr. Abraham Taylor, in a masterly tract, entitled, The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity vindicated, in opposition to Mr. Watts’s Scheme of one divine Person and two divine Powers. The great Mr. John Hurrión, one of the most evangelical men, and ablest reasoners, that have added lustre to the present century, has likewise totally demolished Dr. Watts’s fanciful and dangerous surmises, in his [i. e. in Mr. Hurrión’s] set of admirable discourses, entitled, The Scripture Doctrine of the proper Divinity, real Personality, &c. of the Holy Spirit, stated and defended. Both the above performances were published many years before the Doctor’s decease; and consequently, while he was able to answer for himself. Notwithstanding this declension, I am happy in believing that the grace and faithfulness of the Holy Ghost did not permit our author to die under the delusions of so horrible and pernicious a heresy.

Among many instances which redound exceedingly to the honour of the Doctor’s heart, must be numbered the cordial and uninterrupted friendship which obtained between him and his copartner in the ministry, the Rev. Mr. Samuel Price. Aulus Gellius used to wonder how two such elegant and magnanimous philosophers, as Plato and Xenophon, could ever descend to the meanness of depreciating and envying each other’s talents and success. What would he have said, had he been witness to the low competitions, the dirty jealousies, the narrow self-seekings, and the envious treachery, visible in the spirit and conduct of some who pass for Christian ministers? No such roots of bitterness had any place in the benevolent and disinterested bosom of Dr. Watts. Like the master he served, he took pleasure in the excellencies, the usefulness, and the prosperity of others. It was by his own request that Mr. Price was associated with him as co-pastor, in the year 1713. And in his last will, he styled that gentleman his “faithful friend and companion in the labours of the ministry;” and bequeathed him a legacy, as a “small testimony of his great affection for him, on account of his services of love, during the many harmonious years of their fellowship in the work of the gospel.”

Dr. Jennings has preserved a few of Dr. Watts’s dying sayings. It is to be wished that he had recorded more of them. “I bless God,” said the ripening saint, “I can lay down with comfort at night, unsolicitous whether I wake in this world or another!” His faith in the promises was lively and unshaken: “I believe them enough to venture an eternity on them!” Once, to a religious friend, he expressed himself thus: “I remember an aged minister used to say that the most learned and knowing Christians, when they come to die, have only the same plain promises for their support as the common and unlearned. And so,” continued the Doctor, “I find it. It is the plain promises of the gospel that are my support; and I bless God they are plain promises, which do not require much labour and pains to understand them: for I can do nothing now, but look into my Bible, for some promise to support me, and live upon that." On feeling any temptations to complain, he would remark, "The business of a Christian is to bear the will of God, as well as to do it. If I were in health, I could only be doing that; and that I may do now. The best thing in obedience is a regard to the will of God; and the way to that is to get our inclinations and aversions as much mortified as we can."

The following little incident I lately had from a person of quality, (z) who has long shone (and much longer may she continue to shine) the principal ornament of the great and of the religious world. The anecdote, though not important in itself, is worthy of being preserved from oblivion, as a small monument of the refined politeness which distinguished the mind and manners of another elegant and devout female long since with God. The first-mentioned of these ladies being on a visit to Dr. Watts, at Stoke-Newington, the doctor accosted her thus: "Madam, your ladyship is come to see me on a very remarkable day." Why is this day so remarkable? answered the countess. "This very day thirty years," replied the doctor, "I came hither to the house of my good friend Sir Thomas Abney, intending to spend but one single week under this friendly roof; and I have extended my visit to the length of exactly thirty years." Lady Abney, who was present, immediately said to the doctor, "Sir, what you term a long thirty years' visit, I consider as the shortest visit my family ever received."

SOME (a) ACCOUNT OF MRS. ELIZABETH ROWE.

This elegant and devout female was the daughter of Mr. Walter Singer, a dissenting minister of good family, and possessed a competent estate near Frome, in Somersetshire; who being imprisoned at Ilchester, for non-conformity in the reign of Chas. II., was there visited by Mrs. Elizabeth Portnel, of that town, from principles of mere benevolence and compassion. The acquaintance thus commenced, terminated however in marriage; and the lady, a summary of whose memoirs we are now going to give, was the first fruit of the alliance; being born September 11, 1674, at Ilchester, in which town her father continued to reside until the death of his wife induced him to return into the neighbourhood of Frome.

On his re-settlement there, his piety, prudence, integrity, and good sense, recommended him to the friendship of Lord Weymouth; and to that of Dr. Ken, the deprived bishop of Bath and Wells, who (after the Revolution) lived with that nobleman at Long Leat. Though the bishop was in principle a very high churchman; and Mr. Singer, a radical dissenter; still such were the candour and moderation of these excellent men, that they cordially esteemed and constantly visited each other. Dr. Ken would sometimes ride to see his worthy and valued non-conforming neighbour, so frequently as once a week.

Mr. Singer's chief happiness, however, lay within the pale of his own family. Beside our authoress, he had two daughters; one of whom died in her childhood, and the other survived to her twentieth year. The latter seemed to be the very counterpart of her elder sister, in devotion, virtue, accomplishments, and amiableness of temper. She had the same invincible thirst for knowledge; and consequently, the same extreme passion for books. The lovely sisters frequently prolonged their studies in concert until midnight.

But it was Miss Elizabeth whom Providence reserved to be an ornament, not only to her family and to her sex, but to the human species. Her uncommon talents and exalted piety, which dawned even in her infant years, gave her religious father a satisfaction not to be expressed. He himself had received his first effectual convictions in about the tenth year of his age; from which time he was remarkable for having never neglected prayer. God was pleased to visit our poetess with strong impressions of grace at a still less advanced period. My infant hands (says she in her manual, entitled "Devout Exercises of the Heart") were early lifted up to Thee; and I soon learned to know and acknowledge the God of my fathers. Her relative affections were so lively and delicate that we find them mingling even with her most solemn addresses to the Deity. In particular, her love and veneration for her father resembled the vestal fires, which were strong, bright, and in-extinguishable. As a specimen of her fine feelings, in this respect, we may recur to the following passage; Thou art my God, and the God of my religious ancestors; the God of my mother, the God of my pious father. Dying and breathing out his soul, he gave me to thy care. He in the cause of Christ, on Friday June 17, 1791. Unequivocally may it be said that her character has never been surpassed or equalled in any age, or in any nation. Ed. (g) Biogr. Brit. vol. v. p. 3523.

put me into thy gracious arms, and delivered me up to thy protection. He told me thou wouldst never leave me nor forsake me. He triumphed in thy long experienced faithfulness and truth; and gave his testimony for thee with his latest breath.

At twelve years of age she began to write poetry; and it is no wonder the same elegant turn of mind was connected with a fondness for music and painting; in the former of which she particularly delighted, and became a very able proficient. But that walk in music which she chiefly cultivated was of the most serious and solemn kind; such as best comported with the grandeur of her sentiments, and the sublimity of her devotion. As to painting, she was more than an admirer of that beautiful art. She took up the pencil when she had hardly sufficient strength and steadiness of hand to guide it; and almost in her infancy would press out the juices of herbs, to serve her in lieu of colours. Her father perceiving her propensity to this accomplishment, provided a master to instruct her in it; and it never failed to be her occasional amusement to the end of her life.

It was her excellence in poetry which first introduced her to the attention of the noble family at Long Leat. She had written a small copy of verses, with which they were so highly charmed that they conceived a strong curiosity to see the authoress; and in this visit there commenced a friendship which subsisted ever after. She was not then twenty.

Her paraphrase of the 38th chapter of Job was written at the request of Bishop Ken, and added to the reputation she had already acquired. She had no less a tutor for the French and Italian languages, than the Hon. Mr. Thynne, son to Lord Weymouth, who voluntarily took that office upon himself; and had the pleasure to see his fair scholar improve so fast under his lessons that in a few months she was able to read TASSO with great facility. She seems to have been entirely unacquainted with the learned languages. Her father, indeed, took the greatest care of her education; but he confined it to the acquisition of those accomplishments only which he considered as falling most properly within the sphere of female improvement.

In the year 1696, which was the twenty-second of her age, a collection of her poems on various occasions was published at the request of two distinguished friends.

Her shining merit, and the charms of her person and conversation, had procured her a great many admirers. Among others the celebrated Mr. Matthew Prior is said to have been a candidate for her heart; and from several tender passages relative to this lady in his printed poems, it plainly enough appears that she had the deepest interest in his affections. But Mr. Thomas Rowe was the person destined by heaven to make happy, and to be made happy by, the most amiable female then existing.

This gentleman had a fine genius, adorned with an uncommon share of profound and polite learning. His talent in poetry, though not invariably equal to his wife's, was yet very considerable. He was the son of Mr. Benoni Rowe, a dissenting minister, eminent as a preacher and a scholar; and descended of the same family from which Mr. Nicholas Rowe, the dramatic poet, derived his pedigree: viz. the Rowes of Lamberton, in Devonshire. Our Mr. Thos. Rowe was born at London, April 25, 1687; and was married to Miss Singer, in 1710. On which occasion, a friend of Mr. Rowe wrote the beautiful Latin epigram inserted (h) below.

Mrs. Rowe's exalted merit and captivating qualities could not fail to inspire the most pure and lasting passion; and Mr. Rowe knew how to value that treasure of piety, elegance, and wit, which Divine Providence had given him in such a partner. He made it his business to repay the felicity with which she crowned his life. A considerable time after marriage, he addressed to her, under the name of Delia, that delicate and beautiful ode, of which the following lines are part:

— — — — — Long may thy inspiring page,
And great example, bless the rising age!
Long in thy charming prison may'st thou stay;
Late, very late, ascend the well-known way,
And add new glories to the realms of day!

At least, Heav'n will not sure this pray'r deny;
Short be my life's uncertain date, [fate];
And earlier far than thine, the destined hour of When'er it comes, may'st thou be by;
Banish desponding nature's gloom;
And make me hope a gentle doom;
And fix me all on joys to come!

With swimming eyes I'll gaze upon thy charms,
And clasp thee, dying, in my fainting arms;
Then, gently leaning on thy breast,
Sink in soft slumbers to eternal rest.
The ghastly form shall have a pleasing air,
And all things smile, while heav'n and thou art there.

Thus translated by a young gentleman:
"No more, proud Gallia, bid the world reverse
Thy learned pair, Le Fevre and Dacier.
Britain may boast this happy day unites
Two nobler minds in Hymen's sacred rites:
What these have sung, while all th' inspiring Nine
Exalt the beauties of the verse divine,
Those (humble critics of th' immortal strain)
Shall bound their fame to comment and explain."

As Mr. Rowe had not naturally a strong constitution, his intense application to study (which his marriage connection did not in the least abate) is supposed to have sown the seeds of that ill health which alloyed the happiness of his connubial state, and threw him into a decline, about the latter end of the year 1714. Having little more than finished his twenty-eighth year, his consumption put a period to his life on the 13th of May, 1715. He had formed a design to compile the lives of all the illustrious persons of antiquity omitted by Plutarch. He was enabled to accomplish part of his intent (i): for which no man, perhaps, was better qualified both by genius, judgment, and erudition. History was his favourite pursuit; and he had studied that part of it which relates to Jewish antiquities, under the tuition of the great Witsius, at Leyden.

During her husband's long illness, Mrs. Rowe hardly ever quitted his chamber; and alleviated, by all the tender offices of sympathy and assiduity, the pains she was unable to remove. She partook his sleepless nights; nor could be persuaded to relinquish her kind but melancholy station at his bed-side. When death had performed its commission, she was with difficulty torn from his breathless clay; and devoted her future years to his memory, by a resolution (which she inviolably kept) of perpetual widowhood. He died at Hampstead, near London, where he had resided some time for the benefit of the air; and was buried in a vault belonging to his family, in Bunhill-fields. On his tomb were only marked his name, with the dates of his birth and decease. But an inscription of greater pomp was rendered unnecessary, by Mrs. Rowe's fine Elegy on his death; in which she relates the thoughts that follow, as a part of his dying conversation:

"How much I love, thy bleeding heart can tell,
Which does like mine the pangs of parting feel.
But haste to meet me on those happy plains
Where mighty love in endless triumph reigns.
He ceas'd. Then gently yielded up his breath,
And fell a blooming sacrifice to death."

She survived him almost 22 years, and to the last retained without abatement that extreme affection and veneration for him which had constantly animated her breast during life. A very little time before her own departure to heaven, she was observed to shed tears at but hearing the mention of his name.

Soon after the commencement of her widowhood she quitted London (where, in complaisance to Mr. Rowe's inclination, she usually spent the winter season); and indulged her unconquerable love of solitude by retiring to Frome, where the greater part of her estate lay. It was in this retreat that she composed the most celebrated of her works, entitled, Friendship in Death; with the Letters moral and entertaining. How fond she was of obscurity appears from that beautiful passage, among many others, where she thus sings in prose:

"Such a retreat as disengages the mind from those interests and passions which mankind generally pursue appears to me the most certain way to happiness. Quietly to withdraw from the crowd, and leave the gay and ambitious to divide the honours and pleasures of the world, without being a rival or competitor in any of them, must leave a person in unenvied repose.—Ye vain grandees of the earth, ye perishing riches, and fantastic pleasures, what are your proudest boasts? Can you yield undecaying delights, joys becoming the dignity of reason, and the capacities of an immortal mind? Ask the happy spirits above at what price they value their enjoyments. Ask them, if the whole creation should purchase one moment's interval of their bliss. No: one beam of celestial light obscures the glory, and casts a reproach on all the beauty, this world can boast."

In 1736, some of her acquaintances who had seen the history of Joseph in manuscript, prevailed on her, though with difficulty, to let it be made public. She had written it in the early part of life; and had carried it on no farther than to Joseph's marriage. Through the importunity of friends (especially of the Countess of Hertford, to whom Mrs. Rowe could scarcely refuse any thing), she added two books more: the composing of which is said to have been the labour but of three or four days. This additional part, which was her last work, was published a few weeks before her death.

That crowning event befel her, according to her wish, in her beloved retirement. She was favoured with uncommon strength of constitution; and had passed a more than short life with scarce any indisposition severe enough to confine her to her bed. But about six months before her decease, she was attacked by a visibly dangerous complaint; and lamented to an intimate friend that, on the near approach of death, she did not find herself so serene as she could wish. Her doubts and fears, though sharp, were short. The Holy Spirit, after a little season, filled her with gladness unspeakable, by witnessing to her soul the interest which God's free grace had given her in the atonement and mediation of him

(i) He finished nine of those omitted lives; of which eight were published, after his decease, by the late Dr. Samuel Chandler. The ninth, (viz. that of who died for sinners. Under these assurances, she experienced such repose and triumph that she acknowledged with tears of joy, that she had never felt any consolations equal to these. She repeated on this happy occasion, Mr. Pope's verses, entitled, "The dying Christian to his Soul," with such exalted transport as evidenced that she really felt all the holy ecstasies which breathe in that (k) exquisite piece of sacred poetry.

After this threatening illness, Mrs. Rowe recovered her usual good state of health; to which, it is extremely probable, the happy state of her soul, and her blessed foretastes of eternal life, might chiefly contribute. Communion with God, and the assurance of his favour, are frequently known to promote health of body no less than of mind. The fellowship of the Holy Ghost is the grand cordial of human life; and sometimes operates as a sovereign restorative, even to the mortal house of clay.

On the day in which Mrs. Rowe was seized with that distemper which, in a few hours, carried her off, she seemed to those about her to be in perfect vigour. About eight in the evening, she conversed with her usual sprightliness, and not without laughter. Afterwards, she retired to her chamber. About ten, her maid-servant hearing some noise in her mistress's apartment, ran immediately in, and found her fallen on the floor speechless, and in the convulsions of death. A physician and a surgeon were instantly sent for; but all applications proved fruitless. She expired a few minutes before two o'clock, on Sunday morning, February 20, 1736-7. Her disease was judged to be an apoplexy. A devout book was found lying open just by her; it contained some meditations on spiritual subjects, but was afterwards lost; nor could the title be exactly remembered by those who were with her at the time of her death. She often wished and prayed for a sudden dissolution; and God was pleased to grant her the request of her heart. Mr. Grove (who by his mother's side was related to Mrs. Rowe) expressed himself thus in a letter to a friend, occasioned by the decease of this extraordinary lady: "Though her death," says he, "be universally lamented, yet the manner of it is rather to be esteemed a part of her happiness. One moment to enjoy this life; the next, or after a pause we are not sensible of, to find ourselves got beyond, not only the fears of death, but death itself; and in possession of everlasting life, and health, and pleasure: this moment to be devoutly addressing ourselves to God, or employed in delightful meditations on his perfections; the next, in his presence, and surrounded with scenes of bliss, perfectly new, and unspeakably joyous, is a way of departing out of life to be desired, not dreaded, by ourselves, and felicitated, not condoled, by our surviving friends. When all things are in a readiness for our removal out of the world, it is a privilege to be spared the sad ceremony of parting, and all the pains and struggles of feeble nature." Dost thou ask, O converted reader, Which is best? To be snatched to heaven in a moment or two, or to be thrown on a lingering bed, and so (if the Lord please) be able to bear some testimony to his love, power, and faithfulness? I answer: Leave the whole matter to him. If possible, do not entertain a wish either one way or the other. Be this your petition:

"Only receive my soul to thee;
The manner and the time be thine."

She was buried, by her own desire, under the same stone with her father, in the Meeting-house, at Frome; and her funeral sermon was preached by Mr. Bowden, to whom she left a particular charge that he should not say one word about her in the whole of his discourse.

In her cabinet were found letters to the Countess of Hertford, the Earl of Orrery, Dr. Watts, and some others of her most intimate and most valued friends. These farewell epistles she ordered to be immediately after her death transmitted to the persons they were directed to. They have since been published. An extract from that to her bosom confidant, the Countess of Hertford (afterwards Duchess of Somerset), may stand for a sample of the rest. "This is the last letter you will ever receive from me; the last assurance I shall give you on earth of a sincere and steadfast friendship. But when we meet again, I hope it will be in the heights of immortal love and ecstasy. Mine, perhaps, may be the first glad spirit to congratulate your safe arrival on the happy shore. What transporting reflections shall we make on the advantages of which we shall find ourselves eternally possessed! To him that loved and washed us in his blood, we shall ascribe immortal glory, dominion and praise, for ever. This is all my salvation, and all my hope. That name, in whom the Gentiles trust, is now my glorious, my unfailling confidence. In his merits alone I expect to stand justified before infinite purity and justice. How poor were my hopes, if I depended on those works which my own vanity or the partiality of men have called good! The best actions of my life would be found defective, if brought to the test of that unblemished holiness, in whose sight the heavens are not clean. Where were my hopes but for a Redeemer's merits and atonement! How desperate, how undone my condition! With the utmost advantages I can boast, I should start back, and tremble at the thoughts of appearing before the unblemished majesty. O Jesus, what harmony dwells in thy name! Celestial joy and immortal life is in the sound. Let angels set thee to their golden harps. Let the ransomed nations for ever magnify thee. Adieu, my most dear friend, until we meet in the paradise of God."

All truly great minds entertain the most elevated ideas of friendship; and, indeed, without some greatness of soul, no man is capable of the sublime virtues and the refined attachments comprised in that lovely term. Such a spirit as ennobled and warmed the breast of Mrs. Rowe was susceptible of that generous and exalted flame. Witness the following paragraph, in her farewell letter to Mr. Theobald: "The converse I have had with you has been short; but I hope the friendship begun by it will be transmitted to the regions of perfect amity and bliss. It would not be worth while to cherish the impressions of a virtuous friendship if the generous engagement was to be dissolved with this mortal life. Tell Mrs. Theobald I hope to meet her in the shining realms of love and unmingled bliss."

As to her person, Mrs. Rowe was not what is called a regular beauty; yet she possessed a large measure of the charms of her sex. She was of a moderate stature. Her hair of a fine auburn colour. Her eyes of a darkish grey, inclining to blue, and full of fire. Her complexion was very fair, and a lovely blush glowed in her cheeks. She spoke gracefully; her voice was harmoniously sweet, and perfectly suited to that gentle language which always flowed from her lips. The softness and benevolence of her aspect, together with the strength of understanding which appeared in her countenance, exceed the powers of description.

Her acquaintance with the great, added to her own natural delicacy and good sense, had insensibly formed her to all the ease and accomplishments of the most engaging politeness. Without any degree of stiffness or affectation, she practised, in a distant solitude, all the address and fine behaviour of a court.

The labours of the toilet consumed very little of her time. She despised the arts of dress and ornament; yet without falling into the opposite extreme of improper negligence.

She led a recluse life, but without austerity; and was as exemplary for sweetness of temper, affability, meekness, and every social virtue, as for the exact sanctity of her manners.

God had given her such absolute command over her passions that it has been questioned whether she was ever angry, so much as once in her whole life.

Though she possessed an uncommon share of wit, no one had reason to fear its edge, or to wish it had been less. For, together with the most manly genius, she possessed all that gentleness which completes the charms of the tender sex. Next to profane and lewd writings, she expressed the strongest aversion to satire, as being usually replete with uncandid invective.—No strokes of this kind can be found in her works; and her conversation was not less innocent of every appearance of ill-nature than her writings. Scandal and detraction were considered by her as extreme inhumanity, which no embellishments of wit and liveliness could render tolerable.

She had few equals in her admirable turn for conversation. Her wit was inexhaustible; and she expressed her thoughts in the most beautiful and flowing style. Though she had, even from her youth, been accustomed to receive the deserved tributes of compliment and praise from such judges of worth as might have made some degree of vanity almost pardonable in a lady and an author, yet she retained all the humility of the meanest and most obscure person.

She was perfectly untainted with the love of pleasure; and was even ignorant of every polite and fashionable game. She had no relish for novels and romances, and entirely abstained from the entertainments of the theatre. The grandeur of her mind set her above every species of luxury. She was always pleased with whatever she found on her table; and neither the nature of her food, nor the manner of dressing it, gave her any uneasiness. She despised visits of ceremony, and had a contempt of riches that has been rarely equalled. She wrote no dedication to great persons, nor is the name of any minister of state to be met with in her productions. She solicited no favours, and never saw a court.

Filial piety was a remarkable part of her character. She loved the best of fathers as she ought; and has been heard to say that she would rather die than displease him. In a memorandum relating to his last sickness and death, are these words: "My father often felt his pulse, and complained that it was still regular. He smiled at every symptom of approaching death; and would be often crying out, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly! Come, ye holy angels, who rejoice at the conversion of a sinner: come, and conduct my soul to the skies, ye propitious spirits! And then would add, But thy time, Lord, not mine, is best. When shall I awake, and be satisfied with thy likeness?" The anguish she felt at seeing him in so much pain gave her, during the time of his illness, a kind of habitual convulsion: a disorder, from which she was wholly free in every other part of her life. Her father died, April 18, 1719, and was indulged with some delightful prelibations of heaven before he ascended thither.

She was a gentle and kind mistress to her dependants; and a warm and generous friend. It was observed, that none of her domestics ever quitted her service, unless they married off. Nor was there a friend of her's, though in ever so high a station, who did not experience her beneficent disposition, in presents of books, pictures, or something elegant and valuable, as marks of her esteem.

Her charities to the poor were literally amazing. The first time she accepted of a gratification from a bookseller for any of her works, she bestowed the whole sum on a family in distress. She solemnly consecrated half of her yearly income to charitable uses; and employed her own hands in providing clothes for the necessitous. She extended her liberalities, not to the poor only, but also to the farther relief of those who were raised above absolute want; and would frequently observe that one of the greatest temporal benefits we can render to our fellow-creatures is to free them from the cares and anxieties which attend a narrowness of fortune. In these cases, she knew how to heighten every favour, by the delicate and obliging manner in which she conferred it. She studied to spare their blushes, while she softened their adversity. Thus, when one of her worldly acquaintances was in known distress, she contrived to lose, at play, a sum of money sufficient to answer the exigencies of the case; and this was, probably, the only time she ever touched a card in her life.

It was matter of wonder, how so moderate an estate as she possessed could supply such various and extensive benefactions; and her own sense of this once broke out to an intimate friend. I am surprised, said she, how it is possible my estate should answer all these things. And yet, I never want money!

She affected no kind of singularity or appearance of severity; nor ever presumed to censure those whose piety and morals were less exalted than her own. Her serenity and cheerfulness of temper were so perpetual that (except on the loss of her father and of her husband, and when she was witness to any case of distress in others) her whole life seemed to be a constant calm; or rather an uninterrupted sunshine: and every hour of it sparkled with good humour and inoffensive gaiety.

With regard to her religious principles, she was a doctrinal Calvinist: and shone an eminent trophy of that distinguishing and efficacious grace which she so richly experienced, and which diffused its sanctifying power throughout her practical walk. Agreeably to the scriptural views of the divine sovereignty, we find her thus expressing herself to him whom her soul loved: "Why did thy watchful providence perpetually surround me, crossing all the methods I took to undo myself? Why didst thou pursue me with the offers of thy favour, when I fled thee with such aversion; and had fled thee for ever, if thou hadst not compelled me to return? Why wast thou found of one that sought thee not? Oh why, but because thou wilt be merciful to whom thou wilt be merciful!" [Devout Exerc. Medit. VIII.]—Again: "I lay, a wretched slave, pleased with my chains, and fond of my captivity; till love, almighty love, rescued me. Blest effect of unmerited grace! I shall stand, for ever, an illustrious instance of boundless mercy. To that I must entirely ascribe my salvation: and through all the ages of eternity, I will rehearse the wonders of redeeming love; and tell to listening angels what it has done for my soul." [Ibid.]—"Thy kingdom ruleth over all, O Lord; and thou dost according to thy will, in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. I confess and acknowledge thy providence. The ways of man are not at his own disposal, but all his goings are ordered by thee." [Ibid. Med. IV.]

The holy doctrine of final perseverance was, through the application of it to her soul, by the blessed Spirit, the comfort and rejoicing of her heart. Hence those fine passages which occur in Medit. X. of the above work. "Shall a soul, consecrated to thee, fall a sacrifice to hell? Shall the temple of thy Spirit be profaned, and the lips that have so often ascribed dominion and glory and majesty to thee, be defiled with infernal blasphemy and the execrations of the damned? Shall the sparks of divine love be extinguished, and immortal enmity succeed? And shall I, who was once blest with thy favour, become the object of thy wrath and indignation? It is all impossible; for thou art not as man, that thou shouldst lie; nor as the son of man, that thou shouldst repent. Thou art engaged, by thy own tremendous name, for my security: Transporting assurance! What further security can I ask? What security can I wish, beyond eternal veracity? The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed: but thy kindness shall not depart, nor the covenant of thy peace be broken."

A CONCISE CHARACTER OF THE LATE REV. MR. WHITEFIELD.

I DEEM myself happy in having an opportunity of thus publicly avowing the inexpressible esteem in which I held this wonderful man; and the affectionate veneration, which I must ever retain, for the memory of one whose acquaintance and ministry were attended with the most important spiritual benefit to me, and to tens of thousands beside.

It will not be saying too much, if I term him the apostle of the English empire: in point of zeal for God, a long course of indefatigable and incessant labours, unparalleled disinterestedness, and astonishingly extensive usefulness.

He was a true and faithful son of the Church of England, and invincibly asserted her doctrines to the last; and that not in a merely doctrinal way (though he was a most excellent systematic divine), but with an unction of power from God, unequalled in the present day.

He would never have quitted even the walls of the Church, had not either the ignorance, or the malevolence, of some who ought to have known better, compelled him to a seeming separation.

If the most absolute command over the passions of immense auditories be the mark of a consummate orator, he was the greatest of the age. If the strongest good sense, the most generous expansions of heart, the most artless but captivating affability, the most liberal exemption from bigotry, and the purest and most conspicuous integrity, the brightest cheerfulness, and the promptest wit, enter into the composition of social excellence, he was one of the best companions in the world.

If to be steadfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the works of the Lord; if an union of the most brilliant with the most solid ministerial gifts, ballasted by a deep and humbling experience of grace, and crowned with the most extended success in the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints, be signatures of a special commission from heaven: Mr. Whitefield cannot but stand highest on the modern list of Christian ministers.

England has had the honour of producing the greatest men in almost every walk of useful knowledge. At the head of these are, 1. Archbishop Bradwardin, the prince of divines. 2. Milton, the prince of poets. 3. Sir Isaac Newton, the prince of philosophers; and 4. Whitefield, the prince of preachers.

Bishop Benson was the prelate who had the distinguished honour of ordaining the greatest, the most eloquent, and the most useful minister that has, perhaps, been produced since the days of the apostles.

It appears, from a passage in one of Mr. Whitefield's own letters, published since his decease, that he was the person whom the gracious Spirit and providence of God raised up and sent forth to begin that great work of spiritual revival in the Church of England, which has continued ever since, and still continues, with increasing spread, to replenish and enrich the evangelical vineyard by law established. In the remarkable passage to which I refer, Mr. Whitefield expresses himself, verbatim, thus, to Mr. John Wesley: "As God was pleased to send me out first; and to enlighten me first: so I think he still continues to do it: my business seems to be chiefly in planting. If God send you to water, I praise his name." (l) On the whole, he was the least imperfect character I ever knew; and yet, no person was ever more shockingly traduced and vilified, by those who either were unacquainted with him, or who hated him for his virtues, and for his attachment to the gospel of Christ. But the pen of faithful history, and the suffrages of unprejudiced posterity, (m) will do justice to the memory of a man, of whom the present generation was not worthy.

(l) See the collection of Mr. Whitefield's Letters, in three volumes, octavo. Vol. i. Let. 214, p. 205.

(m) Already has this been exemplified by the testimony of several eminent persons, particularly by the inimitable pen of Cowper, whose poetical characteristic is truth and taste. The following lines are transcribed as descriptive of that invaluable man, and by being inserted in proximity with the above, it is presumed cannot fail of being interesting to the reader.

ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS, AND HISTORIC PASSAGES.

It appears, from a little account-book, wherein that great man of God, the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield, minuted the times and places of his ministerial labours, that he preached upwards of eighteen thousand sermons, from the æra of his ordination to that of his death.

Dr. Grovenor's first wife was a most devout and amiable woman; the Sunday after her death, the Doctor expressed himself from the pulpit in the following manner: "I have had an irreparable loss, and no man can feel a loss of this consequence more sensibly than myself. But the cross of a dying Jesus is my support; I fly from one death, for refuge to another."

Some years ago, a friend of a clergyman now living, (n) said to him, "Sir! you have just as many children as the patriarch Jacob?" — True, answered the good old divine: and I have also Jacob's God to provide for them.

A spark of red hot iron flew into a gentleman's eye, several eminent surgeons tried in vain to extract it; at last, a lady of the patient's acquaintance thought of holding his eye-lid quite open, and of extracting the grievance by the application of a load stone. The experiment succeeded. — How similar is the Holy Spirit's virtue, in extracting the love of sin from the heart of a saint.

King Charles II. once said to that great man, John Milton, "Do not you think your blindness is a judgment upon you for having written in defence of my father's murder?" — Sir, answered the poet, it is true, I have lost my eyes; but, if all calamitous providences are to be considered as judgments, your majesty should remember that your royal father lost his head.

That excellent man, the late Rev. Mr. Joseph Hart, made it his inviolable rule, not to let an Arian, an Arminian, or any unsound preacher, occupy his pulpit so much as once. His usual saying on those occasions was, I will keep my pulpit as chaste as my bed.

Monsieur de Voltaire forgets all his infidelity, on two occasions; viz. when he is sick, and when it thunders and lightens. He is so particularly afraid of stormy weather, that if he happens to be writing when the "clouds pour down their torrents, the air thunders, and the arrows of the Almighty flash abroad," he will call out, in an agony of horror, for a bottle of holy water, and sprinkle himself with it from head to foot, and plentifully bedew the floors and walls of his apartments into the bargain. Immediately after which precaution, he orders mass to be said in his chapel; and the masses go on briskly, one after another, until the thunder and lightning cease. But no sooner is the tempest hushed, than a clear sky and placid elements settle him into a laughing Infidel again; and, resuming his pen, he writes against Christianity with as much acrimony, zeal, and want of argument, as ever. — This behaviour reminds me of an old proverb:

"When the devil was sick,
The devil a monk would be;
But, when the devil grew well,
The devil a monk was he."

A short time before the demise of queen Anne, as bishop Burnet was riding slowly in his coach, round that part of Smithfield whence so many blessed martyrs ascended to heaven, he observed a gentleman, standing on the distinguished spot, in a musing, pensive attitude, and, seemingly, quite absorbed in thought. His lordship ordered the carriage to stop, and sent his servant to the person, with a request that he would come to his coach side. He did so, and proved to be Dr. Evans, a very eminent dissenting minister, of whom the bishop had some knowledge; "Brother Evans," said the prelate, "give me your hand, and come up hither, I want to ask you a question." The doctor being seated, and the coachman ordered to continue driving round as before, the bishop asked the doctor, "what it was that directed his steps to Smithfield? And what he was thinking of while standing there?"—"I was thinking," answered the other, "of the many servants of Christ who sealed the truth of their lives in this place. I came purposely to feast my eyes, once more, with a view of that precious spot of ground. And as public matters have, at present, a very threatening aspect, I was examining myself, whether I had grace and strength enough, to suffer for the gospel, if I should be called to it, and was praying to God that he would make me faithful even to death, if it should be his pleasure to let the old times come over again."—"I myself came hither," replied the prelate "on the same business; I am persuaded that, if God's providence do not interpose, very speedily, and almost miraculously, these times will, and must, shortly return. In which case, you and I shall probably be two of the first victims that are to suffer death at that place," pointing to the paved centre.

But it pleased God to disappoint their fears, by giving a sudden turn to national affairs, within a few weeks queen Anne was gathered to her fathers, and king George I. was proclaimed.

King William being once advised to take more care of his safety, and not to hazard his person too much in the field of battle, answered, "Every bullet has its billet;" meaning, that not a bullet flew at random, but was directed, by a particular providence, whom to injure, and whom to spare. So the preaching of the gospel is equally under divine direction. God's Spirit takes care that the word of truth shall be a savour of life unto life to this man; and a savour of death unto death to that.

An ingenious foreigner was, this week, observing to me, That, "of all the nations of Europe, in which he had been, the English were the most afraid of death." I fear, the reason is, because the English have less religion than other nations.

Archbishop Potter wrote a letter to lady Huntingdon, to this effect: and, as nearly as she can remember (for she repeated it to me by memory), in these terms:

"Dear madam,

"I have been very ill since I last saw you. I hope soon to hear from you, that your health is better for your being at Bath. Continue to pray for me, until we meet in that place where our joy shall be complete. I am, as ever,

Your affectionate Friend,

John Cant."

After the good prelate had written the above letter, he was walking with it to his scrutoire, and (as his son, Mr. Potter, acquainted lady Huntingdon), being seized with a sudden syncope, dropped upon the floor, and expired with the letter in his hand.

A very remarkable circumstance is related concerning Monsieur Huet, the learned bishop of Avranches. During the latter years of his life, his genius and memory gradually failed; but two or three hours before his death, being then in the ninety-first year of his age, his genius revived, his memory returned, and he enjoyed all his intellectual faculties in their original vigour. So, with the people of God, faith, hope, love, joy, and other gracious fruits of the Spirit, may seem to decline; but before a saint expires, they all flourish again, in as great or greater liveliness than ever. God does not take away his children, until he has given them a lightening before death.

Thales, the Miletian, one of the seven Sages of Greece, while he resided in Egypt, measured the exact height of the pyramids there by the shadows they cast. So, one way of attaining to the knowledge of doctrinal truths is by considering the consequences of the opposite errors.

Some gentlemen and ladies were a Sunday or two ago refused admittance into the Magdalen Chapel, though they shewed their tickets. On asking the door-keeper, "Why he objected to their going in?" he answered, that he had orders to admit no persons but such as were in full dress. Surely this is a very ridiculous regulation.

There is, however, a church where this regulation is indispensable, and most strictly right. I mean the Church above. No admittance there for any souls that are not in full dress. You must put on Christ for your wedding garment, and wear his resplendent righteousness by imputation, if ever you mean to shine at God's right hand, and to have a seat in the Church triumphant.

The late king of Sweden was, it seems, under great impressions of spiritual religion for some time before his death. A peasant being once on a particular occasion admitted to his presence, the king, knowing him to be a person of singular piety, asked him "What he took to be the true nature of faith?" The peasant entered deeply into the subject, and much to the king's comfort and satisfaction. The king, at last, lying on his death-bed, had a return of his doubts and fears, as to the safety of his soul; and still the same question was perpetually in his mouth to those about him, "What is real faith? His attendants advised him to send for the archbishop of Upsall; who, coming to the king's bed-side, began in a learned logical manner, to enter into the scholastic definition of faith. The prelate's disquisition lasted an hour. When he had done, the king said, with much energy, "All this is ingenious, but not comfortable; it is not what I want. Nothing, after all, but the farmer's faith will do for me."

Told me by Mrs. Gallatin, Oct. 1769.

I had the following anecdote from the late worthy Mr. Davis, of Hatton Garden, London, whose father had it from one who lived during the plague, and who was well acquainted with the nobleman to whom it refers.

Lord Craven lived in London, when that sad calamity raged. His house was in that part of the town since called (from the circumstance of Craven House being situated there) Craven Buildings. On the plague growing epidemic, his lordship, to avoid the danger, resolved to go to his seat in the country. His coach and six were accordingly at the door, his baggage put up, and all things in readiness for the journey. As he was walking through the hall with his hat on, his cane under his arm, and putting on his gloves, in order to step into his carriage, he overheard his negro (who served him as a postillion), saying to another servant, "I suppose, by my lord's quitting London to avoid the plague, that his God lives in the country, and not in town." The poor negro said this in the simplicity of his heart, as really believing a plurality of gods. The speech, however, struck Lord Craven very sensibly, and made him pause. "My God," thought he, "lives every where, and can preserve me in town as well as in the country. I'll even stay where I am. The ignorance of that negro has preached a useful sermon to me. Lord, pardon that unbelief, and that distrust of thy providence, which made me think of running away from thy hand." He immediately ordered his horses to be taken off from the coach, and the luggage to be brought in. He continued at London, was remarkably useful among his sick neighbours, and never caught the infection.

I likewise think it worth preserving, that (as the same person assured my friend Davis's father), the out-pouring of God's spirit was uncommonly great during the whole time of the plague. Such spiritual consolations and such rich communion with God were seldom experienced as were felt and enjoyed by the Lord's people, from the first commencement to the final cessation of that tremendous visitation. So that the time of destruction was, in another respect, a time of peculiar and most transcendent refreshing to the church of Christ.

A very poor, but a very good woman who died in Yorkshire, not far from Led-stone, the seat of the excellent Lady Betty Hastings, said, a little before she expired, "I will not die without leaving dear Lady Hastings a legacy; and I bequeath her the 17th chapter of St. John; with my prayers that that sweet chapter may be made as great a blessing to her heart as it has been to mine."

The preceding anecdote was told me by the Countess of Huntingdon, at Clifton, this day, August 12, 1775.

One Mr. Simon Brown, an eminent dissenting minister, who lived about 40 years ago in London, became at one time so low-spirited as actually to believe that his soul was annihilated, and that he had no more soul than a stock or a stone. And yet he wrote, and preached, and prayed, and reasoned with so much power, liveliness and good sense, that he was more like a man with two souls than like a man with none. Some of the Lord's people who are disposed to question the truth of their conversion, live so conscientiously, feel their imperfections so deeply, prize Christ so highly, and long for his presence so ardently, that they demonstrate themselves to be converted persons; just as Mr. Brown, who persuaded himself that he had no soul, proved that he had one, by the very arguments which he brought against it.

Cyrus said to Cræsus, "The chests I keep my riches in are the hearts and affections of my subjects." The hearts of the saints are the repositories in which God lays up the riches of his grace. His best treasure is in the souls of his people; for there himself resides.

Sir James Thornhill was the person who painted the inside of the cupola of St. Paul's, London. After having finished one of the compartments, he stepped back gradually, to see how it would look at a distance. He receded so far (still keeping his eye intently fixed on the painting) that he was got almost so the very edge of the scaffolding, without perceiving it: had he continued to retreat, half a minute more would have completed his destruction, and he must have fallen to the pavement underneath. A person present, who saw the danger the great artist was in, had the happy presence of mind to suddenly snatch up one of the brushes, and spoil the painting, by rubbing it over. Sir James, transported with rage, sprung forward to save the remainder of the piece. But his rage was soon turned into thanks, when the person told him, "Sir, by spoiling the painting, I have saved the life of the painter. You were advanced to the extremity of the scaffold, without knowing it. Had I called out to you to apprise you of your danger, you would naturally have turned to look behind you; and the surprise at finding yourself in such a dreadful situation would have made you fall indeed. I had, therefore, no other method of retrieving you, but by acting as I did."

Similar, if I may so speak, is the method of God's dealing with his people. We are all, naturally, fond of our own legal performances. We admire them to our ruin, unless the Holy Spirit retrieve us from our folly. This he does by marring (as it were) our best works; i. e. by shewing us their insufficiency to justify us before God. When we are truly taught of him, we thank him for his grace, instead of being angry at having our idols defaced. The only way by which we are saved from everlasting destruction is, by being made to see that, "by the deeds of the law no flesh living shall be justified."

While Dr. Doddridge was at Bath, in his way to Falmouth (from which latter place he was to embark, and did embark for Lisbon), Lady Huntingdon's house at Bath was his home. In the morning of the day on which he sat out thence for Falmouth, Lady Huntingdon came into his room and found him weeping over that passage in the prophet Daniel (chap. x. 11, 12), O Daniel, a man greatly beloved, &c.—“You are in tears, sir,” said Lady H. “I am weeping, madam,” answered the good doctor, “but they are tears of comfort and of joy. I can give up my country, my relations, and friends into the hand of God. And, as to myself, I can as well go to heaven from Lisbon as from my own study at Northampton.”

Told me by Lady Huntingdon, at Clifton, this day, August 19, 1775.

She also said, that Dr. W——n (the present bishop of Gloucester) came to see her the evening before the day above-mentioned. Dr. Doddridge, and Dr. Oliver (the physician), and Dr. Hartly (author of the Observations on Man), were in the room at the time. W——n, who never knew any thing of politeness or refined behaviour, ran out very furiously against what he called enthusiasm; and observed, however, that “all enthusiasts were honest, though extremely warm and extravagant in their zeal.” Shortly after, Oliver Cromwell's name came on the carpet; and W——n termed him “the greatest enthusiast and the greatest rogue that ever existed.” Lady Huntingdon pointed out the inconsistency of such a remark, from the gentleman who had said just before, “enthusiasm and honesty always went together:” but W——n (who I believe was never known either to blush, to retract, or to apologise) brazened it out very lamely.

King Richard I., in one of his battles with the French, took Philip de Dreux, bishop of Beauvais, prisoner. The pope interceded for his liberty in a letter wherein he styled the fighting prelate, “his dearly beloved son.” The king, by way of answer, sent the bishop's suit of armour, stained with blood, and covered with dust, to the pope, and asked him “Whether he knew his son's coat or no?” The pope was ashamed at the sight, and left the bishop to Richard's mercy. We call ourselves Christians. Are our conversation-garments such as may be expected from the children of God?

Broad Hembury, Sunday, Nov. 11, 1770. I told my people from the pulpit that, as I was walking to church this morning, I could not help observing how different the trees looked to-day from what they did this day se'nnight. They were then covered with almost an infinity of leaves; they are now half stript, and their verdant ornaments lie consuming on the ground. Just such an alteration does death make in a country, a parish, or a family. Providence shakes the tree, and down fall the human leaves. But though the leaf drops, the tree remains; though the body dies, the soul survives.

King William Rufus, being once about to embark for France in a storm, the mariners advised him not to endanger his person, but postpone his voyage until the tempest was over. But his answer was, “Push off, push off; for I never yet heard of a king that was drowned.” And if we never yet heard of a king that was drowned, I am sure we shall never hear of a saint that was damned.

I have been told that when our princes touched people for the evil, the form of words pronounced at the time was, “I touch, but it is God that heals.” The same may be said concerning ministers, ordinances, providences, &c.; they touch and affect our outward senses, but it is God alone who by his effectual grace heals the soul.

Dr. D——'s besetting sin seems to have been an excess and laxness of complaisance. Being to preach one Sunday at a country town, where were two different meetings, the one Calvinistic, the other Arminian; the doctor provided himself with two sermons, as opposite in their plan as were the congregations he was to preach to. When arrived at the place, he mounted the Calvinist pulpit in the morning. He gave out his text and began his discourse; but had not got far before he perceived he had pulled out the wrong sermon. He could not, however, recede, but went through with it; with much uneasiness to himself, and to the great dissatisfaction of his auditory. Having but two sermons with him, and knowing that many of his morning hearers would follow him to the other meeting in the afternoon, he was under the necessity of preaching his Calvinistic discourse to the Arminian synagogue; where he gave as much discontent as he had done to the others before. The doctor, lamenting his mistake shortly after to an intimate friend, received this mortifying answer: "Never mind it, sir; you only happened to put your hand into the wrong pocket."

Such are the fruits of men-fearing and men-pleasing. Told me some time ago, by Captain Clunie.

The late Earl of Portsmouth told my uncle, Francis Toplady, as they were one day walking in a park of his lordship's, which commanded a view of the parish church; that he [the earl] had asked leave of the churchwardens to plaister and white-wash the church all over at his own expense; to which the answer he received was, "That they would give his lordship leave to repair and beautify the church, upon condition of his presenting it with a new ring of bells." As if his conferring one favour on the parish, should lay him under an obligation to confer more!

In this very manner do pharisees and merit-mongers treat the Creator himself. Told me by my uncle, Francis Toplady, May 19, 1770.

We have had praying kings in England; such as Alfred, Edward III., Hen. V., Edward VI., and King William III. Christ himself is a praying king, who ever lives to make intercession for his people. He prays for his subjects that they may be glorified eternally; and he prays for his elect rebels (those of his mystic body, who are yet unconverted) that they may be called effectually.

Edward VI. (at a time when sir John Cheek, one of his tutors, was sick) asking, one morning, "How his tutor did?" was answered, that, "He was supposed to be near death; and had been absolutely given over by his physicians." "No," replied the king, "he will not die, this time; for I have been wrestling for him, to day, with God, in prayer, and I have had an answer of peace: I know he will recover." And the event corresponded. Christ also prays for the spiritual and eternal life of his people; nor prays only, but prevails.

June 19, 1774. As my uncle Francis Toplady and I were walking near the Lock, he was admiring the elegant row of houses, lately built opposite the garden-wall of the Queen's Palace: "What a fine series of building is this, to rise out of what was lately a dirty brick-field!"—I could not help observing how infinitely greater is the blessed difference which God's spirit occasions, by his regenerating power, in the souls of them that are born of him!

When Philip of Macedon besieged Methone, an archer (whose name was Aster, and who assisted in defending the town) took his stand on one of the turrets, and, being a very exact marksman, wrote upon an arrow, "To Philip's right eye." He shot the arrow, and it deprived Philip of the eye it was meant to destroy. Did an ancient warrior take his aim with such certainty, or shall a modern American rifle-man hardly ever miss his mark; and the Spirit of God fall short of his design, and try in vain to pierce a sinner's heart with the arrow of saving grace? Impossible.

A young man was recommended to Diogenes for a pupil; and his friends, thinking to give Diogenes a good impression concerning his intended disciple, were very lavish in his praises. "Is it so?" answered the old philosopher: "If the youth is so well accomplished to my hands, and his good qualities are already so numerous, he has no need of my tuition. Even keep him to yourselves." As little are self-righteous people fit for Christ.

Wise, learned, and magnanimous, as the ancient Romans were, they still had a foolish custom, when the moon was eclipsed, of rattling and making a noise with brass vessels, in order that the sound might bring the moon to herself again: and in hopes of making her shine, they lighted up torches, and threw firebrands into the air. Just as much efficacy have human reason and human works, to discover the way of salvation, and reconcile lost man to the favour of God.

King Philip of Spain, calling Queen Elizabeth's Ambassador to him, pulled a small map of the world out of his pocket; and covering the spot designed to represent England, with his little finger, jeeringly asked the Ambassador, "where was England?" On comparing the pomp of the present world with the glory that shall be revealed, we may justly ask, "Where and what is the present life, when set in competition with the bliss that flows at God's right hand?"

Xenocrates of Chalcedon, while pupil to Plato, was often reproached by his master for his want of politeness and good-nature. Some of Xenocrates' pretended friends endeavoured to prejudice him against Plato, for making so free with him. "Hold your tongues," answered Xenocrates; "I neither love nor respect Plato the less, for using me thus; he does it for my good." O afflicted Christian, remember this! and know that God troubles thee for thy good.

At Worcester there was (and perhaps still is) an idiot, who was employed at the cathedral there in blowing the organ. A remarkably fine anthem being performed one day, the organ-blower, when all was over, said, "I think we have performed mighty well to-day." "We performed?" answered the organist; "I think it was I performed; or I am much mistaken." Shortly after, another celebrated piece of music was to be played. In the middle of the anthem, the organ stops all at once. The organist cries out, in a passion, "Why do not you blow?" The fellow on that pops out his head from behind the organ, and said, "Shall it be we then?"

What are all our pretensions to free-will, spiritual strength, and self-righteousness; but the pride of our hearts, realizing the idiot's question, "Shall it be we?"

When Matthew Prior was secretary to king William's ambassador in France, A.D. 1698, he was shewn, by the officer of the French king's household, at Versailles, the victories of Louis XIV. painted by Le Brun; and, being asked whether the actions of king William were likewise to be seen in his palace? Prior answered, No: the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen every where but in his own house."

So the good works of a true believer shine every where except in his own esteem.

It was remarked concerning the present sir Peter Warren (who in the war before the last, had only the command of a twenty-gun ship), that he did more execution on the Spaniards (who therefore nicknamed his ship, the Infernal), and that he took more prizes, than any captain of a first-rate man of war. So ministers of the fewest gifts are sometimes more eminently owned of God, to the conversion of souls, than those of the brightest abilities, and highest attainments.

A good woman (Mrs. Eagle) was saying to me, to-day (at London, Sept. 14, 1775,) that she never desired to be in a sweeter frame than Mary Magdalen was when she washed our Saviour's feet with tears. I answered, that Mary Magdalen had two frames; her weeping frame, when she bedewed the feet of Christ; and a rejoicing frame, when he said to her, "Go in peace." Sooner or later, all God's people know what both these frames mean.

Charles the XIIth's first exploit was the siege of Copenhagen. He had never, till then, heard the report of muskets loaden with ball; which were now firing on him from the fortifications. Asking a gentleman who stood near him, "What whistling it was that he heard?" was answered, "It is the noise of the muskets which they are firing upon your majesty." "Right," replied the king: "from henceforward it shall be my music." [Biog. Dict. vol. XII.] When a Christian, or a minister, renders himself conspicuous in the defence of gospel truths, noise and malice, slander and opposition, are the music he is to expect from the world and from that day forward.

A happy death, no less than a holy life, is the gift of God. Hence the late truly good Dr. Guise never prayed in public without thanking God for all who were departed in faith. And so does the Church of England, in the Communion Service. None but the Holy Ghost can give the εὐθανασία.

When the magnanimous and heroic Caractacus, a British king, was sent prisoner to Rome, he could not forbear crying out, on surveying the grand and elegant buildings of that superb capital, "How is it possible for the owners of such magnificent structures as these to envy the poor cottages of the Britons!" Much more may we wonder how it is possible for a regenerate soul, who has God and heaven for its portion, to pant after the honours, wealth, and pleasures, of a wretched, perishing world.

I am told that there is at Brighthelmstone, on the sea shore, a spring of fresh water; which spring continues fresh, though constantly covered with the sea when the tide is in. How strongly does this resemble the principle of grace in the heart of a believer! a principle which still exists, though amidst a sea of corruptions; and remains distinct, even when those corruptions conceal it from view, and debar it (for the time being) from actual use and exercise.

Plato, in his youth, had wrote several tragedies. But he no sooner heard Socrates lecture upon virtue than he burnt them all, and devoted himself to the pursuit of wisdom and morality. So, when the soul has been savingly taught of God, its vanities fall off, and its desire is to be made wise and happy to salvation.

A young gentleman whose sensual propensities were extremely violent, desired the sexton of St. Olave's, Southwark, to get him an entire female skull. The man gave him one, and received half-a-crown for his pains. Every morning, for a considerable time, the gentleman spent some minutes in surveying the skull before he went out, from an expectation that the sight of so unpleasant an object would operate as an antidote against the power of that temptation to which he was so subject. But all in vain. His corrupt inclinations still prevailed, and he sinned as frequently as ever. At last he found that the scull did him no service, and he made a present of it to Mr. Wilson, of Bath; who, this day, (at Bath, Sept. 18th, 1776,) gave it to me, at my request.

Afterwards it pleased God to convert the above-mentioned gentleman: and vital grace did that for him which a dead scull was unable to effect. His easily besetting sin had no more dominion over him, from the day that the Holy Ghost laid effectual hold on his heart.

Good Mr. Rogers, the martyr, on the morning he was burnt, put on his clothes very carelessly; cheerfully saying, that "it mattered little how they were put on, seeing they were so soon to be put off for ever." Such should be our attachment to all worldly things.

It was said of Edward the black prince that he never fought a battle which he did not win: and of the great duke of Marlborough that he never besieged a city which he did not take. Shall that be said of men which we deny concerning the Most High God? Is he less successful than some human generals? Shall these invincibly prevail, and grace be liable to defeat? Impossible.

I remember to have seen a humorous print of a miller grinding old people young. The idea religiously considered is not without reality. In regeneration, the Holy Spirit puts us into the mill of the law, and grinds us small, and we come out new creatures.

Procopius says, that when Misdates, king of Persia, was dead without issue, had left his queen pregnant, the Persian nobility set the crown on the queen's belly, before she quickened: thereby acknowledging her unborn offspring for their future sovereign. So that Saporess (which was afterwards the child's name) [was not only crowned before he was born, but even] began his reign before he began to live. If such acts, done by men, seem not irrational, why should any think it strange for the only wise God to set the crown of election upon the heads of his people, when as yet none of them had any being, save only in the womb of his own purpose and decree?

The late lord B——ke (viz. the celebrated infidel and tory) was one day reading in Calvin's Institutions. A clergyman (o) of his lordship's acquaintance coming on a visit, lord B. said to him, "You have caught me reading John Calvin. He was indeed a man of great parts, profound sense, and vast learning. He handles the doctrines of grace in a very masterly manner."—"Doctrines of grace (replied the clergyman)! the doctrines of grace have set all mankind together by the ears." "I am surprized to hear you say so," answered lord B; "you who profess to believe and to preach Christianity. Those doctrines are certainly the doctrines of the Bible: and, if I believe the Bible, I must believe them. And, let me seriously tell you, that the greatest miracle in the world is, the subsistence of Christianity, and its continued preservation, as a religion, when the preaching of it is committed to the care of such unchristian wretches as you."

Told me this day at Bath, July 30th, 1775, by lady Huntingdon, who had it from lord B——'s own mouth.

How fruitless is anxiety for worldly things! My friend, the late Mr. Paul Greenwood, when on his death-bed (about two years ago), was under some distress as to his mother, to whose support he used to contribute.—The good man was no sooner dead than a messenger was despatched to let his mother know it. The messenger of the son's death was met on the road by another messenger who was coming to bring the news of the mother's death to her son.—Thus, she lived not to miss her son's kindness; but both mother and son met in heaven together, about the same time.

I write this, October 30th, 1769.

I cannot help adding a saying the above good man made use of, in his plain, simple manner, on being told that some people thought his sermons too long. "I sometimes preach," answered he, "half an hour before God comes: and when he is come, I can do no less than preach half an hour, or three quarters of an hour, afterwards."

For some few years before the death of the great Mr. Hervey, he visited very few of the principal persons in his neighbourhood. Being once asked, "Why he so seldom went to see the neighbouring gentlemen, who yet shewed him all possible esteem and respect?" He answered, "I can hardly name a polite family where the conversation ever turns upon the things of God. I hear much frothy and worldly chit-chat; but not a word of Christ. And I am determined not to visit those companies where there is not room for my Master as well as for myself."

Dr. Oliver, the celebrated Bath physician, had been a very inveterate infidel till within a short time before his death. In his last sickness the arrows of spiritual conviction stuck fast in him. Lady Huntingdon never saw a person more thoroughly humbled, distressed, and broken in heart. Coming to him about two days before he died, he lamented, not only his own past infidelity, but the zeal and success with which he had endeavoured to infect the minds of others. "O that I could undo the mischief I have done! I was more ardent," said he, "to poison people with the principles of irreligion and unbelief than almost any Christian can be to spread the doctrines of Christ."—Cheer up (answered lady Huntingdon); Jesus, the great sacrifice for sin, atoned for the sins of the second table as well as for those of the first.—"God," replied he, "certainly can, but I fear he never will, pardon such a wretch as I."—You may fear it at present, rejoined she; but you and I shall most certainly meet each other in heaven.—The doctor then said, "O woman, great is thy faith. My faith cannot believe that I shall ever be there."

Soon after, the Lord lifted up the light of his countenance on Dr. Oliver's soul. He lay, the rest of his time, triumphing and praising free grace: and went off, at last, as happy as an angel.

Told me, by lady Huntingdon, at Clifton, August 19th, 1775.

Mr. Maccaill, a Scotch preacher, was tortured to death, in Scotland, some time after the restoration of Charles II. His dying words were glorious and triumphant, notwithstanding the extremity of his bodily pain: "Farewell, sun, moon, and stars! farewell, world, and time! farewell, weak and frail body! welcome, eternity! welcome, angels and saints! welcome, Saviour of the world! welcome, God the Judge of all!" He died by the torture of the iron boot.

A person, who had heard much concerning Scanderbeg's victories, was very desirous of seeing the sword with which that famous general had wrought such celebrated exploits. Scanderbeg sent it to him; and, on seeing it, the person spake to the following effect: "Is this the weapon which has made so great noise in the world? I can see nothing in this short, mean-looking sword, answerable to the majestic idea I had entertained of it." This being told to Scanderbeg, he ordered the messenger to remind the other that "Scanderbeg's victories depended not on the grandeur of his sword, but on the strength and skill of the arm that wielded it: not the weapon, but Scanderbeg himself was the conqueror." So it is not the gospel, nor gospel ministers, by whom souls are subdued to Christ; but the power of Christ's own spirit, acting by these, which brings sinners in subjection to the obedience of faith.

The late lady L——d——y, on being asked, by lady Huntingdon, "whether she knew any thing of that holy Spirit by whom the Bible was inspired?" made answer, in the following words: "Yes, my lady, I am well acquainted with the name of Socrates, and of all the other philosophers that composed the Bible."

Told me, at Epping Place (in Essex), by lady Huntingdon, April 2, 1776.

A godly minister, being in a consumption, came to Ashby (near Fawsley, where Mr. Dod lived) for the benefit of Mr. Dod's counsel and conversation. He was much bowed down with doubts and fears; and a little before his death asked Mr. Dod, "What will you say to me who am going out of the world, and can find no spiritual comfort?" Mr. Dod answered, "And what will you say to Christ himself, who, when going out of the world, found no comfort, but cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" This speech much refreshed the dying minister a little before he went to his heavenly inheritance.

A minister was recovering of a dangerous illness; when one of his friends addressed him thus: "Sir, though God seems to be bringing you up from the gates of death; yet it will be a long time before you will sufficiently retrieve your strength, and regain vigour enough of mind to preach as usual."—The good man answered: "You are mistaken, my friend; for this six weeks' illness has taught me more divinity than all my past studies, and all my ten years' ministry put together."

Related by Mr. Medley, in preaching, at London, this evening, May 11, 1776.

Public controversy, from the press, may be of standing use to the present and to future times. But wrangling altercations, in private company, seldom have much good effect: they resemble the pope's interview with an English quaker, where neither received any good from the other.—The quaker visited Rome, in order to convert the pope. Being admitted to his presence, the quaker thus accosted his holiness: "Friend, I come to tell thee that thou art antichrist, and the scarlet whore of Babylon."—The pope, who was a man of humour, answered: "Friend, I am glad thou art come, as it gives me an opportunity of telling thee that thou art a most egregious heretic. Thou mayest think thyself well off that I do not put thee into the inquisition, and burn thee to ashes. So, get thee back to thy own country while thou art safe and sound."—Thus each left the other as he found him. The pope would not believe himself to be antichrist, nor the quaker deem himself a heretic.

Mr. William Gay (of Uffculme), in conversation, at Broad Hembury, April 2, 1775.

Lewis I. of France died of vexation, occasioned by the revolt of his son, Lewis of Bavaria. The broken-hearted father said, as he expired, "I forgive Lewis; but let him know he has been the cause of my death."—The sins of God's elect were the cause of the Messiah's death: yet, in dying, he declared, "Father, forgive them," &c.

My late revered friend, the truly reverend and useful Mr. George Whitefield, was preaching one time at Exeter. A man was present who had loaded his pockets with stones, in order to fling them at that eminently precious ambassador of Christ. He heard his prayer, however, with patience: but no sooner had he named his text than the man pulled a stone out of his pocket, and held it in his hand, waiting for a fair opportunity to throw it. But God sent a word to his heart, and the stone dropt from his hand. After sermon, he went to dear Mr. Whitefield (whose name I can hardly think of without tears), and told him, "Sir, I came to hear you this day with a view to break your head; but the Spirit of God, through your ministry, has given me a broken heart." The man proved to be a sound convert, and lived an ornament to the gospel. Such power belongeth unto God!

My old and valuable acquaintance, the late Mr. Thomas Chorton (who died, at Southwark, Dec. 19, 1774), who absolutely fell a martyr to frequent and excessive preaching, was very comfortable on his death-bed. "When will the happy hour arrive?" was one of his dying sayings. And, when some of his friends were taking their last farewell of him, he said, "Friends united to Christ shall meet again." He compared himself to a weary child, whom his father was putting to bed: and was deeply refreshed by that sweet promise in the last verse of Isa. xxxv. "The ransomed of the Lord," &c.—His funeral text was, by his own particular desire, Acts ii. 28. "Thou hast made known to me ways of life; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance."

Lady Huntingdon was once speaking to a workman who was repairing a garden wall, and pressing him to take some thought concerning eternity and the state of his soul.—Some years, afterwards, she spoke to another, on the same subject: and said to him, "Thomas, I fear you never pray, nor look to Christ for salvation."—"Your ladyship is mistaken," answered the man: "I heard what passed between you and James, at such a time; and the word you designed for him took effect on me."—"How did you hear it?"—"I heard it on the other side of the garden, through a hole in the wall: and shall never forget the impression I received."—Thus will the blessed Spirit even make his way through the hole of a wall rather than an elect sinner shall die unconverted.

"How does your ladyship" (said the famous lord Bolingbroke once to lady Huntingdon) "reconcile prayer to God for particular blessings with absolute resignation to the Divine Will?"—Very easily (answered she): just as if I was to offer a petition to a monarch, of whose kindness and wisdom I have the highest opinion. In such a case, my language would be, I wish you to bestow on me such a favour: but your majesty knows better than I how far it would be agreeable to you, or right in itself, to grant my desire. I therefore content myself with humbly presenting my petition, and leave the event of it entirely to you.

A gentlewoman at Lambeth (if I mistake not, her name is B—e) being lately asked to read some of W—y's Arminian tracts, answered thus; "I have not yet done with the Bible: when I have thrown aside the Bible, I will read Mr. W—y."

Told me, at Knightsbridge, by Mr. Petty, in June, 1777.

The late Dr. Guyse lost his eye-sight in the pulpit, while he was in his prayer before sermon. Having finished his prayer, he was, consequently, forced to make no use of his written papers, but to preach without notes.—As he was led out of the Meeting, after service was over, he could not help lamenting his sudden and total blindness. A good old gentlewoman who heard him deplore his loss, answered him, "God be praised that your sight is gone. I never heard you preach so powerful a sermon in my life. Now we shall have no more notes. I wish, for my own part, that the Lord had took away your eye-sight twenty years ago, for your ministry would have been more useful by twenty degrees.

The truths of the gospel are to be introduced with discretion and propriety.—A person once harangued on the strength of Samson: "I affirm," said he, "that this same Samson was the strongest man that ever did or ever will live in the world." "I deny it," replied one of the company: "yourself are stronger than he."—"How do you make out that?"—"Because you just now lugged him in by head and shoulders."

The duke of Alva having given some prisoners their lives, they afterwards petitioned him for some food. His answer was, that "he would grant them life, but no meat." And they were famished to death. Fuller's Worthies, Part III. p. 39.

The deniers of final perseverance represent the Deity in a similar view. "God promises eternal life to the saints, if they endure to the end:" but he will not, according to this wretched Arminian doctrine, secure to them the continuance of that grace, without which, eternal life cannot be had!

Mr. Hervey was once travelling in a stage-coach with a lady who was totally immersed in dissipation, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. "I have comfort," said she, "before my pleasurable plans take place, and when they do take place, and after they have taken place. I expect them with satisfaction, I enjoy them with high gratification, and I reflect on them with happiness when they are past." "You have forgot to mention one comfort, madam, (replied Mr. Hervey,) which such a life is productive of." "Howso?" answered the lady. "I have specified the pleasures I receive before the time, at the time, and after the time: and surely I cannot have made any omission." "Yes: you have forgot the principal joy of all: viz. the comfort which the review of these things will give you on your death-bed." The lady was struck: and growing serious, from that time forward she became an eminent Christian.

Told me at Broad Hembury, March 15, 1775, by good Mr. Pitts, of Chard.

Similis, captain of the guards to Adrian, got leave to quit that emperor's service, and spent the last seven years of his life in rural retirement. At his death, he ordered the following inscription on his tomb: "Here lies Similis, who lived but seven years, though he died at sixty-seven."

Our true age, and our real life, are to be dated from the time of our abstraction from the world, and of our conversion to God.

One time, when I was at Glastonbury, I went to see the Torr, which is a tower seated on the top of a very high hill. The ascent was so steep that I was forced in some places to climb up on my hands and knees. Would we enjoy God's presence? We must (through the efficacy of his influence) use our hands and knees, i. e. we must be found in the way of obedience, humility, and prayer.

A person was preaching in Norfolk some time ago, and, among other observations, made the following: "If king George was to come and knock at your doors, you would all strive who should let him in first: why do not you, with at least equal readiness, let Christ into your hearts?" One of his auditory took occasion to ask him when sermon was over, "What if king George should knock at the door of a house in which all the people were dead? Who, I wonder, would rise and let in the king then?"

There are merit-mongers among the most abandoned sinners.—Two women were some time since admitted into the Lock Hospital, in order to be cured of a very criminal disease. Mr. Madan, who visited them during their confinement, laboured to convince them of their sin and spiritual danger. "Truly," said one of them, "I am by no means so bad as some of my profession are; for I never picked any man's pocket in my life."—The other said, "I cannot affirm that I never picked a man's pocket; but I have this in my favour, that I never admitted any man into my company on a Sunday until after nine at night."

When captain David Gam fell in the battle of Azincourt, king Henry V. knighted him as he was expiring on the ground.—What are all earthly distinctions but honours conferred on dying men.—And what superior glory does Christ confer on his expiring saints! He crowns them kings in the very article of death.

A good woman (Mrs. Whitby, of Colmpton) said, when under great bodily pain, "God has an end to answer by every afflicting dispensation; and until God's end is answered, I would not wish this affliction to be withdrawn."

Aug. 18, 1769, Dr. G—— told me that some years ago, when he had been for a long time together under great darkness of soul, he was complaining to good Mr. Walker, Truro, that "he could compare himself to nothing else but to a raven, an unclean bird, bringing bread and flesh to God's people without tasting any himself."—To which Mr. Walker answered, "Be contented and thankful that the Lord makes you a feeder of his heritage."—"Ah, but," added the doctor, "it seems hard to act merely as a cook, and serve up rich provision for others, while I myself am famishing."—Mr. Walker rejoined, "Nay, but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?"

Mr. Fox, the martyrologist, tells us of one Mr. Crow, an English seaman, who, being shipwrecked, lost all his property, and was obliged, when shifting for his own life, to throw what little money he had, which was five pounds, into the sea. But he would not part with his New Testament: and therefore, having tied it round his neck, he committed himself to a broken mast; on which, having floated for four days, he was at last discovered and taken up alive; and all the rest of the ship's crew being drowned.

Some time since, I was reading of a good woman who, being on her death bed, was asked Whether she wished to live or die? "I desire," said she, "to have no wish about the matter; except it be, that the Lord may perform his own will." But, replied the person, which would you choose if the Lord was to refer it to yourself? "Why truly," rejoined she, "I should in that case beg leave to refer it back to him again!"

Archbishop Williams once said to a friend of his, "I have passed through many places of honour and trust, both in church and state; more than any, of my order, in England, these seventy years before: yet, were I but assured that by my preaching, I had converted but one soul to God, I should take therein more spiritual joy and comfort than in all the honours and offices which have been bestowed upon me."

The old duke of Bedford (grandfather of the late duke) used to say, "I consider the prayers of God's ministers and people as the best walls round my house."

Told me at Woburn by Mr. R. Oct. 12, 1775.

Mr. Winter was lately in company with an Arminian who ran out violently against the doctrine of election. "You believe election," said Mr. Winter, "as firmly as I do." "I deny it," answered the other: "on the contrary, it is a doctrine I detest." "Do you believe that all men will be saved, in the last day, or only some?" "Only some." "Do you imagine that those some will be found to have saved themselves?" No certainly; God in Christ is the only Saviour of sinners. "But God could have saved the rest, could he not?" No doubt. "Then salvation is peculiar to the saved?" To be sure. "And God saves them designedly, and not against his will?" Certainly. "And willingly suffers the rest to perish, though he could easily have hindered it?" It should seem so. "Then is not this election?" It amounts to much the same thing.

Mr. John Bunyan having preached one day with particular warmth and enlargement, some of his friends, after service was over, took him by the hand, and could not help observing what a sweet sermon he had delivered: "Aye," said the good man, "you need not remind me of that, for the devil told me of it before I was out of the pulpit."

The late Dr. Grosvenor, being at the funeral of Dr. Watts, a friend said to him, "Well, Dr. Grosvenor, you have seen the end of Dr. Watts, and you will soon follow; what think you of death?" "Think of it," replied the doctor, "why, when death comes, I shall smile upon death, if God smiles upon me."

Told me by Mr. Ryland, July 11, 1769.

The late Lady Stormont, sen., mother of the present Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, upon being complimented by another lady, that "she had the three finest sons in Scotland to be proud of; made answer, "No, madam; I have much to be thankful for, but nothing to be proud of."

Told me by Lady Grierson, at London, this day, January 10th, 1776.

When Thales was young, his mother asked him why he did not marry? "It is too early," answered the philosopher. When he was advanced in years, the good woman repeated her question; to which he answered, "I am now too old." So Satan is perpetually suggesting that it is either too soon or too late to return to God.

A Persian king, willing to oblige two of his courtiers, gave to one a golden cup, and to the other a kiss; and he that had the former complained to the king that his fellow's kiss was more to be valued than his golden cup. Christ does not put off his people with the golden cup; but he gives them his kiss, which is infinitely better. He gives his best gifts to his best beloved ones; he gives his best love, his best joy, his best peace, his best mercies.

Some of Mr. Thomas Jones's last words [viz. he who was chaplain of St. Saviour's, Southwark] were, "A sinner saved, a sinner saved!" Similar will be the everlasting song of the saints, in heaven itself.

Mr. Richard Baxter, when on his death-bed, was visited by a friend, who reminded him of the glory to which he was going, and that his many good works would attend him into a better state. The old gentleman, lifting up his dying hand, and waving it, replied, "Do not talk to me about works, alas! I have dealt too much in them already."

Mrs. Romaine was last week in company with a clergyman, at Tiverton, who ran out with no little zeal against what he called "irresistible grace;" alleging that "such grace would be quite incompatible with free-will." Not at all so, answered Mrs. Romaine; grace operates effectually, yet not coercively. The wills of God's people are drawn to him and divine things, just as your will would be drawn to a bishoprick, if you had the offer of it.

Told me at Broad Hembury, by Mr. Romaine, Sept. 18, 1773.

A gentlewoman went some time ago, to hear Dr. F—— preach, and, as is usual among Dissenters, carried a pocket-bible with her, that she might turn to any passages the preacher might happen to refer to. But she found she had no use for her Bible there; and, on coming away, said to a friend, "I should have left my Bible at home to-day, and have brought my dictionary. The doctor does not deal in Scripture, but in such learned words and phrases as require the help of an interpreter to render them intelligible."

Edward the Black Prince, having conquered and taken prisoner king John of France, nobly condescended to wait on his royal captive the same night, at supper. Christ, having first subdued his people by his grace, waits on them afterwards to their lives' end.

Mr. Dod, being at Holmby-house, and being invited by an honourable personage to see that stately building erected by Sir Christopher Hatton; he desired to be excused, and to sit still, looking on a flower which he held in his hand: "For," said he, "I see more of God in this flower than in all the beautiful edifices in the world."

Dr. Gill was preaching, some years ago, on the natural depravity and spiritual inability of man. A gentleman who heard the sermon was greatly offended; and, taking an opportunity some time after, calling on the doctor, told him that, in his opinion, he had degraded that noble being, man, and laid him much too low. "Pray, sir," answered the doctor, "how much do you think can men contribute towards their own conversion and salvation?" Man can do such and such things, replied the gentleman; reckoning up a whole string of free-will abilities. "And have you done all this for yourself?" said the doctor. "Why no, I cannot say I have yet, but I hope I shall begin soon." "If you really have these things in your power," replied the doctor, "and have not done them for yourself, you deserve to be doubly damned, and are but ill qualified to stand up for that imaginary free-will which, according to your own confession, has done you so little good. However, after you have made yourself spiritually whole (if ever you find yourself able to do it), be kind enough to come and let me know how you went about it; for at present I know but of one remedy for human depravation, namely, the efficacious grace of Him who worketh in men both to will and to do of his own good pleasure."

Dr. Gill, preaching a charity sermon, some years since, concluded thus: "Here are present, I doubt not, persons of divided sentiments; some believing in free-will, and some in free grace. Those of you who are free-willers and merit-mongers, will give to this collection of course, for the sake of what you suppose you will get by it. Those of you on the other hand, who expect salvation by grace alone, will contribute to the present charity out of love and gratitude to God. So between free-will and free grace I hope we shall have a good collection."

A person called some time ago on Mr. Romaine, and complained of being grievously distressed and bowed down in soul, without one ray of comfort from God. Mr. Romaine's answer was, "Do you think, then, that no persons go to heaven but those that have comforts?"

Told me by Mr. Willett, Nov. 14, 1769.

The Virgin Mary is applied to by Papists as the giver of children. I should rather have thought them more consistent if they considered her as the patroness of maids and bachelors.

Euclid (the disciple of Socrates) having offended a brother of his, the brother cried out in a rage, "Let me die, if I am not revenged on you, one time or other." To whom Euclid replied, with a sweetness next to Christian, "And let me die, if I do not soften you by my kindnesses and make you love me as well as ever."

The learned Salmasius said, when on his death bed, "Oh, I have lost a world of time! If one year more was to be added to my life, it should be spent in David's Psalms and Paul's Epistles."

A friend of Mr. Dod's being raised from a mean estate to much worldly greatness, Mr. Dod sent him word that "This was but like going out of a boat into a ship; and he should remember that, while he was in the world, he was still on the sea."

Good Mrs. Wicks of Cambridge, when on her dying bed requested her family to pray that God would stay his hand: "I am so full of consolation," said she, "that the frail vessel of my heart can hold no more. I cannot sustain the divine manifestations with which I am favoured. Beg of the Lord to moderate them until I get out of the body."

A little before her departure she said, "All the promises that, during the time of my pilgrimage below have been sent home to my soul at different seasons, are now given me together in a cluster.

Told me by her daughter, Mrs. G. sen., September 19, 1769.

Mr. Hervey, being in company with a person who was paying him some compliments on account of his writings, replied, laying his hand on his breast, "O, sir, you would not strike the sparks of applause, if you knew how much corrupt tinder I have within."

The Rev. Mr. Cochlan asking a lady, in the neighbourhood of Norwich, "Whether she knew anything of Christ?" She answered, "Yes, sir; I remember that I once saw his picture."

Told me at Norwich, by Mr. Cochlan, April 5, 1776.

A gentleman having lost a favourite son, said, when some friends offered their condolences, "I would be content, was it possible, to lose a son every day in the year, might I but be favoured with such manifestations of God's presence and love as I have experienced on the present occasion."

Told me by Dr. Gifford, Sep. 22, 1769.

Mr. Grimshaw (of Yorkshire), a little before he expired, said to Mr. Venn, "I am as happy as it is possible for me to be on earth; and am as certain of my salvation as if I was already in heaven."

A martyr was asked, whether he did not love his wife and children who stood weeping by him? "Love them? yes," said he, "if all the world were gold, and at my disposal, I would give it all for the satisfaction of living with them, though it were in a prison. Yet, in comparison of Christ, I love them not."

Bromiardus mentions an apprentice who had served a hard master, by whom he had often been severely beaten. These blows and rigorous treatment the Lord made a means of the young man's conversion.—Sometime after, lying on his death-bed, he got hold of his master's hands (who stood by), and kissing them said, Hæ manus perduxerunt me ad paradysum, i. e. "These hands have been instrumental in bringing me to heaven."

Good old Mr. Peter Higgins, who lately departed to glory, dwelt much in the light of God's countenance, and walked in the full assurance of faith. Being asked whether he had any doubt of his salvation? He answered in his plain simple manner; "I was bargained for in eternity, and the price of my redemption was paid above 1700 years ago; then why should I doubt? I have nothing left to doubt of."

Luther had this passage in his last will and testament: "Lord God, I thank thee for that thou hast been pleased to make me a poor and indigent man upon earth. I have neither house, nor land, nor money to leave behind me. Thou hast given me wife and children: whom I now restore to thee. Lord, nourish, teach, and preserve them, as thou hast me."

Mr. Fisher, of Norwich, being some time ago dangerously ill, and recovering again, said to a friend, "I have been in full view of the harbour, and, alas! am blown back again."

Told me by Dr. Hunt, of Norwich, Dec. 10, 1769.

"I know myself to be a child of God, and an heir of glory," said Mr. Hart, on his death-bed; adding, "Judas was lost, that the Scripture might be fulfilled; but the Scripture would not be fulfilled, if I should not be saved."

The famous Mr. Bulstrode Whitlock, (Lord Chancellor, ambassador to Sweden, and historian,) used to say, after his retirement from the world and from public business, "My religion is, to have the good Spirit of God in my heart."

Paulinus, when they told him that the Goths had sacked Nola, and plundered him of all that he had, lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, "Lord, thou knowest where I have laid up my treasure."

To say that a man, now in a state of grace, may hereafter perish eternally, is to say that God serves his saints as Edward IV. served the bastard of Falconbridge. Edward first pardoned him, and then cut off his head.

In returning from St. Nicholas' church Bristol, where I preached this afternoon, lady Huntingdon said to me, "You have crossed the Pharisees to purpose."—I answered, "My wish, madam, is not to dress them, but to undress them."

Henry I. made the length of his own arm a standard measure (since called a yard) throughout England. Do not bigots act much the same part in matters of religion?

Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, after the defeat and flight of his army, being himself taken captive by the enemy, was asked, how he did? His answer was, "Never better. While I had all my army about me, I could find but little time to think on God: whereas now, being stripped of all earthly dependencies, I think on God alone, and betake myself wholly to his providence."

A good woman, in much pain of body, lately said, "Though I groan, I do not grumble."

"I had rather do the least truly good work," said Luther, "than obtain all the conquests of Cæsar and Alexander."

Anaxagoras, the Ionian, being asked to what end he was born, replied, "To contemplate the sun, moon, and skies."—Had he been a Christian, he would have answered, "To glorify God, and to be glorified by him."

A painter, going to take the picture of Helena, finding himself not able to draw her beauty to the life, drew her covered with a veil.—Much more, when we speak of God's excellencies, must we draw a veil

A good man, who died some years ago at Cambridge, said, in his last hour, "I used to fear the river of death; I thought it deep, but I find it shallow: and it is no burden to me to go over."

Some of Dr. Doddridge's last words were "The best prayer I ever offered up in my life deserves damnation."

Told me by Mr. Ryland, at London, Jane, 1774.

Doctor Cotton Mather, on his death-bed, expressed himself thus: "I am not afraid to die: if I was, I should disgrace my Saviour. I am in his hand, where no ill can befall me."

A certain philosopher once asked a Christian, "Where is God?"—The Christian answered, "Let me first ask of you, Where he is not?"

A certain Jew had formed a design to poison Luther: but he was happily disappointed, by a faithful friend, who sent Luther a picture of the man, with a warning to take heed of such a person when he saw him. By this Luther knew the murderer, and escaped his hands.—Thus the word of God, O Christian, shews thee the face of those lusts which Satan employs to butcher thy comforts and poison thy soul. Hereby, saith David "is thy servant warned," Psalm xix. 11

The Rev. Mr. William Law, who was a professed and very able mystic, and who had gone great lengths in asserting the anti-christian doctrine of justification by works; was, so far as concerns that article, brought to a better mind by the grace of God before he was taken hence. Being on his death-bed, and the turn of the conversation leading him to speak about confidence in good works, he delivered himself in these words, a very short time before he expired: "Away with those filthy rags! A fire is now kindled in my soul" [laying his hand to his breast], "which shall burn, to the praise of Jesus Christ, to all eternity."

Good Mr. Wilcox [author of "A Word to Saints and Sinners,"] used to wish, if it were God's will, that his death might be sudden: and the Lord gave him his desire. His usual saying was, "Sudden death, sudden glory." Which words were his epitaph on his tomb in Bunhill Fields.

One Mr. Barber (an ancestor of that Mr. Barber who, about the year 1720, officiated as minister of a dissenting congregation at Burntwood in Essex), being a Protestant, was, in the reign of bloody Queen Mary, condemned to the flames. The morning of execution arrived. The intended martyr walked to Smithfield, and was bound to the stake. The faggots were piled round him, and the executioner only waited for the word of command to apply the torch. Just in this crisis tidings came of the Queen's death; which obliged the officers to stop their proceedings, and respite the prisoner's sentence until the pleasure of the new Queen [Elizabeth] should be known.

In memory of so providential a deliverance, by which the good man was literally as a brand plucked from the burning; he was no sooner released from his imprisonment and troubles than he had a picture made of Queen Elizabeth, decorated round with significant ornaments: and ordered in his will that the picture should be transmitted down for a memorial to future times, in the eldest branch of his family; where (says Mr. Whiston, from whom the above account is extracted), it is preserved to this day. See Whiston's Memoirs, vol. i. page 295.

The late Duke of Newcastle (viz. the old Whig Duke), had been the instrument of making more bishops than any other courtier of that time. On his being discarded by a succeeding sovereign, it was remarked to his grace, by a nobleman who was intimate with him, that "all his bishops except one" [viz. Dr. Johnson, late bishop of Worcester], "had forsaken his levee." To whom the duke answered, "I do not wonder at it, my lord: for of all people in the world, no men are so apt to forget their Maker as the bishops." How smart! (but at the same time how palpably unjust) was the profane remark!

Mr. Dodd having preached from that text, "O woman, great is thy faith, be it unto thee even as thou wilt;" he afterwards told some women who were at dinner with him, "It is an usual saying, let a woman have her will, and she will be quiet. Now, the certain way for a woman to have her will, is to have a strong faith, and to pray as the woman did in the gospel."

Aristides, a professed heathen, would lend but one ear to any one who accused an absent party, and used to hold his hand on the other; intimating, that he reserved an ear for the party accused.

See Mrs. Sarah Wight's Experience, page 68.

In the late war between Russia and the Porte, a small fleet of the former was met in the Black Sea by a much larger one belonging to the latter. The Turkish commander, observing his own superiority, sent a polite message or summons to the Russian, advising him to surrender, since all resistance would be rash and fruitless. To which the gallant officer made this reply: "That surrendering was not in his commission, but fighting; and that he might come on as fast as he pleased, for he was ready for him." This resolute answer being seconded by a suitable conduct, the Turkish fleet, after a short but smart engagement, was obliged to sheer off with loss. Christian reader, an useful animating hint to you and me; let us go and do likewise. James iv. 7. 1 Tim. vi. 12.

In the reign of Charles II. one Blood attempted to steal the crown; and, instead of being hanged for it, had a pension settled upon him by that prince.

Naturally, we are all crown stealers. We rob God of the glory, freeness, and unchangeableness of his decrees; we are for robbing Christ, as much as in us lies, of the praise of our salvation; and rob the Spirit of his efficacy, by exalting our own free-will. Yet many rebels who have done this, many who have done all they could to uncrown and dethrone the whole Trinity, are ended afterwards with grace, and made partakers of God's kingdom.

I have heard of a man who, being in Wales, went, out of mere whim, to hear a Welsh sermon. He did not understand a single sentence that was spoken: and yet the power of God's Spirit was so eminently present that the man was converted under that discourse. Can there be a stronger proof that the work of conversion is the work of God only?

In the last century an Asiatic Jew, named Sabbatei-Sevi, pretended to be the Messiah, and to work miracles. Being brought before the Turkish emperor, that prince told him, "he would have him stripped naked, and shot at with arrows; and if he proved invulnerable, he would acknowledge him for the person he pretended to be." The impostor fell on his knees, and begged he might not be put to so violent a test. Arminianism professes itself to be the true system. But stripped and shot at with the arrows of reason and God's word it soon appears to be an imposture.

Sometimes there were more kings than one at Sparta, who governed by joint authority. A king was occasionally sent to some neighbouring state in character of a Spartan ambassador. Did he, when so sent, cease to be a king of Sparta because he was also an ambassador? No: he did not divest himself of his regal dignity; but only added to it that of public deputation. So Christ, in becoming man, did not cease to be God: but, though he ever was and still continued to be king of the whole creation, acted as the voluntary servant and messenger of the Father.

The late elector and bishop of Cologne was particularly addicted to hunting, and kept a great number of fine horses and excellent dogs. An intimate friend took the freedom, one day, to represent to him "that it was rather unbecoming a bishop to devote so much of his time and affection and revenues to the sports of the field."—"I hunt" (replied the elector), "not as bishop, but as prince, of Cologne."—"Be it so" (rejoined his friend): "but if the prince should break his neck, what would become of the bishop?"

I would give this hint a farther improvement. If a professing minister of Christ should go to hell, what would become of the man?

A gentlewoman, who lived a little way out of Brighthelmstone, dreamed, that a tall lady, dressed in such and such a manner, would come to that town, and be an instrument of doing much good.—About three years after this dream, lady Huntingdon went down thither (on account of her younger son's health, who was ordered by his physicians to bathe in the sea). One day her ladyship met this gentlewoman in the street; who, seeing the countess, made a full stop, and said, "O madam, you are come!"—Lady H. was surprised at the oddity of such an address from an absolute stranger, and thought at first that the woman was not in her senses. What do you know of me? said the countess.—"Madam," returned the former, "I saw you, in a dream, three years ago, drest just as you now are:" and related the whole of what she had dreamed.—This very person was, in consequence of this acquaintance with lady H., converted in a few weeks; and died in the triumph of faith about a year after.—The result of lady Huntingdon's visit to Brighthelmstone was the founding of that chapel there which has been since blest to the conversion of so many souls.

Told me, by lady Huntingdon, at Trevecka, this evening, August 30, 1776.

Our Henry IV. used to keep his crown by him on his bolster, while he slept. Being once very ill, and falling into a deep sleep, his attendants supposed him dead: on which his eldest son came and took the crown away. The king, waking, unexpectedly missed his crown, and enquired what was become of it: when his son brought it again, and restored it on his bended knee.

Man is, by nature, in a deep sleep; a sleep of spiritual insensibility and death. He knows not that the crown is fallen from his head: but when awakened by the spirit of God, he at once misses his crown, and enquires after it at the throne of grace. And, as surely as he feels his loss of it, and beseeches God to restore it, so surely shall it be given him again.

The late lord Huntingdon (who was remarkable for having hardly ever dreamt in his life) dreamed one night that death, in the appearance of a skeleton, stood at the bed's foot; and after standing a while, unbuttoned the bed-clothes, at the bottom, and crept up to the top of the bed (under the clothes) and lay between him and his lady. His lordship told his dream, in the morning, to the countess; who affected to make light of it: but the earl died in about a fortnight after.

Told me, by the countess, at Rumford, Essex, April 12, 1776.

It was, this evening, after preaching at St. Bride's, in company with one Mr. Richards: who, in the course of the conversation, told me that, some years ago, when he was under his first awakenings, and had but an imperfect view of the gospel plan, he had been, for a considerable time, exercised with various doubts concerning the absolute freeness of salvation: his unbelief perpetually suggesting that he must do something as a condition of justification. While in this state of embarrassment and legal distress, he dreamed one night that he was in company with Mary Magdalen; and that she addressed him to this effect: You are in doubt whether salvation is absolutely free. Look at me. Consider my case. And then doubt the absolute freeness of salvation if you can. This dream had so happy an effect, that Mr. Richards waked perfectly satisfied about this great point; and has not had a doubt concerning it since. London, Dec. 31, 1775.

Zeuxis is said to have painted a picture of an old woman so very humorously that, when finished, it threw him into such an excessive fit of laughter as proved his death.—How many pharisees have fallen in love with their own supposed works of righteousness (as Narcissus with himself), and descended to everlasting death amid all the false complacency of self-admiration! See Isa. 1. 11.

A fellow traveller of mine (one Mr. Fry), with whom I went last month through Dorsetshire, and who has been several voyages to China, told me of a people called Lascars [by a slight transposition, rascals], who are extraordinary good seamen in fine weather and out of an engagement: but if once a storm arises, or the vessel is attacked by an enemy, down these Lascars go into the hold, and under the hatches; and will suffer themselves to be sunk, killed, or taken, rather than either fight or work the ship. No threats or entreaties will induce them.—Such are half the professors of the Christian name.

Broad Hembury, Aug. 18, 1770.

Mr. Ohm (born near Riga) told me to-day, that he loves England better than his native country, because he had only his natural birth there; whereas here he was born again of the Holy Ghost.

London, July 13, 1776.

Mr. Chorlton, who returned to town from the North last night, called on me this morning (Oct. 25, 1769), and told me that he has reason to think that his ministry has been blest to awakening his aged father. Preaching very lately on Ezekiel xxxvii. 9. the old man was so affected under his son's discourse as to acknowledge, with tears, "I have been eighty-six years in the world; and have never lived to God a moment of the time."—Thus grace can make a father the spiritual son of his own child!

Mr. Heard very lately heard Dr. M—— preach. Afterwards, the doctor asked him how he liked his sermon? "Like it," said Mr. Heard, "why, sir, I have liked and admired it these twenty years." The doctor stared. "Upon that shelf," added Mr. H. "you will find it verbatim. Mr. Boehm was an excellent preacher."

Told me by Mr. Heard, Oct. 1769.

My friend Heard is a bookseller: and booksellers are, sometimes, dangerous hearers when a preacher deals in borrowed sermons.

My friend, Mr. Thomas Walsb, who died in the year 1759, had been, during his health, a great assserter of free-will and perfection. In his last illness (which was a very long one) I saw him frequently. It was hardly possible for any created being to suffer, on this side eternity, more pain of body, or more dreadful darkness and distress of soul. His bowels literally came away from him by piece-meal. And the Lord did not give him so much as one ray of spiritual comfort, for eight or nine months. He was indeed led through a most tremendous wilderness of horrors. In this awful and disconsolate state (though he had, for many years before, been favoured with assurance of interest in Christ) he continued until about half a minute before his death. All was darkness, even darkness that might be felt. "I now feel," said he, "the truth of our Lord's words, without me ye can do nothing." But just before he expired the Holy Ghost shined in upon his soul. His last words were, "He is come, he is come, he is come! My beloved is mine, and I am his."

There is a remarkable fish, called the torpedo, which the moment it touches the bait communicates such a numbness to the fisherman's arm who holds the rod, that he has hardly any command of it.—What the torpedo is to the fisher, that the world is to a child of God.

I have read of a great commander who, being extremely tormented with thirst, sold himself and his army into the enemies' hands for a draught of cold water : which when he had drunk, he repented, and said, "O quantum ob quantillum !" i. e. "How very little is that for which I have parted with so very much !"

Believers may adopt the same words, though in a far different sense : "Oh, how much grace and happiness have I got, by a little thirsting, a little trusting in Jesus Christ !"

Mr. Chastanier was some years ago in great temporal difficulties and distresses. One night, falling a sleep with a heavy heart, he dreamt that he was walking over a very rough country, exceedingly fatigued. At last his progress was stopped by a wide river whose waves were agitated by a violent storm. Pass over it he must ; but how he knew not. After walking up and down the side of the boisterous stream, in hope of being able to find a fordable place, he at last discovered a very old and battered boat, with a grave man sitting in it, who said to him, "Young man, you are in great distress about passing this river : step into this boat, and I will engage to convey you safely over." In he accordingly went. The stream immediately grew smooth and placid, and they got soon and safe to the other side. On quitting the boat he thought he turned and looked very earnestly on the person that had done him this kindness ; and it struck him that it must be Christ. "Lord," said he, "is it thou ?"—"Yes," answered his friend, "it is I : and be of good cheer, for I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."—On waking it was so impressed upon his mind that the boat was emblematic of his faith ; which, for a considerable time before, had been very weak and battered indeed.—Soon after, Divine Providence gave a prosperous turn to his affairs.

Told me, by Mr. Chastanier himself, at London this day, May 11, 1776.

The famous Dr. Manton was appointed, on some public occasion, to preach before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London. His sermon was learned, ingenious, and eloquent. As he was returning home, a plain old gentleman pulled him by the coat, and desired to speak with him. The doctor stopt, and the stranger began : "I was one of your auditory to-day : I went to be fed with the gospel as usual ; but have returned empty. Dr. Manton was not Dr. Manton this morning. There was indeed much of the doctor, of the florid and learned man, in the discourse ; but little or nothing of Jesus Christ : it was, in short, no sermon to me."—"Sir," answered the doctor, "if I have not preached to you, you have now preached a good sermon to me : such as, I trust, I shall never forget, but be the better for as long as I live."

Told me by Dr. Gifford, Oct. 21, 1769.

During the Auto-de-Fé's at Lisbon, the priests, who attended, used to chaunt a number of psalms, which occasioned the following remark of Voltaire, in the character of a Jew ; "These pretended Christians add to their hardship of our persecution, by singing our own psalms while they are burning us to death."—May not the observation be accommodated to those base professors, or rather, disgracers, of the Christian name, who confess Christ with their mouths, and, as far as in them lies, put him to open shame in their practice ?

Mr. Northcote's uncle served, as an officer under king William, at the battle of Landen, in 1693 ; when the English and Confederates, being overpowered by numbers, were forced to retreat : at which time, my friend's gallant kinsman above-mentioned, forded the river (the river Geet, if I mistake not) with his bible in one hand, and his drawn sword in the other.—In much such a manner do the faithful ministers of God pass through life.

Told me, by Mr. Northcote, at Broad Hembury, August 17, 1770.

Zeuxis painted some grapes in so natural a manner that the birds flew to the picture, and pecked at the fruit. What are the pleasures of sin, but painted grapes, which, beheld through the delusive medium of Satan's colouring, appear to be real, while, in fact, they are empty and void and waste ?

Lady Huntingdon, being once at Tunbridge, asked a poor man's daughter, "whether she took any thought for her soul ?" The young woman answered, "I never knew that I had a soul." "Bid your mother call on me to-day," replied the countess. When the old woman came, my lady said to her, "How is it that your daughter is sixteen years of age, and does not know that she has a soul ?" The woman answered, "In troth, my lady, I have so much care upon me, to find my daughter in food and clothes for her body, that I have no time to talk to her about her soul."

Told me, by Lady Huntingdon, at Norwich, April 5, 1776.

To the above instance, I add two others, which occurred to me myself ; and both at Blagdon, in Somersetshire, which was my first curacy. Old farmer Vouls once said to me, "Sir, you preach about faith, and say a great deal concerning it: pray, what is faith?" I answered, "What is your idea of it?" He replied, "I suppose it to be the ten commandments."

Old Mr. Robert Clarke, on my mentioning to him (in his last sickness) the necessity of the Holy Ghost's influence, answered, "I suppose, sir, that the Holy Ghost was a good man who lived a great while ago."

When Dr. Gill first wrote against Dr. Abraham Taylor, some friends of the latter called on the former, and dissuaded him from going on; urging, among other things, that Gill would lose the esteem, and of course, the subscriptions, of some wealthy persons who were Taylor's friends. "Do not tell me of losing," said Gill; "I value nothing in comparison of gospel-truths. I am not afraid to be poor."

Told me by Mr. Ryland.

King Darius (in a message to Alexander the Great) is said to have styled himself "brother to the sun and moon, and partner with the stars." Yet were these swelling words of vanity downright humility, when compared with the spiritual madness and pride of those who, trusting in their own righteousness, set themselves up for partners and coadjutors with the Son of God in the business of justification.

Lady Huntingdon once asking another lady, in Leicestershire, "Whether she knew who it was that redeemed her?" received for answer, "Yes, madam, I know very well who it was that redeemed me: it was Pontius Pilate."

Told me by Lady Huntingdon, at Norwich, April 5, 1776.

MR. CHRISTOPHER LOVE'S PRO- PHECY.

[Communicated to me at London, this day, Dec. 23, 1775, by Dr. Gifford.]

* * * How far the predictions are just I cannot take upon me to say; but I insert them here, on account of their being very remarkable, and the production of so sensible and devout a man as Mr. Love.

"A short work of the Lord's in the latter age of the world. Great earthquakes, and commotions by sea and land, shall be in the year 1779.

"Great wars in Germany and America, 1780.

"The destruction of Popery, or Babylon's fall, in 1790.

"God will be known by many, in 1795. This will produce a great man.

"The stars will wander, and the moon turn as blood, in 1800. Africa, Asia, and America, will tremble in 1803.

"A great earthquake over the whole world, in 1805.

"God will be universally known by all. Then general reformation, and peace for ever. The people shall learn war no more. Happy is the man that liveth to see this day.

Omnia penes Deum.

OMENS,

Or, at least, incidents which carry that appearance, are not always regardable. The gallant Epaminondas, a little before the battle of Leuctra, on being told that several inauspicious omens seemed to portend bad success nobly answered, in a celebrated verse of Homer, 'Εγὼ οὐνοῦ ἀριστὸς ἀρνέσθαι περὶ πατρὸς: i. e. The best omen we can have is to fight manfully for our country. When William the Norman, commonly termed William the Conqueror, was landing on the Sussex coast, his foot slipped, and he fell to the ground. One of his soldiers gave the incident a very courtly turn, by crying out with a loud voice, "Joy to you, sir! you have already taken possession of England." A short time after, when the same prince was arming himself for the battle of Hastings, he perceived that, in his hurry, he had put on his coat of mail the lower side uppermost: but, instead of shewing any symptoms of superstitious discouragement, he cheerfully said to his attendants, "By this I prognosticate that my dukedom is turned into a kingdom. Julius Cæsar (if I rightly remember the person) is reported to have fallen, in landing on the shore of Africa: and, lest his followers should be disheartened by so unfavourable a beginning, he turned it off with saying, "thus, Africa, do I embrace thee." When our King William III., while Prince of Orange, sailed the first time with a large Dutch fleet, to restore the church and the civil constitution of England to a state of safety and vigour, the commencement of that important expedition was accompanied by some very unpromising circumstances. A violent storm arose, which dissipated the whole fleet, and drove the shattered ships into various harbours. William, though by no means exempt from superstitious feelings, yet was not disanimated by this disaster. The dispersed vessels were re-collected, and refitted. He ventured to sea again. Scarce had he made the coast of Devonshire when a contrary wind put his firmness once more to the trial. A council was held, and several expedients were proposed. It was even deliberated whether it might not be prudent to steer back for Holland. But flexibile

principium melior fortuna secuta est. In the very crisis, that God, whom every element obeys, commanded the wind to shift; and a sudden unexpected gale from the south wafted the fleet, with all its precious freight, into Torbay. On this occasion, well might William (p) ask the Arminian Dr. Burnet (afterwards bishop of Salisbury), "Will you not now believe the doctrine of predestination?"

But though it be true that all omens are not worthy of observation, and though they should never be so regarded as to shock our fortitude, or diminish our confidence in God; still they are not to be constantly despised. Small incidents have sometimes been pre-lusive to great events; nor is there any superstition in noticing these apparent prognostications; though there may be much superstition in being either too indiscriminately, or too deeply, swayed by them.

A most singular chain of uncommon circumstances preceded the assassination of that excellent monarch, Hen. IV. of France. In the morning of the day on which he was murdered by Ravailiac (viz. Friday, May 14, 1610), his majesty was exceedingly pensive. In hope of composing his spirits, he threw himself on his bed, but was unable to rest. Thrice he rose; and thrice he fell on his knees in prayer. Soon after, repairing to the presence chamber, his attendants endeavoured to divert the melancholy which preyed so deeply on his mind. Being naturally amiable and cheerful, he tried to fall in with the well-meant pleasantries of his nobles, and attempted to smile; but concluded thus: "We have laughed enough for Friday; there will be weeping on Sunday."

His queen (Mary Medicis), had been crowned but the day before his murder. One La Brosse, a physician, is by some reported to have said to the Duke de Vendome, on the evening of that day, "If the king survives a mischief which threatens him at present, he will live these thirty years." The duke intreated the king to grant this physician an audience; and repeated what the old gentleman had been saying. His majesty with unusual asperity and hastiness replied, "He is an old fool for telling you such things; and you are a young fool if you believe him." The duke's rejoinder was firm, respectful, and sensible: "Sire, one ought not to believe such things, but one may fear them (q)." The same day, as the king and queen were walking through an apartment of the palace, the king stopped to speak with somebody present. The queen stopping at the same time, he said to her, as by a spirit of involuntary prophecy, Passes, passez, madame la regente, i. e., "Go on, go on, madam the regent."

A few nights before the catastrophe, the queen dreamed that all the jewels in her crown were changed into pearls; and that she was told pearls were significative of tears. Another night, she started and cried out in her sleep, and waked the king: who asking her what was the matter? she answered, "I have had a frightful dream; but I know that dreams are mere illusions." "I was always of the same opinion," replied Henry, "however, tell me what your dream was." "I dreamed," continued she, "that you were stabbed with a knife under the short ribs." "Thank God," rejoined the king, "it was but a dream."

I have already noted that, on the morning of the fatal day, his majesty was unusually chagrined; and he said more than once, to those about him, "Something or other hangs very heavy on my heart." Before he went to his coach, he took leave of the queen no fewer than three times; and then stepping into his carriage, had not passed through many streets, ere Ravailiac gave him that fatal stab which deprived France of one of the most generous and humane sovereigns she ever had.

When Charles I. of England opened the civil war, by erecting his standard on Nottingham castle, it was soon blown down by a high wind; and the weather continued so boisterous that the standard could not be refixed for several days. Some years after, while the same calamitous prince was taking his trial before what was called the High Court of Justice, the silver head fell off from his cane; nor did the head of its owner remain many days longer upon his shoulders.

At the coronation of James II. the crown, not having been properly fitted to his head, was several times likely to have fallen off; which occasioned Mr. Henry Sidney (afterwards Earl of Romney), who was standing near the coronation chair, and who once prevented the crown from slipping, to remind the king, facetiously, "Sir, this is not the first time the Sidney family has supported the crown." On the same day, as James was walking under the canopy of state, it broke; and the royal arms, which occupied part of a painted window in one of

(q) It is proper to apprise the reader that Bayle has endeavoured to shake the credit of this whole story about La Brosse and the Duke of Vendome. But I am still inclinable, for reasons too numerous to mention here, to question the decisiveness of the evidence he alleges. See his 3d volume, under the article of Henry IV.

the London churches, fell to the pavement (without any visible cause, and the rest of the window standing entire), and were dashed in pieces.

The Prince of Orange having landed in the west, James repaired to Salisbury, in order to review a part of the army on which he so vainly depended. Shortly after his arrival in that city, he was seized with a sudden bleeding at the nose; and a stone crown, which almost terminated the spire of the cathedral, was blown down by a sudden storm. The next day, when the review began, he was seized with a more violent bleeding of the nose than before; and it was not a little happy for this endangered nation, that a few spoonfull of blood, spouting from the royal nostrils, were the only blood which the accomplishment of the ensuing revolution cost.

Let the reader observe, that I nakedly relate the above facts, without wishing to build any theory upon them, or to deduce from them any superstitious inferences.—It is, however, my own private opinion that absolutely to cashier all omens, without distinction or exception, would be to fly in the face of ancient and modern wisdom, as well as of ancient and modern history.

When Paulus Æmilius was appointed to the command of the forces designed against Persius, king of Macedon, the former, seeing his little daughter Tertia in tears, inquired the reason of her distress. The child, throwing her arms round his neck, answered, “that she was crying for the death of Persius;” which was the name of her favourite dog, who had just breathed his last. I cannot think that Æmilius discovered any mental weakness, in replying as follows: “An auspicious circumstance, my daughter! I embrace the favourable omen.”

Before the incomparable Timoleon sailed on his glorious expedition to Sicily, he visited the oracle of Delphos, and sacrificed to Apollo. It was customary, at that place, for rich and religious visitants to leave some valuable or elegant donation behind them, which was thenceforward appropriated to decorate the walls or ceiling of the temple. One of the votive presents, which had been thus suspended, and which represented a triumphal wreath, suddenly fell from the place where it was fixed, directly on Timoleon's head. “So that,” (says Plutarch) “Apollo himself seemed to crown the hero for his future triumphs.”

Pyrrhus, the celebrated king of Epirus, had been forewarned, by an oracle, that, “When he should see a wolf and a bull engaged in fight, his death would quickly ensue.” Many years after, he attempted to take the city of Argos by storm, and actually penetrated into the town. Among the consecrated statues which decorated the market-place were the figures, in brass, of a wolf and a bull in combat. The prediction immediately occurred to his mind, and filled him with all the gloom of anxious distress. He took off the regal diadem which adorned his helmet, that his person might not be noticed and exposed by so dangerous a distinction: when, in a few minutes, one of the meaner citizens pierced him in the breast with a spear. The wound being but slight, Pyrrhus turned with redoubled fury on his assailant; whose mother (a very old, and very poor woman), beholding from the top of a house the imminent peril her son was in, made shift, with the help of both hands, to hurl a massy tile on the head of Pyrrhus, who immediately sunk from his horse to the ground, where he was soon completely dispatched by some Argive soldiers that knew him.

The prophecy respecting Pyrrhus, reminds me of a similar one, recorded in our own English history. King Henry IV. had been told that he would finish his days at Jerusalem. He supposed the meaning of this prediction to be, that he was destined of God to emancipate the city of that name from the Turkish dominion, and should terminate his life there, amidst the flattering glories of conquest. But he received the omen of his death much nearer home. While paying his devotions at the shrine of Edward the Confessor, in Westminster Abbey, he was seized with his last illness, and borne thence to the abbot's apartments. On coming to himself, he asked where he was? “In the Jerusalem chamber, sir,” replied his attendants. On which he recollected the intimation given him so long before, and resigned himself to his fate.

Many inauspicious portents ushered in and accompanied the terrible commotions which desolated Rome, under the conflicting interests of Marius and Sylla.

Mithridates, King of Pontus, had been long and remarkably successful in his efforts to stem the torrent of the Roman power. Being at Pergamus, the inhabitants of that city, desirous to pay him a very elegant compliment, contrived that a statue of victory, holding a triumphal crown in its hand, should (by pulleys) descend over him as he sat, and deposit the crown on his head. Just as the image had almost reached him, it suddenly burst asunder into several pieces! and the crown falling likewise to the ground, strewed the area with its fragments. From that period, Mithridates' affairs began to decline: though they had, until then, been signally flourishing and prosperous.

For my own part, I cannot smile at the prodigies and omens which are affirmed to have preceded the assassination of Julius Cæsar: nor even at the crows that fluttered at the outside of Cicero's chamber window (and one of which birds found its way into the room, and proved extremely troublesome), on the morning of the day in which he was murdered by Marc Anthony's soldiers.

Crassus's invasion of the Parthians (an invasion, the sole motives to which were lust of money and lust of power) was attended by various unfavourable symptoms, strongly pre-noting the loss of glory which should result to Rome, from that ill-concerted, unjust, and calamitous expedition. Two thunderbolts fell on the place which had been marked out for the army's encampment. A horse of Crassus's, sumptuously caparisoned, broke with sudden violence from the man who was holding him, and, plunging into the Euphrates, was no more seen or heard of. Part of a bridge which Crassus had thrown across that river was broke down by a storm: on which occasion he was so unguarded as to tell his troops that the loss of the bridge was no misfortune, for not one of them should go back again that way. This speech was deemed ominous by the army; and Crassus was advised, but in vain, to compose their apprehensions, by explaining himself in a favourable sense. At one of the last sacrifices, the priest, according to custom, offering the entrails of the victim to the general, he took them, and they fell from his hand: This comes, said he, laughingly, of my being an old man! but I will take care to grasp my sword sufficiently fast. On the morning of the day of battle, he appeared, not habited in scarlet, as was usual with the Roman generals, but (through inadvertency) in black. And it proved to him the blackest day he had ever seen: for it ended in the total ruin of the most rapacious and unprincipled man that then disgraced the Roman name.

Mr. Collins, in his "Peerage of England," relates, (r) concerning an Irish nobleman (an ancestor of the Kildare family), that being concerned in reasonable practices against king Henry VIII., himself and five of his sons were sent prisoners to England. The young gentlemen, in the course of their passage hither, enquired the name of the ship: and, on being informed that it was called the Cow, expressed a dread of the consequence; a prediction having formerly been current that when five sons of a certain earl should sail to England in a cow's belly, none of them would return. How far so vague a prophecy was worthy of credit, I will not venture to decide: but that it was followed by a corresponding result is undeniable; for the unhappy brothers were all executed at Tyburn, February 2, 1535-6

After Alexander the Great had made himself master of Sardis, he was undetermined for a while, whether he should push, or delay, his designed attack upon Darius. During this state of suspense, a stream suddenly overflowed its banks, without any apparent cause: and the water having receded to its channel, left behind it, on the ground, a plate of copper, engraved with very old characters, importing that a period would ensue when Persia should be overthrown by Grecians.—I only mention this as a remarkable circumstance: for I have my doubts as to (what is commonly called) the accidentality of it. It might be an artifice of Alexander's own contrivance, to keep up the spirits of his men, and to inspire them with an expectation of certain victory.

On the whole: what a very celebrated and no less ingenious (*) traveller remarks, concerning omens in general, fully speaks my humble sentiments of that subject. "I know not what to say. This I know, that many rash and ignorant people disregard and laugh at these things; and that men of great wisdom and learning speak of them with diffidence, and strive rather to encourage others to slight them than shew any real contempt of them themselves."

EXTRAORDINARY DREAMS.

THOUGH it be true, that in a multitude [or major part] of dreams, there are diverse vanities, Eccles. v. 7; though it be likewise acknowledged, that whoso regardeth [ὁ περὶ αὐτῶν, he that leaneth, or layeth great stress, upon] dreams in general, is like him that catcheth at a shadow, and followeth after the wind, Eccles. xxxiv. 2; forasmuch as dreams have deceived many, and they have failed that put their trust in them; yet, the same wise writer from whom the two last passages are quoted, guards his remarks by the following caveat (v. 9): Set not thy heart upon them [i. e. upon dreams], if they be not sent from the Most High in thy visitation. And we have it from an incomparably superior authority, that, in a dream, in a vision, when deep sleep falleth upon man, in slumberings upon the bed; then God openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction: Job xxxiii. 15, 16.

Examples of supernatural dreams occur so frequently in the sacred volume that no man can explode all dreams as vain, without exploding the Bible at the same time. God came to Abimelech in a dream: Genesis xx. 3.—The angel of God spake to Jacob, in a dream: Genesis xxxi. 11.—Very remarkable was Jacob's dream at Bethel: Gen. xxviii.—Joseph's two dreams were evidently prophetic: Gen. xxxvii.—So were those of king Pharaoh: Gen. xli.—And of the Jewish soldier: Josh. vii. 13.—When God took away the spirit of prophecy from Saul, it is said, that the Lord answered him not by dreams: 1 Sam. xxxviii. 6.—At Gibeon, the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream by night: 1 Kings iii. 5.—Nebuchadnezzar's predictive dreams were, undeniably, from God: Dan. ii. and iv.—As was Daniel's, concerning the four universal monarchies: Dan. vii.

Your old men shall dream dreams, is a promise belonging to gospel-times: Joel ii. 28. And it began to have its accomplishment in Joseph, the espoused and nominal husband of the Virgin Mary. It was in a dream that the angel of the Lord appeared to this holy man, and forbade him to suspect the purity of his unsullied bride. In the same dream it was revealed to Joseph that he should give to the Messiah the name of Jesus, because that blessed person was to save his people from their sins, Matt. i.—A short time after, Joseph was warned by an angel, in a dream, to flee with Jesus and Mary into Egypt: and, in the same manner, he received notice of Herod's death, and was commanded to return to Judea, Matt. ii.—Nor can it be doubted that the dream of Pontius Pilate's wife was from above: Matt. xxvii.

With regard to the cause of dreams, one of the most able and most rational (t) philosophers, whom the present age, or any nation has produced, demonstrates, absolutely demonstrates, that dreams, even all dreams whatever, proceed, and can proceed only, from the agency of unembodied spirits on the human mind. Strange as this theory may at first seem, the great author solidly proves his point, and solves (unanswerably in my opinion) every objection that is, or that perhaps ever can be, alleged to the contrary. To him I refer the speculative reader: and shall conclude the present article with several very observable, but very authentic, instances of extraordinary and significant dreams.

Alciades, a little before his assassination, dreamed, (u) that an event of that kind had taken place. The ultimate ruin of Pompey was (x) pre-discovered to Petitiu in a dream.

About 332 years before Christ, Jaddua, the high priest of the Jews, refused to take the required oath of allegiance to Alexander the Great, who was then besieging Tyre. Alexander had no sooner made himself master of that city, than he bent his course towards Jerusalem: with full determination, to destroy both place, priest, and people; and to enrich his forces, by the free plunder of the Jewish capital. Jaddua, on receiving notice of this design, was in great perplexity. He appointed a day of public and solemn humiliation before God: and was, that same night, relieved from his anxiety, by the following dream. He thought that "the Almighty exhorted him to dismiss his fears; to adorn the city, as on festive occasions; to set open the gates; and when Alexander drew near, to give him the meeting, at the head of an ecclesiastical procession, robed in their sacerdotal habits." The next morning Jaddua publicly declared his dream; regulated his measures agreeably to the suggestions he had received; and placidly waited the event.

So soon as Alexander came within sight of Jerusalem, the procession from the city began to move. The high priest took the lead, superbly arrayed in scarlet and purple, and wearing the mitre which bore the name of God engraved on a plate of gold. Next him followed the inferior priests, habited in fine linen. A multitude of citizens, clothed in white, closed the rear. When the venerable train came up, Alexander commanded his own soldiers to halt: and, advancing foremost and alone, respectfully accosted Jaddua, and adored the incomprehensible name with which his mitre was adorned. The Jews uttered their salutations in shouts; and the hostile army stood astonished at the unexpected beha-

It is astonishing, that so great a man should have lived and died in such obscurity: and that (so far as I can find) not the least memoir of him has hitherto been published. What a disgrace to this generation! a generation that prides itself on its love of science, and on the respect it pays to elevated merit!—Even bishop Warburton acknowledges the surprizing excellence of this extraordinary person; on whom the right reverend critic bestows the following just encomium: "He was truly a great genius. And a time will come, if learning ever revive amongst us, when the present inattention to his admirable Metaphysics, established on the physics of Newton, will be deemed as great a dishonour to the wisdom of this age, as the neglect of Milton's poetry is to the wit of the past." viour of their prince. Parmenio, who was Alexander's particular friend and favourite, could not help expressing his surprise; and ventured to ask him, How is it, that you, who are worshipped by all mankind, are now become a worshipper of the Jewish pontiff?—"I worship not the high priest," returned the king, "but the God whose name he bears. When I was at Dios, in Macedon, concerting the plan I should pursue in order to subject Asia to my dominion, I saw, in a dream, this very person, habited exactly as he now stands, who exhorted me to undertake the expedition without delay, and promised me infallible success. I now am certain that, under the divine patronage, I shall subdue Darius and be master of Persia." (y)

Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, was martyred for the Christian faith, A. D. 167. Three days before he was apprehended by the heathen officers, he (z) dreamt, that "his pillow took fire, and was burnt to ashes." The holy man told his friends that he considered this dream as significative of his being burnt to death for Christ's sake. And the event was answerable to the pre-sage.

Thomas Bradwardin, archbishop of Canterbury, who went to heaven, A. D. 1349, was author of that admirable treatise, written against the Pelagians, and most justly entitled, "De-Causâ Dei." As a masterpiece of invincible reasoning, and as a treasury of evangelical doctrine, it is equal to any performance of St. Austin's: nor can I refer the learned reader to a more suitable book (next after the holy Scriptures), if he wish to see the very sinews of Pelagianism, and of modern Arminianism, totally and irrecoverably demolished.

This admirable prelate acquaints us, in his preface to that immortal work, that he was encouraged to undertake it by a very singular dream. I had long lamented (says he) the atrocious errors of Pelagius, and the general infection occasioned by the extensive spread of the free-will heresy. One night, after having spent some considerable time in weeping and supplication before God, beseeching him, for his glory's sake, to arise and maintain his own cause; I at last fell asleep, and dreamed as follows: "Videbar nempe mihi videre, diurno lumine circumfuso, me multum supra terram in aëre sublevatum, sicque ab oriente versum partes occiduas ascendendo intrepidum proficisci: quoddam Pelagius veniens ex adverso, apprehensâ sinistrâ meâ, conser-tisque digitis, totâ me violentiâ ad terram detrapere conabatur. Cui et, proprii roboris accinctus fiducia, plurimum reluc-

"tabar: talisque lucta, non mediocriter
 "anxia, diutius perduravit. Sed et Pelagius
 "continuò prævalente, et me pænè ad
 "infima detrahente, ipse in meipso respon-
 "sum desperationis accepi; totâ tamen
 "virtute renitens, ad divinum confugi auxi-
 "lium toto corde: statimque Pelagius,
 "solutâ manu, præcepis detruditur, et
 "fractâ cervice corrui super terram, clau-
 "sisque oculis mortuus jacuit resupinus.
 "Ego autem super terram remansi, in aëre
 "ascendens et progrediens, sicut ante,
 "gratulando jucundus, et mirando. Hinc
 "ergo, spiritu fortitudinis confortatus, spem
 "hausi, quòd de superbo Pelagio, principe
 "Pelagianorum pestifero, quare et de uni-
 "verso ejus exercitu, Christi parvulus trium-
 "pharem." i. e. I imagined myself to be ascending, high and fast, through the air, from east to west, in broad day-light, and without being in the least afraid. Pelagius, methought, met me in a hostile manner; and, laying hold of my left hand, implicated his fingers strongly with mine, and strove with all his might to check my ascent, and to drag me down again towards the earth. Confident in my own imaginary strength, I resisted and opposed him to the utmost; and the conflict was warmly continued for some time. But Pelagius seemed to be getting the better, and to be pulling me more and more downward. Then it was that I began to despair of my own strength, and cried with my whole heart to God for succour; taking care, however, still to resist the enemy with all the force I could exert. Immediately, I thought, the tables began to turn: and Pelagius, unclenching his grasp of my hand, fell headlong to the earth, and there lay, a breathless corpse, with his neck broken and his eyes closed. I still seemed to remain above the earth, mounting and advancing as before, but with additional wonder and rejoicing.—From the tenor of this dream, I conceived some hope, that I, though a mere infant in Christ, might be enabled to triumph over the insolent Pelagius, that pestilent ring-leader of the sect which bears his name; and over his whole army of followers and adherents.

I will take upon me to say, that Bradwardin was not mistaken as to his interpretation of this dream. Pelagianism has indeed lain extended on the ground, a breathless corpse, with closed eye-lids and a broken neck, ever since the publication of the great and good archbishop's volume. Arminians worship a demolished dagon, which all their zeal and efforts will never be able to quicken, or set up again on its legs; seek they to collect the shattered pieces ever so carefully, and to put them together ever so artfully.

SKETCH OF NATURAL HISTORY.

BIRDS.

THERE are two kinds of birds which I shall consider: viz. birds of retreat, and birds of passage. The former pass the winter in their chambers (if I may use the expression); i. e. in sleep and retirement. The latter migrate, at stated seasons, from one climate to another.

1. Of the first sort are bats (if they may be classed with birds), swallows, and (as is generally believed) the cuckoo.

The bat, as every body knows, is a very ugly animal, and holds a kind of middle rank between bird and beast. As it seems to subsist on what nocturnal insects it can meet with, and as this supply can only be had during the warmer months, Providence has wisely and kindly ordained that sleep shall answer, to this creature, every purpose of food, until the return of summer supersedes the famine occasioned by the long absence of the sun.

In men, that fine chemical process of nature, which we term perspiration, is twice as great during the hours of sleep as when we are awake. But in those of the lower animals, who are to sleep for whole months successively, and who would literally starve but for that succedaneum, perspiration either totally ceases, during the period of rest; or is so extremely trivial, as to occasion no sensible waste of spirits, nor diminution of parts.

2. Swallows, likewise, live on insects, which they catch flying: and when their summer repast fails, betake themselves, in October, to holes and shelves, under the banks of rivers, &c. where they very comfortably sleep away the winter; and, with a more than philosophic insensibility, bid absolute defiance to their poverty, by quite forgetting it. Nor are they at all incommodated, much less injured, by the coldness and the dampness of their situation. The unctuous matter which transudes from the various pores of their feathers preserves their delicate skins from any hurtful access of water: and a sufficient circulation of the blood is kept up within, to maintain life, and counteract the cold, until the breath of April again awakens them to the businesses and pleasures of perceptive existence. Until this little resurrection takes place, the manner in which they arrange themselves is said to be very curious. They lie, clustered together, in great numbers: their beaks and claws locked and interlinked with those of one another.—No improper emblem of the strict unity, and friendship, which ever ought to obtain among God's people; but especially when under afflictive circumstances!—A humble type, moreover, of the universal harmony which never fails to reign among the elect, when death has extinguished the petty animosities which, too often, divided them below. Swallows, which perhaps, amidst the hurries and the self-regards of active life, might quarrel for a gnat, or chatter and peck at each other for a bit of straw, bid adieu to their differences when the time of retiring comes: and, during the whole of their quiescent state, sleep in the social embraces of each other.—Neither let us despair of divine assistance and deliverance, even when pressed by the severest weight of tribulation. He that supports the swallows during their winter recess, and renews their strength, and calls them forth, at the return of spring, will not forsake the people of his love and the purchase of his blood.—Moreover, he that raises the swallows from their temporary graves will much more quicken the mortal bodies of his saints, when he descends in person to call his sons and daughters from the ends of the earth. Therefore, O believer, lay down thy flesh with joy, at the call of God; and let it rest in hope, until thy Saviour comes, and the archangel's trumpet sounds.

3. The cuckoo, once thought to be a bird of passage, is now, by general acknowledgment, numbered among those of retreat.

Here, in England, it salutes us, commonly, in April; and bids us good night, in June: so that this hasty visitant obliges us with very little of its company. Having dispatched the short business of its waking hours, it again betakes itself to rest; and enjoys a long nap of about nine months.—Emblem of the sluggard, who, instead of redeeming, sleeps away his time!—And in respect of its unvaried sameness of note, no unstriking counter-part of lazy preachers who deliver one discourse, and of talkative people in general, who often repeat the same things over and over again.

II. Birds of passage are many; whose map is nature, and Providence their pilot.

METEORS.

as the stork (though it never visits our island), the crane, the quail, the woodcock. To which some add the nightingale, the fieldfare, and the martin.

The quail comes to see us in April: the woodcock about October. Nobody need be told that we treat those beauteous travellers very inhospitably. And yet enough of them survive the sportsman's havoc to return to the far countries whence they came, and to preserve their species from extinction; that notwithstanding our ill usage of them, they may continue to favour us with their company again. — Learn from the amiable conduct of these gentle preachers to be patient under affliction; to be meek under every provocation; to be kind, even to the ungrateful; and to overcome evil with good.

The excellent Mr. Derham takes notice of two striking particulars, for which the conduct of migrating birds is remarkable: 1. That these creatures "should know the proper times for their passage. And, 2. That they should know so exactly how and which way to steer their course." To which we may add the wonderful unanimity with which they assemble, and concert matters for their intended expeditions; the neat and regular order into which they dispose themselves like a regiment of foot, or a squadron of horse, where each individual knows his place and keeps to it; and the prudent secrecy with which they set off, or rather steal their march, viz., in the night-time, when they are in the least danger of annoyance. Doubtless the pretty itinerants have a common language which they understand; a president of their council, who takes the lead in deliberative affairs; and a general, who, by mutual consent, heads each of the excursive legions, and superintends their flight for the good of the whole.

Admirable are the works of the Creator! In wisdom has he made them all. The earth is full of his riches. Through him the stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed time; and the turtle, and the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming. Jer. viii. 7. May our attendance on every means of grace, and our attention to the regular discharge of every moral duty, be equally punctual and exact!—Let us, in the strength of the Holy Spirit, set out in affection from earth to heaven, from self-righteousness to Christ, and from sin to holiness; like birds of passage, when they shift their clime. So at death shall we pass, like them, to a better country, whence we shall never wish to return; and fly not on the wings of eagles, but on the wings of angels, to Jesus the mediator of the covenant, and to the company of elect souls made perfect: there to be for ever with the Lord, and with each other.

LEAVING the birds of retreat to enjoy their peaceful slumbers; and congratulating the birds of passage, on their safe arrival in milder climes; we will turn our meditations to that elegant and useful meteor, whose fleeces now decorate the leafless branches, and whiten the face of the ground.

The whole world of nature, no less than those of grace and of glory, is under the absolute dominion and the never-ceasing direction of God. Every wind that blows, is of his breathing; and every drop, whether fluid or condensed, that falls from the sky, is of his sending. At this very time, must the adoring nations confess that he giveth snow like wool; he scattereth the hoar frost like ashes; he casteth forth his ice, like morsels: who can stand before his cold? Psalm cxlvii. 16, 17. He saith to the snow, be thou on the earth: likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength. Job xxxvii. 6.

Let the same question be put to my readers, which speaking Omnipotence once put to Job (chap. xxxviii. 22.) "Hast thou entered into the treasures of snow?" Hast thou considered its nature, its properties, and its uses?

Dew, mist, rain, snow, hail, and clouds, are no more than coalitions of watery vapours, which have been partly forced towards the surface of our terraqueous globe by the latent fires with which its bowels are fraught; and partly drawn up from it, by the insinuating, attractive agency of the sun. The humid particles thus exhaled, naturally ascend; as being, in their uncombined state, lighter than the surrounding air; and persist to soar, until they arrive at a region of the atmosphere, where their flight is stopped by other preceding vapours, already exhaled and condensed into clouds. Thus arrested and detained, they unite (like coalescing spherules of quicksilver, or like the contacting globules of water in a containing vessel) into floating masses; and remain in a state of literal suspense and fluctuation until, by accumulated compression, and by their own collected weight, they become specifically heavier than the sustaining air, and fall in larger or smaller drops to the earth and ocean whence they sprung. Striking representation of man, in his best estate of mortal excellence! Are you rich, or exalted, or prosperous, or gay? remember that you are under as absolute obligation to Providence for these glittering distinctions as a rising vapour is indebted, for its transitory elevation, to the action of the solar beams. And, vapour-like, you too must fall, after having hovered your few destined moments: for, Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. An inspired pen has both started and resolved the question: what is your life? It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. James iv. 14. If so,

Why all this toil, for triumphs of an hour?
What though we wade in wealth, or soar in fame!
Earth's highest glory ends in "here he lies!"
And "dust to dust" concludes her noblest song.

Be wise, therefore, to slip the cable of your affections from the world's evanid shore. Supplicate the Holy Spirit to make you rich towards God. And, under the sweet breezes of his gracious influence, set sail in good earnest for the kingdom of heaven.

When the watery treasures of the sky descend to their native earth, more like respectful visitants than like rude invaders, i. e., in moderate quantities, and with not too impetuous force, we call them showers. When they greatly exceed in those two particulars, we give them the hostile name of storms. Thus the human passions, if rectified and regulated by supernatural grace, are instruments of happiness, and productive of the most beneficial effects. But, if unrestrained by Providence, and unrefined by the Holy Ghost, they operate like the deadly Egyptian tempest, which smote both man and beast, and destroyed every herb, and brake all the trees of the field. Exodus ix. 25.

While the middle regions of the air are impregnated with frost, the falling drops catch cold (if the expression may be allowed), and are congealed in the course of their descent. Hail and snow are but other names for different modifications of frozen rain. Hail is rain consolidated into a hard and heavy mass. Snow is a multitude of small, hooked icicles, which interfering with each other in their fall, become mutually entangled and interlinked, and cohere in delicate but irregular flakes, of very light, because of very expansive, and superficial texture. If snow is no more than particles of water congealed in their passage to the earth, it affords but too just an emblem of our affections, when, instead of aspiring to God in Christ, they subside and gravitate towards a perishable world. Under such spiritual declension, our comforts are chilled, and our graces benumbed; until a fresh rising of the sun of righteousness upon our souls dissolves the moral frost, and again warms us into the meltings of penitential love. His beams strike upon the rock, and then the waters flow.

SAGACITY OF BRUTES

I have often wondered that no ingenious observant has hitherto (so far, at least, as I can find,) favoured the world with a professed treatise on the sagacity of brutes.

Many curious and remarkable instances are, indeed, occasionally interspersed through the writings of various naturalists. But I could wish to see the rays collected to a point: and should be happy if the hint, now suggested, might set some competent hand in motion, to supply the lovers of Nature with so amusing and instructive a desideratum.

My own reading, I honestly confess, is too scanty to administer any very significant quota towards such a stock of valuable entertainment. I will however present the reader with a few specimens, or scraps of a subject, which an abler and more intelligent pen might easily enlarge into a plentiful and pleasing feast: let us then, briefly advert to some examples of that sagacity, which it has been the Creator's will to distribute, with sufficient, though not with equal, hand, through the different tribes of quadrupeds, birds, fishes, and insects.

I. INSTANCES OF SAGACITY IN BEASTS.

The elephant is supposed to be the largest of any quadruped in the known world: and seems to be the wisest also. The observation is Cicero's; whose words (De Nat. Deo. 1.) are, "Elephanto beluarum nulla providentior. At figurâ quæ vastior?" All the amiable, and all the furious passions are to be found in this animal; and its docility is wonderful; for, when properly tamed, he is capable of being instructed and disciplined into a vast variety of entertaining and useful qualifications.

Do him a material injury, and he will act as if he had been tutored by the late Lord Chesterfield: i. e. if it be in his power, he will immediately revenge the affront; but if restrained for the present, either by motives of prudence, or by inability to wreak his resentment, he will retain the offence in his memory for years together, and take care to repay it with interest, the first favourable opportunity. I have heard or read of a boy, who wantonly struck the proboscis or trunk of an elephant; and then courageously secured himself by running away. Seven years afterwards, the lad was playing near the side of a river; and had probably forgot his past misdemeanour. But the elephant had a better memory; and making up to the young delinquent, grasped him with his trunk, and very sedately carried the sprawling captive to the water, where he ducked him once or twice over head and ears, and then quietly setting him down again on terra firma, permitted him to walk off without further hurt.

It is said that, in those countries where elephants abound, such of them as are tame go about the streets, like any other domestic animal: and it is common for people to give them fruit as they pass. In time, they commence absolute beggars, and will put in the extremity of their trunks at doors and windows, in hope of receiving the little benevolences which custom has inured them to expect. After waiting a short while, if nothing is given them, they withdraw their trunks, and pass on to the next accessible house. It is related that some tailors were at work on a board, withinside of a window, whose casement stood open. A passing elephant stopped, and put in his trunk, one of the men, instead of conferring a doceur, gave the animal's trunk a scratch with his needle. The injured party took no present notice of the provocation, but patiently walked away. He repaired to a neighbouring stream; and having filled his capacious trunk with a large quantity of water, returned to the window, where he coolly avenged himself, by spouting the fluid artillery on the aggressor and his comrades, for their late breach of hospitality. If we do not relieve the indigent, they at least have a right not to be insulted. And very frequently the meanes are able, sooner or later, to retaliate with usury the contempt they undeservedly receive.

Every beggar is not honest. Nor are all elephants actuated by a strict sense of moral delicacy. Their smell is very acute; and if a person has any fruit or cakes about him, they show by the quick and judicious application of their trunks to the proper part of his dress, that they are adepts in the art of picking pockets with excellent dexterity.

Elephants, like men, have (if I may be allowed the expression) their virtues and their vices; though, to the honour of the former be it observed, the vices of an elephant bear but small proportion to his virtues. There have been instances of these creatures who, in the first hurry of rage for ill-treatment, have killed their keepers. But their subsequent remorse has been so insupportably keen that they have refused to take any sustenance, and literally starved themselves to death. A lesson to persons of violent passions; who, if hurried away by the impetuous torrent either of excessive and unguarded anger, or of headstrong and irregular desire, are liable to the commission of irreparable evil, and may in a single moment lay the foundation of irremediable ruin. He that hasteth with his feet sinneth. O believer, if thou art by nature hasty, vehement, and easily inflammable, call in superior aid. He who, in the days of his flesh, rebuked the raging of the winds, and stilled the tossings of the sea, can by the sweet composing influence of his gracious spirit, restrain thee within the bounds of holiness, and speak the storm into a perfect calm. I have read of a heathen who, when he found himself unduly fermented by the kindlings of inward wrath, would never utter a single word until he had first deliberately run over in his mind all the letters of the alphabet. I have read of a Christian who, when endangered by similar temptation, would not suffer himself to speak a syllable until he had silently repeated the Lord's Prayer. Go, and do thou likewise. Repeat that prayer to God in the spirit of supplication; and thy victory over passion will be more than probable.

Elephants are singularly grateful, and have a very deep sense of friendship. They have been known to lay the death of a brother elephant, or of a kind keeper, so much to heart as to pine away from that time forward. Even virtue, if strained beyond a certain pitch, degenerates into a fault. Nor is it right for us to love, with too much ardour, any perishable good. Dr. Owen somewhere remarks, that "strong affections make strong afflictions." Confine, therefore, your absolute regards to Father, Son, and Spirit; the three glorious friends who never die, and whose loving kindness is immortal as themselves.

In some countries, we are told, elephants supply the place of executioners. They are trained, at a given signal, to lay hold on the criminal with their trunks, by a strong suction; and either dash him violently against the ground, or toss him aloft in the air, until repeated contusions put a period to his life. Mankind are very prone to value themselves on their supposed civilization: and yet, by artful practising on the ferocity of inferior animals, they sometimes teach brutes themselves to be still more brutal.

Clumsy as elephants are, they may be taught to dance, both singly and in companies; and they move, on these occasions, with singular exactness and order. They are not insensible to the harmony of music; and if properly inured, keep time with their feet in a manner which discovers great powers of judgment. If I rightly remember, Bishop Burnet informs us in his travels that he saw an elephant play at ball with all the ease and expertness of a man. But Plutarch, in his Life of Pyrrhus, mentions a much nobler instance of elephantine understanding and adroitness, accompanied by such magnanimous courage and fidelity, as would have redounded to the honour of a Sertorius, or of an Alexander. When Pyrrhus stormed the town of Argus, a number of accoutred elephants (according to the custom of those times) formed a part of his military apparatus. One of these creatures, perceiving that his rider was fallen, invited him, by every effort in his power, to remount. But finding, soon after, that he (viz. the rider) was dead of the wounds he had received, the animal, in a transport of grief and rage, rushed furiously on friends and foes, without distinction; and, taking up the body with his trunk, made good his retreat, and rescued the remains of his breathless master from further violation, by faithfully and heroically conveying them from the scene of action.

With all his magnitude and strength, an elephant (if not soured by unkind usage) may be rendered so passive and gentle as to be led and governed by a child. Just representation of that amiable meekness and humility wherewith Christians of exalted rank condescend to men of low estate; and persons eminent for superior grace, or for distinguished learning, bear with the infirmities, and are courteous to the ignorance, of the weak. It was in this spirit that the excellent Dr. Watts descended from the regions of philosophy, and stooped from the heights of more elevated poetry, to compose his admirable hymns for children, and teach infant warblers to lisp the praises of the great Three-One.

The method by which wild elephants are taken deserves to be noticed. A narrow inclosure is made, one end of which is left open for entrance, and at the extremity of the other several tame female elephants are placed. Between both (i. e. between the entrance and the extremity, where the females are fixed) a large pit is dug, whose surface is lined with a slight bridge-work, so neatly turfed that it has all the appearance of firm ground. Allured by the females, the male elephants make towards the place, but are suddenly intercepted by the unsuspected snare. Proper persons, who are stationed to watch the event, start from their concealments, and with exulting shouts mock the indignant distress of their unwieldy prisoners. Striking picture of the deceitfulness of sin, the unthinking folly of heedless minds, and the terrible effects of successful temptation.

Elephants are tamed chiefly by hunger and by blows. Providence hides pride from man, and bends his stubbornness to obedience, by graciously afflictive dispensations.

Elephants are said to be extremely fond of pomp, and to receive very pleasurable ideas from the exhibitions of splendour. Hence the natives of East India, who hold the doctrine of transmigration, imagine that these animals are animated by the souls of departed princes. For this reason they are treated (especially in the kingdom of Siam) with distinguished respect and some of the handsomest are decorated with rich ornaments, and even dignified with titles of honour. An elephant of quality is known by the rings of gold, silver, or copper, with which his tusks are adorned. There is something very humiliating to the pride of human reason in conduct so extravagantly absurd as this. Absolute good nature is absolute folly. And yet the fanciful surmise of the transmigration of souls from one body into another is attended with peculiar felicities to the poor beasts who live in countries where that doctrine obtains. It is our duty to adopt the humanity of those heathens without its absurdities, and to be scrupulously tender of the life and happiness of every inferior animal entrusted to our care; knowing that the sovereign Providence, which has made them subservient to our wants, has given us no charter for the exercise of unnecessary cruelty or wanton tyranny.

Elephants are extremely long-lived. It is affirmed that they will reach to one, two, or even three hundred years of age. If this be fact (and it rests on very respectable testimonies), it is probably true of those elephants only which are permitted to live according to nature, unspoiled by the artificial and false refinements of our management. It will admit of little doubt that, on the sum total, those beasts are happiest who have least connection with man. Not a single brute, from an elephant to an animated speck, but is eventually the worse if it fall within the circuit of human government. Let us endeavour to make our male-administration as easy and as little mischievous to them as we can.

Man is supposed to have been originally indebted for several leading hints, in points of considerable usefulness and importance, to the birds of the air, and to the beasts of the field. Nor is it beneath the dignity of human rank to derive instruction from nature [i. e. from infinite wisdom at second hand], under whatever mode or form her exertions may appear. Unerring authority bids us, on some occasions, learn of insects themselves: Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise.

It seems extremely probable, for instance, that spiders and silk worms gave the primitive housewives a notion of spinning. That birds and fishes suggested the practicability of sailing, in vessels constructed similarly to the shape of those animals. And that the hippopotamus (a) or river-horse (which, when overcharged with too great a quantity of blood, strikes himself against the point of a sharp reed until he has bled sufficiently, and then rolls in a particular kind of mud until the bleeding is stanch'd), supplied the ancients with the original idea of phlebotomy. One of our best (b) cosmographers observes, that the cynocephalus, a species of monkey very common in Africa, is said to have furnished the first hint of dividing the day and night into twenty-four hours; this creature having been observed to make water, with a mechanical exactness, twenty-four times regularly, and at equal intervals, in the course of a day and night, when the sun is in the equinox.

A goat is by no means considered as an animal of bright intellects. And yet some things are related of him which indicate no small share of rationality. Luther's (c) story is well known: who relates that two goats, meeting on a narrow plank over a deep river, it being impossible for them to pass abreast, one of them very prudently couched, that so, the other walking over him, neither of them might be in danger of falling into the stream. A memento to men of precipitate dispositions; who, by a discreet self-restraint, and by well-timed moderation, meekness, and condescension, may prevent much inward and outward evil from accruing to themselves and to the Church of God.

If a goat knows how to conduct himself with prudence when cases of difficulty and danger call for the exercise of that talent, he can also prove himself no contemptible adept in the art of war, when either his own safety, or that of his family and friends, requires him to repel force by force. An instance of this occurs in the narrative of Lord Anson's Voyage; (d) nor can I better express it than in the words of that authentic and well-written performance: premising only that the theatre of the following unsuccessful invasion was the Island of Juan Fernandez, in Spanish West India:—"We once had an opportunity of observing a remarkable dispute betwixt a herd of these animals [i. e. of goats] and a number of dogs. For, going in our boat into the eastern bay, we perceived some dogs running very eagerly upon the foot, and being willing to discover what game they were after, we lay upon our oars some time to view them, and at last saw them take to a hill, where, looking a little further, we observed upon the ridge of it a herd of goats, which seemed drawn up for their reception. There was a very narrow path, skirted on each side by precipices, on which the master of the herd posted himself, fronting the enemy; the rest of the goats being all behind him, where the ground was more open. As this spot was inaccessible by any other path, excepting where this champion had placed himself, the dogs, though they ran up hill with great alacrity, yet, when they came within about twenty yards of him, they found they dared not encounter with him (for he would infallibly have driven them down the precipice), but gave over the chace, and quietly laid themselves down, panting at a great rate." Could any commanding officer on the face of the globe have displayed more military skill in taking all possible advantage of his ground, and more resolute prowess in maintaining it, than this Leonidas of the herd? And, on the other hand, were not the invaders equally judicious in sounding a timely retreat, and in not attempting to storm a fortress which both the nature of the place, and the discreet valour of the defendants, concurred to render impregnable? It is no impeachment of courage, but an argument of superior wisdom, to desist, in due season, from designs that are found to be impracticable.

Plutarch relates, in his Life of Themistocles, that when the Athenians, in order to avoid falling into the hands of Xerxes the First, were forced to quit their city, and embark on board their ships; even the domestic animals were evidently sensible of the public distress. They read calamity and sorrow in the faces and conduct of their masters, though it was impossible for them to understand the cause. The melancholy notes of the fowls, the disconsolate mewing of the cats, and the universal howlings of the dogs, attracted the observation and heightened the grief of the departing inhabitants. It is particularly added, concerning a dog which belonged to Xantippus, the father of Pericles, that no sooner did the vessel in which his master sailed push from shore, than the faithful animal, who had been left behind, plunged himself into the sea, and swam by the side of the ship until he reached the Isle of Salamis, where, quite exhausted with fatigue, he fell down and expired. Fidelity and gratitude are virtues, in whatever rank of beings they appear; and the ancients (to their honour be it said) were famous for setting a just value on the good qualities of brutes. Xantippus's dog received a respectful interment, and his grave communicated its name to the adjoining part of the island, which, so low down as the time of Plutarch (who flourished about six hundred years afterwards), retained the appellation of "the dog's burying-place."

Plutarch, that nice observer of nature, in his entertaining dialogue concerning the different wisdom of aqueous and of land animals, adduces many pertinent examples, strongly tending to corroborate his hypothesis, that an inward intelligent principle of action is by no means the exclusive prerogative of men. I shall here select some of the most striking instances he brings; not marshalling them, according to the exact routine of methodical arrangement, but introducing them (for the most part) just as they occur in the disquisitions of the Greek philosopher; taking the liberty, however, for the sake of connection, and of spiritual or moral improvement, to intersperse a few occasional remarks, obviously suggested by the instances themselves.

1. The cock-pigeon may stand as a pattern to husbands of a far more exalted species. This amiable bird does, in his way, give honour and assistance to his wife, as to the more elegant and more tender vessel. During the session of the hen upon her eggs, he has no objection to alleviating the rigours of her confinement, by kindly brooding on the nest, in her stead, as often as want of exercise or of refreshment inclines her to fly abroad. Nor will he quit his trust until his mate's return, when he recommits the future family to her patient and affectionate care. After the young are hatched, he is very diligent in providing for his household. While the female keeps guard at home, he goes to market, or, if you please, sallies out in search of forage, which he distributes, with much impartiality and discretion, among his hungry offspring. Sometimes the business of seeking provision devolves, by mutual consent, on the hen; in which case, if she happen to tarry out longer than necessity seems to require, the male bird will go in quest of her, and express his displeasure by a significant chattering, and by mildly chastising her with his bill. As much as to say: I know how to temper my tenderness with a few grains of gentle authority. Why are you thus gadding about and carelessly taking your pleasure, when you ought to be thinking on household affairs, and to be collecting a breakfast or dinner for the little folks at home? The female generally takes these conjugal expostulations very patiently; and after softly chattering, for a moment or two, in her own vindication, either pursues the business for which she set out, or flies back to the nest, if her husband choose to take the office of caterer on himself. When they meet a few minutes after, they salute as affectionately as ever, and all their petty differences are forgot.

2. The swallow is an excellent housewife, and has a high sense of cleanliness and decency. Hence, as her modest ambition aspires but to one apartment, which serves er

For chamber, and parlour, and kitchen, and hall, she is very solicitous to preserve it extremely neat and unsullied. She therefore teaches her offspring so to arrange themselves, at certain times, as that every thing indelicate may fall over the outside of the nest, without any annoyance to the purity of the common habitation. The care she takes of her house is the less to be wondered at, when we remember she was at the pains of building it herself. And her skill as an architect is admirable. Aware how much depends on laying a solid foundation, she places the larger and stronger stibble at the bottom of the intended edifice, and disposes the slenderer and slighter materials upon that. The interstices are plastered up with mud, which, when hardened by the air and sun, is quite inoffensive to any of the senses, and answers every purpose of comfortable warmth. If the season proves so dry that ready-prepared mud cannot be obtained, she remedies this inconvenience by dipping the edges of her wings in some adjacent pond or brook, and then shaking off the drops upon the ground, mixes the moistened dust into mortar with her bill, and conveys it to the place of destination. The style or form of the structure is nearly spherical; which figure is, at once, the most capacious and the most durable. And she contrives the entrance with so much judgment as equally to guard against the access of enemies and of cold.

3. If the wisdom and goodness of Providence are so eminent in the endowments of smaller animals, it may be reasonably expected that creatures of larger size, and whose wants are consequently greater, should discover a proportionable extent of acuteness and sagacity. Hence the wild boar will whet his tusks before a combat; and the bull, when going to encounter an adversary, previously throws himself into such an attitude, either of attack or defence, as may give him the best advantage over his antagonist.—The lion seems to be sensible that the track of feet so remarkable as his own would expose him to a double inconvenience: it would serve the huntsman as a clue to his haunts, and put inferior beasts on their guard from coming in his way. The former might be ruinous to his personal safety; the latter would greatly curtail his means of subsistence. To obviate both those difficulties, he sheaths his claws when he walks on a yielding soil, and contracts his feet into as narrow a compass as he can. This artful precaution frequently sets the hunter at a loss, and betrays many an unsuspecting quadruped into a false and fatal security.—The ichneumon, in order that he may become more hateful and formidable to his natural enemy, the crocodile, will roll himself all over in mud; which often proves a better defence from the fury of so unequal a foe, than if the ichneumon was armed with weapons, or clad in a coat of impenetrable mail.

4. Of the following incident, Plutarch affirms that he himself was, an eye-witness. Being once on ship-board, he observed a jar which was about half filled with oil. A dog was very desirous of paying his addresses to the contents; but the oil was too low in the containing vessel for him to get at it. The seamen were all engaged different ways; and the dog, willing to make the most of the favourable opportunity, took up successively a number of stones which were stowed in that part of the ship, and dropping them, one by one, into the jar, the oil at last rose within his reach, and he lapped as much of it as he pleased. I was astonished, says Plutarch, by what means the dog could know that the immission of heavier substances would cause the lighter substance to ascend.—After this, we need hardly be surprised at what is related concerning the cranes of Lybia: viz. that, when impelled by thirst, if they can meet with no water high enough to be conveniently reached by their bills, they will drop in a sufficient quantity of stones until it rises to the height they wish. Plutarch, indeed, expresses some doubt as to the certainty of this instance; but, I think, without sufficient reason. Especially, as he admits that similar artifices were, in cases of similar exigency, known to be made use of by the geese of Cilicia, and by the bees in Crete. Nor are the prudence and foresight of the last-mentioned species confined merely to matters of subsistence. The Cretan bees, conscious of their natural inability to fly, with due steadiness and equipoise, when the wind is boisterous, have been observed to clasp a small piece of gravel, on each side, under their wings, that their light and slender bodies, thus judiciously ballasted, might preserve a due weight, and maintain a power of self-command.—The heights and recesses in Mount Taurus are said to be much occupied by eagles, who are never better pleased than when they can pick the bones of a crane. Cranes are very prone to cackle and make a noise (Isa. xxxviii. 14); and particularly so while they are flying. The sound of their voice rouses the eagles, who spring at the signal, and often make the talkative itinerants pay dear for their imprudent loquacity. The older and more experienced cranes, sensible of their besetting foible, and of the peril to which it exposes them, take care, before they venture on the wing, to arm themselves each with a stone, large enough to fill the cavity of their mouths, and consequently to impose inevitable silence on their tongues.

Self-distrust is an infallible mark of wisdom, and (under the efficacy of Providence and of grace) the truest ground of security. To know our weak side, and there to plant the strongest guard; to shun, so far as in us lies, the very possibility of temptation; and to put it out of our own power to transgress, by avoiding the remotest occasions and opportunities of evil, are among the means which God vouchsafes to bless, for the preservation of his frail and fallible people in the path of duty and happiness. I could mention the name of a late very opulent and very valuable person who, though naturally avaricious in the extreme, was liberal and beneficent to a proverb. He was aware of his constitutional sin; and God gave him victory over it, by enabling him to run away from it. Lest the dormant love of money should awake and stir in his heart, he would not, for many years before his death, trust himself with the sight of his revenues. He kept, indeed, his accounts as clearly and exactly as any man in the world; but he dared not receive, because he dared not look at, that gold which he feared would prove a snare to his affections. His stewards received all, and retained all in their own hands, until they received orders how to dispose of it. From the same excellent motive, Scipio refused to see a beautiful princess, whom the event of war had subjected to his power, lest her charms might prove either a source of uneasiness, if he had fortitude enough to resist them; or a source of guilt, if his fortitude should relax. Generally speaking, they are the most virtuous who dread to put their virtues to too severe a trial. He that trusteth his own heart is a fool; but whose walketh (e) wisely, he shall be delivered. Prov. xxxviii. 26

5. In fine serene weather cranes (like professing Christians, in a time of worldly sunshine) are not very observant of social ceremony; but will fly abroad singly, without praying much attention to each other. The case is different if necessity oblige them to make excursions under a lowering sky, and to cut their way through boisterous, opposing winds. They then form themselves into regular companies, and fly in large flocks of triangular figure: whose sharp point moves foremost when they sail against the wind, in order that they may more easily penetrate the tempestuous air, and preserve their ranks unbroken.—Sometimes they will sleep all night on the ground. To prevent surprize, a competent number of them are stationed by way of advanced guard to the camp, because of fear in the night. These, on the first approach of danger, sound the note of alarm; and the whole regiment starting from their slumbers, soar into the air without delay. Lest the centinels should sleep, when they ought to watch, each stands (says Plutarch) on one leg, and grasps a stone in the claw of the other foot. The uneasiness of which situation has a tendency to keep them awake; and if they happen to dose, the noise made by the falling of the stone, admonishes them to be less negligent.— Let men learn of cranes to be vigilant in their stations, and faithful to their trust. Above all, let ministers of Christ not sleep as do others; but watch as those that must give account of their stewardship to the Judge of quick and dead. It is said of Aristotle that, lest he should impede his progress in his philosophical studies by over-sleeping himself, he usually slept with one hand out of bed, and held a brass ball in it, over a vessel of the same metal: that the noise, which the ball must occasion when it fell from his hand, might awake him to what he deemed the principal business of human life. In how many respects may heathen diligence put Christian slothfulness to the blush!

6. The ant seems of all others to have been Plutarch's favourite insect. He even pronounces her a wise and virtuous animal: and in my opinion he proves his point. Friendship, fortitude, continency, patience, justice, and industry, are among the moral qualities which he deservedly places to her account.

A company of these creatures (says this philosopher) visited a neighbouring ant-hill, carrying with them a dead ant, which evidently seemed to have been an inhabitant of the colony to which his remains were now conveyed. On the arrival of so many strangers, several emmets ascended from their holes, and after a short communication returned into the hill, to apprise the community below of the business on which the unexpected visitants were come. After two or three passings and repassings in this manner, the negotiation appeared to be finally settled. A deputation of ants, from within the hill, at last lugged up a worm from their under-ground stores, which the others accepted of; and, delivering the dead emmet to his friends, went away highly satisfied with the recompense they had received.

When a loaded ant is met by others which have no burden, they courteously stand on one side, or move another way, that they may not incommode an individual who is toiling for the public good. If a labouring ant is carrying or dragging a heavier load than she is well able to manage, this is no sooner perceived by the rest than as many volunteers as are necessary run to her assistance, and cheerfully set their mouths or shoulders to the work. If the material be very cumbersome, and will conveniently admit of a partition, they will bite it into several pieces; and each moves homewards with as much as he is able to carry. After their subterraneous magazines are sufficiently stored with provisions, they carefully select such as begin to putrify or decay; and, bringing them out to the surface of the hill, expose them to the air or sun until properly dried; taking care to turn them regularly, and to re-convey them into the common repository on the appearance of rain, or at the approach of night. Lest their hoarded corn should germinate, and so defeat the purpose for which they lay it up, they carefully bite off those parts of the grain from which the root strikes and the blade shoots.

Plutarch's humanity does honour to his philosophy. He laments the cruelty of those who, for the sake of gratifying their own speculations, exceedingly distress if not totally ruin whole societies of these (f) harmless and laborious insects, by digging up their hills. Certainly this is buying information, and indulging curiosity at too dear, because at a very unmerciful rate. They, however, who have examined the interior structure of their residence with the utmost nicety of attention, tell us that the passages into it are not perpendicular, but sloping; and, like a labyrinth, are intersected by many cross paths, and diversified with many turnings and windings. These terminate in three principal halls, or cavities. In one the members of this perfect republic, who have all things in common, assemble to feed and converse. The second is the grand repository, where the hope of the year (i. e. their food) is laid up. And the third is the vault where they deposit their dead.

7. The ancient Thracians, when they were desirous of passing a frozen river, but were dubious whether it was sufficiently firm, used, among other experiments, to turn a fox loose upon the ice: it being the custom of this shrewd and wary animal to move very cautiously on such hazardous ground, laying his ear to the ice every step he went; that if the surface began to crack, or if the frost was so moderate as to admit of his hearing the water flow beneath, he might be able to retreat back in due season. If after the most exquisite observation, he

(f) I call them harmless, because I have been assured that on the nicest observation they are not found to injure the fruit-trees on which they frequently climb. They are, it seems, allured thither, not by the fruit, which they never hurt; but by a sot, of sweetish dew, which they are very fond of, and which we are rather obliged to them for diminishing: as the particular dew which they are most desirous of, is deemed very detrimental both to leaves and fruit.

perceived no danger, his fears would gradually wear off, and he advanced with boldness to the opposite bank. Plutarch's reflections on this conduct are extremely just. Here is, says he, no less than a syllogistical conclusion, from premises furnished by the senses. And the fox's chain of argumentation amounts to no less than this: "There can be no noise without motion. That which is easily moved cannot be firmly frozen. Water not firmly frozen retains a degree of fluidity. And a fluid cannot support a body heavier than itself."

8. The stupidity and obstinacy of mules are proverbial. But when Pericles was building a temple in Athens, one of these animals entitled himself to what he received, viz. the applauses and rewards of the public. This creature, who had been an old and useful servant to his employers, was exempted from farther toil on account of his age and past services. While the above-mentioned temple was erecting, stones were continually brought from a considerable distance in carriages drawn by mules. The old mule, though dismissed from work, took every opportunity of attending the carts as a voluntary spectator; and cheerfully ambled both to and from the keranicon by the side of his harnessed brethren, as though he meant to encourage and quicken them in the duty they were performing. The people were surprized and pleased at the zealous attachment which the merry old quadruped shewed to his former occupation; and by an unanimous vote ordered him to be maintained during life at the public expense.

A company of elephants were brought to Rome, to entertain the populace with an exhibition of the various and uncommon postures into which they had been taught to throw themselves. One of these creatures, who was not so ready at these difficult exercises as the rest, received, in recompense of his dulness, continual and severe chastisement from his keeper. The poor animal soon gave proof that his slow proficiency was the effect rather of natural unwieldiness than of idleness or obstinacy: for he was observed by night, when the moon shone, and when nobody was with him, to be carefully practising the lessons which had been given him; that he might escape farther correction by acquitting himself with more agility and expertness on the morrow.

A Syrian elephant was entrusted to the care of a dishonest servant, who usually gave him but half his allowance of corn. One day the elephant's owner happened to come into the stable at feeding time: and the servant, in consequence, poured out to the animal his full measure of barley. But instead of falling to, the elephant divided the heap into two equal parts with his trunk; and by the significancy of his motions gave his master to understand that if he had not been present his servant had not proved so liberal.

The keeper of an elephant used sometimes, by way of frolic, to mix stones and dirt with his provender. This ill-natured jest was seriously though humourously revenged. For one day the elephant being within reach of a vessel in which his keeper's dinner was boiling, repaid him in his own coin by filling his trunk with ashes, and discharging them into the pot.

When a number of these animals (in their untamed state) are desirous of passing a river, they very prudently sound the depth of the stream by deputing the least elephant to take the lead, before any of the larger ones venture from the bank; knowing that if the water be so shallow that the smallest of the company can wade across, the rest may follow without danger. If the harbinger who tries this experiment begins to lose his footing, and to be higher than his neck in the water, he immediately turns back again, and the adventurers go in quest of a more fordable place.

When Porus, one of the kings of India, gave battle to Alexander, the former received several wounds by the missive weapons of the enemy. An elephant on which he sometimes rode, and which attended him with all the affectionate solicitude of a bosom friend, perceiving his royal master occasionally wounded, watched every opportunity of drawing out (with his trunk) the darts that fastened: and the faithful creature performed these operations with all the judgment and tenderness imaginable. At last, finding that Porus was sinking to the ground (though he soon recovered, and was afterwards restored to his dominions) through fatigue and loss of blood, the elephant gave another proof of his sympathy and care, by so supporting the king with his trunk as to break the force of his fall, and to let him gently down.

We have noticed, in a foregoing page, that it is usual with those who employ themselves in taking elephants, to trepan them into deep pits, whose surfaces are so disguised as to resemble firm ground. On these occasions the ensnared elephant sets up a lamentable cry. If the coast is clear his wild associates, on hearing him roar, hasten (but with cautious tread) to the edges of the pit: and, if any such materials are at hand, will assist to facilitate his deliverance by throwing in a large quantity of timber and stones, which the prisoner erecting into a sort of stair-case below, he is thus sometimes able to accomplish his escape.—I was of opinion that these additional examples, adduced by so excellent a writer as Plutarch, and which obviously suggest so many moral lessons to man, deserved to stand as a supplement to what has been already observed concerning elephants.

The dead body of a Roman soldier who had been killed in a domestic tumult was carefully watched and guarded by his dog, who would not permit any person to touch the remains of his departed master. Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, happening to pass that way, took notice of so striking a spectacle, and enquired into the circumstances of the case. On being informed that the man had been slain three days before, and that the dog in all that time had neither stirred from the body, nor taken any food, the king ordered the corpse to be interred, and the dog to be taken care of, and brought to him. The creature soon grew fond of Pyrrhus: who, shortly after, ordering his forces to be mustered, the soldiers passed before him in review. During this ceremony, the dog for some time lay quietly at his feet; until seeing those soldiers march by who had murdered his late master, he sprang at them with such rage and fierceness, and turned himself to Pyrrhus with such meaning in his looks and gestures, that the men were sent to prison on suspicion of having committed the crime with which the dog seemed to charge them. Being strictly examined, they confessed themselves guilty, and were accordingly executed.

The temple of Æsculapius, at Athens, was furnished with many rich ornaments and utensils of gold and silver. A robber who was desirous of paying his compliments to some of this wealth, accomplished his design with such art and secrecy, that he supposed all discovery of the offender to be impossible. A dog, indeed, belonging to some of those whose office it was to watch the temple, had done his duty, by barking incessantly; but the sextons either did not, or would not, take the alarm. The honest animal, faithful and steady to his purpose, pursued the thief, who in vain attempted to keep him at bay. He pelted him with stones; but the dog still followed. He tried to bribe him by throwing him pieces of meat; but the dog refused to touch them. The pursuer still kept the criminal in view, nor lost sight of him, until he had watched him to his place of habitation (which was at some distance from Athens), where he posted himself as sentinel at the door. Whenever the culprit ventured from home, Cipparus (for so the dog was called) still haunted him. The news of the robbery was soon made public, but the robber still remained undetected; until information being given that Cipparus, the temple-dog, was at such a place, and perpetually harassing such a person, though fawning on every body else; proper officers were dispatched, who took the suspicious man into custody. While they were conducting him to examination the dog, conscious of the distinguished part he had borne in bringing the miscreant to justice, ran before them all the way, jumping and giving every demonstration of joy. The Athenian people recompensed the zeal, faithfulness, and assiduity of Cipparus, by assigning him to the care of the priests who officiated in the Æsculapian temple, and by voting him a supply from the public stores for his maintenance.

Among the many useful inferences deducible from such instances as these, one which Plutarch himself suggests must not be omitted. "They," says this valuable philosopher, "who suppose that there are no such things as gratitude and justice due from us to animals of inferior rank, must be understood in reference to such animals only as are absolutely untamable; and particularly to those that live in the sea and occupy the recesses of the deep. For the sea produces no creature that is capable of contracting friendship with man, and all its inhabitants are incurably wild. But the person who insists that moral obligation has nothing to do in regulating our treatment of land animals (especially domestic ones), proclaims himself to be no better than a savage and a brute, in the worst sense of those terms. Was no respect due to the Hyrcanian dog who, when he saw his master's corpse burning on the funeral pile, jumped into the flames, and was consumed with it? Nor to the dog of one Pyrrhus (not the king), who gave his deceased master the same testimony of affection?"

SOLAR SYSTEM.

1. IN the centre of our mundane system, and at a just distance from the circumvolving planets, is fixed that most magnificent and beneficial orb of fluid fire, the sun; designed and formed by gracious and Almighty Wisdom, to be the grand unfailling dispenser of light and heat to the animal, the mineral, and the vegetable worlds.

So essentially important are its communications to the earth and her sister planets, that the adorable Saviour of sinners is in Scripture figuratively shadowed forth to our conceptions by an idea taken from this brightest of visible objects. "The Lord God is a sun and shield: he will give to his chosen people the light and warmth of grace below, and crown that grace with perfection of glory, in the heaven of heavens above (Psal. lxxxiv. 11)." And the Father's endearing promise, made and fulfilled to each spiritually awakened sinner is, "To you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise, with healing in his beams." Mal. iv. 2.

2. How extremely small the material sun appears, in comparison of its real (g) magnitude! Who that is guided merely by the naked eye would suppose that luminary to be, what in fact it is, not less than a million of times larger than our whole extensive globe of earth and seas? When purblind reason takes upon her to sit in judgment on the mysterious nature, decrees, and dispensations of God, she resembles the short-sighted optics of an unlettered Indian, who estimating the size of the sun by his own inadequate perceptions, imagines it to be of much less circumference than the floor of his hut; and, was a philosopher to apprise him of his mistake, would ask, with an unbelieving stare, if not with a contemptuous smile, How can these things be? Between the sun's real and apparent dimensions some, though exceeding little, proportion obtains. But when the second person in the godhead deigned to clothe himself with mortality, his appearance bore no proportion to his infinite and essential dignity. Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary? was the decision of unilluminated reason. The eye of supernatural faith alone was able to see through the human veil, discern the latent Deity, and behold his glory as the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

3. What a diminutive figure would our earth make if seen from the sun by eyes so constructed as ours! It would appear a million of times smaller than the sun now seems to us: i. e. it would be hardly, if at all, visible. Why is the sun no larger in our sight? Because of our extreme (h) distance from it? The earth why so large? Because we are resident upon it. And, wherefore, O my soul, are the glorious things of God, and the important concerns of futurity, no greater in thy view? Because the remains of original corruption still keep thee at some distance from thy master; and hinder thee from seeing eternal realities in the momentous light they deserve. Why do the perishing interests of time appear so great? Because we are immediately conversant with them; and they have naturally too deep a place in our vile affections. Milton represents the seraph Uriel, as dwelling in the sun. Was this in a spiritual sense our case; were our hearts right with God, and could we constantly walk in the near, uninterrupted light of his blessed countenance, how would the world dwindle in our esteem? What a speck, what a comparative nothing would it appear!

4. The presence of the solar beams constitutes day-light; and stars which, during our recess from the sun, spangled the sable canopy of night, and glittered to the view of gazing nations, not only cease to dazzle, but even forbear to twinkle, and become quite invisible, when the lucid monarch of the sky re-gilds our hemisphere with his gladdening smile. The superior lustre absorbs the inferior; and those shining drops, which so lately attracted our admiration, are lost, absolutely lost, in one vast magnificent ocean of light. Such is the fate of human righteousness, when Christ, in his fulness of mediatorial beauty and grandeur, rises on the soul of a benighted sinner. In our pharisaical and unconverted state (a state of tenfold deeper than Egyptian darkness), our good works, as we are apt flatteringly to style them, charms us with their petty, evanid radiance,

"As stars, from absent suns, have leave to shine."

But no sooner is Jesus, by the internal agency of his spirit, revealed in our hearts, and his completely finished obedience discovered to the eye of faith, than we cease going about to establish our own righteousness, and joyfully submit to the imputed righteousness of the incarnate God. Self-excellence and self-dependance vanish, in that blessed moment: and the language of the soul is, "Thy merits, O thou Redeemer of the lost, are all my salvation; and an interest in thee is all my desire."

5. The atmosphere, or that body of air which encompasses our globe forty-five miles every way, is equally important to the life of animals, and to the vegetation of plants. But it would quickly cease to answer these valuable ends, were it not for the additional influence of the sun. Whereas, in subordination to that, and as a medium between that and us, it ministers every moment, to our best temporal interests. Thus the ordinances of the gospel are to be numbered among those streams which gladden the Church of God, if, and when, he makes

(g) The sun's diameter, or width from edge to edge, is no fewer than eight hundred and twenty-two thousand one hundred and forty-eight miles; and its circumference, two millions five hundred and eighty-two thousand miles. The diameter of the earth is not quite eight thousand.

(h) A line extended from the surface of the earth to that of the sun would be eight hundred and sixty millions fifty-one thousand three hundred and ninety eight miles in length.

Mr. Derham (see his Phys. Theo. book i. chap. 4.) computes that a bullet, discharged from a large gun, would not (even supposing it to travel with its utmost, unabated velocity) reach the sun in less time than thirty-two years and a half.

them the vehicles of his own presence and power to the soul. Abstracted from the converting and cherishing operations of the Holy Ghost, the best means of grace would infallibly leave us (as a sunless atmosphere would leave the earth) no less cold and unanimated than they found us.

6. To the sun are owing the jewels and the metals that enrich the bowels of our globe; together with every herb, flower, and tree, that beautify its surface.

“Tis Phœbus warms the rip’ning ore to gold:”

It is the solar influence which gives brilliancy to the diamond, verdure to the leaf, tints to the flower, and flavour to fruits. So, the shinings of Christ’s presence on the soul give existence and gradual maturity to the inward graces that enrich the heart, and to the peaceable works of righteousness which adorn the life of every true believer in his name.

7. Many of the ancients supposed that the sun moves round the earth; whereas, on the contrary, nothing is more demonstrable than that the earth is carried round the sun. The Arminians (like those mistaken people of antiquity) would persuade us that God regulates his decrees by the free-will (or, in a yet more impious phrase of theirs, by the self determined conduct) of the creatures he has made. This is just as absurd in theology, as it would be false in philosophy, to assert that the sun dances round the earth, instead of the earth’s circuiting the sun. Scripture expressly assures us that the way of man is not in himself; neither is it in man that walketh to direct his own steps. Jer. x. 23. God does not, like a dependent lackey in a livery, adjust his motions by ours; but human conduct is adjusted and regulated (either permissively or effectively, according to the nature of the case) by the wise determinations of his sovereign and undefeatable will. He, as an uncreated and all-pervading sun, is the centre of the universal system; while the whole choir of created beings, without a single exception, perform their allotted planetary revolutions to the ultimate glory of that God “whose never-failing providence (as the Church of England finely expresses it) ordereth all things, both in heaven and earth.”

8. Though the sun constantly occupies the same part of space, and is, in that respect, fixed and immovable, it yet turns upon its own axis, and completes its central rotation in about 25 days and 6 hours. This regular and perpetual actusivity contributes, probably, to that amazing force and swiftness with which its rays are thrown off towards the distant worlds that revolve around.—Thus God is, necessarily and essentially, fixed and unchangeable in his will. He is of one mind; who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doth. Job xxiii. 13. This divine immutability is, however, connected with incessant, omnipotent, and universal activity; governing (?) all beings and events by his absolute providence; and diffusing sacred light and heat through the entire world of his converted people by the energy of his grace. His own sovereign decree is the axis on which he moves, and the only rule by which he regulates the whole of his effective and permissive conduct.

9. Modern astronomers have discovered what are commonly called maculæ solares; i. e. certain spots which hover near the surface of the sun. Sometimes a considerable number of these are visible at once; and very often none at all. Philosophers are greatly divided as to the nature and cause of these solar spots; though it is generally agreed that they are not adherent to the sun’s disk, but suspended at some distance from it: and there is reasonable ground to believe that, after a temporary suspension, they fall into the body of that grand luminary, and are instantaneously transmuted into one splendid mass with itself. Whether those reputed spots be really in the sun or not, thus much is infallibly certain, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all: no error, no impurity, no defect. The afflictive distributions of his providence, and the limited communications of his grace may, to the benighted eye of unregenerated reason, appear like the transitory spots which sometimes seem to disfigure the beauty and to impair the lustre of the sun. “I am afflicted beyond measure, and without cause,” cries a child of unbelief while smarting under a providential rod. “God is partial and unjust, in converting some to holiness and leaving others to perish in their sins,” say the unhumiliated disciples of Arminius. On the contrary, the faith of God’s elect teaches its happy subjects to give their heavenly Father unlimited credit for being perfectly wise and just and good, and to wait the end of his dispensations, when every seeming spot shall vanish, and God will make his righteousness as evident as the light, and his just dealing as the noon-day.

(i) Hence that noble confession of Sir Isaac Newton: “Æternus est [Deus], et infinitus, omnipotens et omnisciens. Omnia regit, et omnia cognoscit, que sunt, aut scribi possunt. In ipso continentur et moventur universa, sed absque matâ passione.—Deus nihil patitur, ex corporum motibus:

illa nullam sentiunt resistentiam, ex omnipresentiâ Dei.—Deus, sine dominio, providentiâ, et causis finalibus, nihil aliud est quam fatum et natura.”—Principia, pag. (mecnm) 483.

In proof of which this prince of philosophers appeals, among other texts, to Acts xvii. 27, 28.

10. Is it at all wonderful that the sun's transcendent brightness, if too intently surveyed, should dazzle and confuse the unassisted organs of human sight? Can it be otherwise, while that is so potent, and these so feeble? Go, then, thou pretended rationalist! and say, consistently with reason, if thou canst, that "Where mystery begins, religion ends." (k) Say rather, religion ends where mystery does not begin. If thou art unable with thy naked eye to look steadfastly at the material sun when shining in the fulness of its strength, who among the children of men is sufficient to comprehend the nature, the purposes, and the disposals of him before whose insufferable glory Gabriel and Raphael cover their faces with their wings?

"But fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

11. How astonishingly rapid is the transmission of light from the sun to our planet! I cannot display this so well as in the words of the accomplished Mr. Derham. (l) "It is a very great act of the providence of God that such a benefit as light is not long in its passage from place to place. For was its motion no swifter than the motion of the swiftest bodies upon earth (such as of a (m) bullet out of a great gun, or even of (n) sound, which, next to light, is the swiftest motion we have), in this case light would take up, in its progress from the sun to us, above thirty-two years at the rate of the first, and above seventeen years at the rate of the latter motion. The inconveniencies of which would be: 1. Its energy and vigour would be greatly cooled and abated; 2. Its rays would be less penetrant; and 3. Darkness would with greater difficulty and tardiness be dissipated, especially by the fainter lights of our sublunary luminous bodies.

"But passing with such prodigious velocity, with nearly the instantaneous swiftness of almost two hundred thousand miles in one second of time, or (which is the same thing) being but about seven or eight minutes of an hour in coming from the sun to us; therefore it is that, with all security and speed, we receive the kindly effects and influences of that noble and useful creature of God. Now, forasmuch as the distance between the sun and the earth is 860 millions, 51 thousand, 3 hundred and 98 miles, therefore, at the rate of 7 minutes and a half, or 450 seconds, in passing the sun, light will be found to fly above 191 thousand, 2 hundred and 25 miles in one second of time."

Truly wonderful as these considerations are, they yet afford but a very inadequate illustration of the power and swiftness with which the convincing arrows of the Holy Ghost are often found to pierce and illuminate the soul of an elect sinner. How was the energy of his arm revealed; how mightily and how rapidly did the meltings of his grace catch from heart to heart, when no fewer than three thousand rebels were savingly subdued and born again under a single sermon! Acts ii. 41.—What instantaneous and irresistible lightning issued from the eye of Jesus when he looked his revolted apostle into repentance unto life!—And, to enumerate no more instances, how great was the glory of that light which (in a moment, or in less time, if less can be) struck the bloody pharisee of Tarsus to the ground, transformed the furious lion into a passive lamb, and compelled a blaspheming persecutor to groan, from the inmost of his heart, Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do? Nor is less power from on high exerted in the soul of any man who is effectually turned to God. The same omnipotence which conquered Paul, yea, the same omnipotence which raised Jesus himself from the dead, has actually been put forth in thee, O reader, if thou hast experienced the renewing operation of the Holy Spirit. 1 Tim. i. 16. Eph. i. 19, 20.

Do we wonder at the account which philosophy gives concerning the speedy transmission of this lovely element from its created fountain to the earth? Let us rather value and admire that infinitely transcendent and more important blessing which the following golden passage so charmingly describes:—God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the person of Jesus Christ. 2 Cor. vi. 6.

Once more, light does not travel from the sun so swiftly as the quickened bodies of the saints shall rise into glory, honour, and immortality, when the Saviour of men shall

(k) These are the very words of a late Arminian author.

(l) Physico-Theology, b. i. chap. 4.

(m) According to the observations of Mersennus, a bullet shot out of a large gun flies 92 fathoms in a second of time, which are equal to 589 English feet and a half: and according to the computation of Mr. Huygens, it would be 25 years in passing from the earth to the sun. But, according to my own observations, made with one of her late Majesty's sakers and a very accurate pendulum chronometer, a bullet, at its first discharge, flies 510 yards in 5 half-seconds; which are a mile in little above 17 half-seconds; and a bullet would be 32 years and a half in flying, with its utmost velocity, to the sun.

(n) "As to the velocity of sounds, I made divers nice experiments with good instruments, by which I found that the medium of their flight is at the rate of a mile in nine half-seconds and a quarter, or 1142 feet in one second of time. According to which rate, a sound would be near 17 years and a half in flying as far as the distance is from the earth to the sun."

appear, and the Archangel's trumpet sound. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye; the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

12. Summer is usually the season of (o) heat, and winter of cold. Yet nothing is more certainly true than that the sun is much (p) nearer to us in winter than in summer. The annual path which the earth describes around the sun is not exactly circular, but elliptical, i. e. of a figure somewhat oval; whence it follows that our distance from that luminary is not always the same. For the reasons assigned in the first note below, we do not feel the solar heat during the keener months, though, in reality, we are less remote from the great source of light and warmth than at those times when its influence is more sensibly enjoyed. The believer, too, has his winter seasons of providential affliction and of spiritual distress. At such periods his views are occasionally dark, and his comforts liable to a temporary chill. Yet if the God of love is ever peculiarly near to his people for good, it is when his arrows stick fast in them, and when his hand presseth them sore. Behold, God is in this place, and I knew it not, was the retrospective experience of Jacob. While the spiritual winter lasts, be it thy endeavour to exercise what a late excellent person terms "The winter graces of faith and patience." At the time appointed thy consolations shall return as the clear shining after rain; and thy joy be as the sun when it goeth forth in its might. Then will be realized that elegant and reviving delineation of inward summer and prosperity of soul: the winter [of doubts and darkness, of pain and sorrow, of affliction and temptation, of coldness and barrenness, of storm and tossing] is past: the rain [of weeping and distress] is over and gone. The flowers [of peace and holy rejoicing] appear on the earth: the time of the singing of birds [when thy graces shall be all alert and lively, and thou shalt pray and praise with enlargement] is come: and the voice of the turtle [the still, small music of the Holy Spirit's voice, whispering peace to the conscience] is heard in our land. The fig tree putteth forth her green figs [fruitfulness in every good word and work shall evidence thy revival in grace], and the vines, with the tender grapes, impart their fragrant: thy amiable and benevolent tempers, accompanied by all the other lovely effects of communion with God, shall justify thy faith to the world, and visibly adorn thy profession of the Gospel of Christ.—Cantic. ii. 11—13.

Yet though favoured with this happy and glorious experience, you must not expect (at least, it is not the lot of every believer) to enjoy summer all the year round. But however this be an eternity is coming, when thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thy everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended. Isa. lx. 20.

13. The sun may in some sense be justly styled, anima mundi, or the soul of our revolving world. So universally pervading is its influence, that nothing is totally hid from the heat thereof: Psalm xix. 6. In a greater or less degree, it permeates the whole region of air, penetrates the inmost recesses of the earth, and distributes a competent portion of its beams through the vast expanse of waters. Hence, in and on our planet, there is no such thing as absolute darkness, truly and strictly so called. If our eyes were constructed in the same manner as those of subterranean animals, we should, like them, be able to see without artificial help, at any distance below the surface of the earth, and by night as well as day. Not less universal than the solar agency is the all-directing providence of God. Nothing is exempted from its notice; nothing is excepted from its control. Chance, like absolute darkness, has no real existence. If some events seem fortuitous, it is because we have not a sufficiency of knowledge, by which to trace the chain of combinations that necessarily produced them: just as some places and some seasons seem totally dark to us, because our optic system is so framed and attuned, that on various occasions the human eye is unable to collect those scattered and proportionably expanded rays, from which no place whatever is entirely secluded.

14. In common conversation we frequently speak of solar eclipses. But what is called an eclipse of the sun is, in fact, an eclipse of the earth; occasioned by the

(o) "There are two causes of the great difference between the heat and the cold in summer and winter: 1. The shorter or longer continuance of the sun above our horizon. In summer, long, which increases the heat as much as it lengthens the day. In winter, short, which diminishes heat as it shortens the day, and augments the cold as it lengthens the night. 2. The other cause is, the oblique or perpendicular direction of the sun's rays, the oblique being weaker than the perpendicular."—Astro-Theo. b. iv. ch. iv.

In summer the rays fall more perpendicularly upon the earth than in the winter; and, consequently, with more vivid and forcible effect. In winter they fall obliquely; and, therefore, with feebler and less sensible impression.

(p) "The sun's greater proximity to us in winter is manifest, from the increment of its apparent diameter to 32'. 47"; and the decrement thereof in summer to 31'. 40".

"Moreover its swifter motion in winter about the solstice, by a fifth part, is an argument of its being then nearer the earth. Whence it comes to pass that, from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, there are about eight days more than from the autumnal to the vernal."—Astro-Theology, u. 8.

moon's interference, or transit between the sun and us. This circumstance makes no alteration in the sun itself; but only intercepts our view of it for a time. Whence does darkness of soul, even darkness that may be felt, usually originate? Never from any changeableness in our covenant God, the glory of whose unvarying faithfulness and love shines the same and can suffer no eclipse. It is when the world, with its fascinating honours, or wealth, or pleasure, gets between our Lord and us; that the light of his countenance is obstructed, and our rejoicing in him suffers a temporary eclipse.

15. Mists and vapours rising from the earth, sometimes operate as a veil, and hide the sun from our eyes; until the superior influence of its beams overpower the ascending nuisance, and dissipate the noxious vapours. Thus do the remaining corruptions of a regenerated heart dim the prospect of salvation, and damp the fervour of inherent grace. Nothing can again brighten the former, and warm the latter into lively exercise, but the splendour of God's repeated rising on the soul. Happy it is for his benighted people, that as mists and clouds may seem to obscure the sun, but cannot extinguish him; nor even hinder the access of his rays beyond a certain time; so that faithful Jehovah, who knows what is in man, and who is still (g) greater [in mercy and power] than our hearts can be in point of sinful depravation, will finally subdue our iniquities, shine away our fears, purify us from all our dross and perfectly conform us to the image of his holiness.

16. The sun is commonly said to rise and set. This however is spoken merely in complaisance to appearances. The truth is that when the horizon of the earth gets below the sun, we then perceive his beams: and when the horizon gets above it we lose sight of them. Here remember as before that in all our varying frames of soul, the variations are not in God, but in ourselves. Remember too that you must lie low at his feet, if you would bask in the shinings of his face. Get above his word and ordinances, and no wonder if the horror of a great darkness fall upon you.

17. The sun possesses in a very super-eminent degree, the two contrary powers of attraction and repulsion. By the former the circuiting planets are retained, each in its proper orbit; by the latter they are prohibited from approaching him too nearly. A faint emblem of God's paternal attributes on one hand; and of his terrific perfections on the other. Those encourage us to draw nigh to him as the everlasting lover of our souls; these restrain us from presumptuous familiarities, and from taking undue liberties with him who is glorious in holiness, fearful in praise, and whose greatness knows no limit.

18. The sun-beams, though unspeakably beneficent in their distributive capacity, yet if collected to a point, would be almost infinitely ruinous in their operation. The power of God considered as exerted in and for his believing people, becomes a gracious medium of their present and eternal felicity. But that same adorable attribute, when set in array against reprobate angels and men, burns as a fire which none can quench. Who knoweth the power of thy wrath? And oh, how irresistibly will that power be made manifest, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that believeth not the gospel!

19. How preferable is the original, durable, and vivifying light of the sun, to the borrowed, evanid, unanimating lustre of the moon! The former, while it illuminates the eye and uncovers the elegant scenes of creation, warms the earth and makes it fruitful; diffuses cheerfulness and imparts enrichment to no fewer than six primary, and ten secondary worlds.—As great is the difference between a cool historical faith, that floats in a contemplative head; and the faith of God's elect, which warms, invigorates and purifies the heart. The former is a mere moon-light faith, which however clear so far as it goes, yet leaves us as cold and as barren as it found us. The latter, like the solar communications, enlivens and fertilizes the soul; filling it with joy and peace, through the power of the Holy Ghost; and adorning it with the gems and flowers and fruits of grace.

20. St. Paul finely illustrates the eternal generation of Christ by a grand idea taken from the material sun. The passage I refer to is Heb. i. 3. where our adorable Surety is styled Ἀπανάστωμα, i. e. the forth-beaming of the Father's glory. Perhaps no other object in the whole compass of nature could have supplied the apostle with a piece of imagery equally majestic, delicate and just. Light proceeds from the sun, and yet the sun never existed without light. Christ is at once the begotten of the Father and co-eternal with him. The sun's rays, or unintermitting efflux of light, are of the same nature with the sun itself: and Christ is εὐμορφῆ (Phil. ii.) i. e. a person in the same essence with the Father Almighty, and joint partaker of all his lovely, glorious and infinite attributes. Could light be exterminated from the sun, the sun itself as such, would inevitably be destroyed: and to deny the deity of Jesus, is virtually to deny the existence of God. For whosoever denieth the Son, hath not the Father; but he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also.

Sixteen planets, or moving worlds, describe their revolutions round the sun. They are distinguished, (1.) into primary and secondary; (2.) into superior and inferior.

(1.) The primary planets are six; and make their circuits in the following order. Nearest to the sun rolls Mercury. Beyond the orbit of Mercury is that of Venus: who though she maintains her lively dance with unremitting speed, yet cannot complete her rotation in so short a time, as the first-mentioned planet; because her path being exterior to his she has a greater portion of space to measure than he. In the third (and consequently in a still more extensive) circle moves the earth; accompanied like a genteel traveller by a single, but faithful and steady servant the Moon. Beyond the earth, Mars fetches a yet larger and proportionably longer circuit. Next Jupiter rides in state like a person of dignity and opulence, adorned with three beautiful zones or belts, and attended by a retinue of four obsequious moons. Lastly Saturn the outermost (i. e. the farthest from the sun and from the earth) of all the rest pursues his majestic and long career: encompassed (but at a respectful distance, without touching his surface) by a magnificent arch commonly termed his ring, and waited on by five moons.—Such are the names, which for distinction's sake, astronomers have affixed to the primaries.—The secondary planets are the ten forementioned satellites, or attending moons: which revolve around three of their primaries; and at the same time accompany their masters in their periodic journey round the sun.

(2.) Those planets are called superior which are farther from the sun than ourselves: viz. Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. The inferior planets are those two which are nearer to the sun than we; i. e. whose orbits are between the sun and us: viz. Mercury and Venus.

Before we give each of these revolving worlds a distinct and particular consideration, let us pause for a moment, and view them collectively through the Scripture-glass.

1. A plurality of worlds is more than intimated by the apostle Paul. In concert with his eternal Son, God the Father made the worlds: Heb. i. 2. And hence, on the credit of divine information through faith we understand, that the worlds were framed by the word of God. Heb. xi. 3. Nor was the co-equal spirit unactive on the great occasion: for as by his agency life was breathed into man (Job xxxiii. 4); so by his commanding power, he garnished the heavens with beauty, grandeur and light: Job xxvi. 13.

2. By whom are the planets supported? and whose hand impels them with never-ceasing rapidity, round the central ocean of fire? They are supported and impelled, by that very person whose human soul was made an offering for sin; and whose hands were nailed to the ignominious tree. By him, all things consist, or are held together: Col. i. 17.—He both sustains and carries [φερων] all things by the word of his own power (Heb. i. 3): he upholds the entire universe of suns and worlds; and by the omnipotency of his sovereign will he carries the rolling worlds round their respective suns.

3. It has already been noticed, that some of the planets finish their rotations in much less time than others. The nearer they are to the sun the more speedily they revolve. Mercury, for instance, is not quite 88 days in accomplishing his year: while Saturn takes up considerably more than 29 of our years in circuiting the same common centre.—Thus some of God's converted people are soon matured for glory, by their nearness to, and intimate communion with, the sun of righteousness. These are frequently known to out-run their brethren, and (like John at the tomb of our Lord) to reach the sepulchre, finish their course, and ascend to their master's joy, at a very early period. While other saints, who either do not ripen so fast, or who have a larger field of usefulness to occupy on earth, are detained from their crown, until they are full of years and good works. Each of these is gathered, as a shock of corn, in its season. O believer, if thy God summon thee away betimes, his spirit will first perfect that which concerneth thee; nor will Providence apply the sickle until grace has made thee white for the harvest. Or, if he lengthened thy thread, having much for thee to do, and much to suffer; he will shew himself the God of thy old age, and not forsake thee when thou art grey-headed: for he hath inviolably declared, Even to your old age I am he; and even to hoary hairs will I carry you: I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you. Isa. xlvi. 4. Remember, to thy great and endless comfort, that “ His ev'ry word of grace is strong,

As that which built the skies:
The voice that rolls the stars along,
Spake all the promises.” (7)

4. How amicably and how regularly do the various planets move! In a series of almost 6000 years there has been no interference, no collision, no subversion of order, no deficiency of service, no cessation of activity. Each is made to comport itself, as though each knew its allotted line of duty, and were determined that nothing should divert it from its course. The secondary orbs, without weariness and without complaint, minister to the greater; while these, without boasting and without upbraiding, as cheerfully (s) repay, with accumulated interest, the kind offices they receive.——Thus let inferiors serve; and thus let superiors requite!

5. The primary planets take the secondaries along with them, in their passage round the sun; and the secondaries attend them, with the most perfect and unrepining readiness.——Thus should parents, tutors, and masters of families, train their children, their pupils, and their dependents, in the knowledge and admonition of the Lord; and labour to take as many with them to heaven as they can. Blessed are the guides, who exert their influence to purposes so unspeakably important: and blessed are the ears, which listen joyfully to the instruction that maketh wise unto salvation.

6. As all the planets perform their revolutions without intermission; so, they make the end of one revolution the beginning of another. They are never languid, never fatigued. They renew their beauteous toil again and again; nor will ever stop until the archangel swears, by Him who liveth from eternity to eternity, that time shall be no longer.—Equally intense, uninterrupted, and unwearied, the obedience of Adam was ere sin profaned the temple of the soul. Such, too, the obedience of the elect angels has been, and is to this very moment. Such, moreover, the true believer on earth wishes (but wishes, alas, in vain) to pay his Lord. And such shall the obedience, both of saints and of angels, for ever be in the paradise of God.

“Then shall we sing, and never tire,
In that blest house above;
Where sin, and fear, and pain expire,
Cast out by perfect love.
Then not the sun shall, more than I,
His Maker's will perform;
Nor shine with brighter purity,
Nor burn with zeal so warm.”

1. Of all the planets, Mercury, as already hinted, revolves nearest to the sun. His diameter (t) amounts to 2748 English miles: and his whole globe, is to our's, as 2 to 5. The orbit or path which he describes round the sun, measures 66,621,000

English miles: (u) and yet he moves with such prodigious velocity (viz. at the rate of (x) almost 100,000 miles an hour; which is nearly as swift again as the motion of our earth), that he completes his year, or solar rotation, in about 7 days and 23 hours. His distance from the sun, is not quite 32 millions of miles; and he is about 18 millions of miles distant from us.

The venerable and ingenious Mr. Browne has given us a comprehensive and pleasing description of this planet in the compass of four lines:

“First, verging on the lucid fount of day,
Bright Mercury directs his circling way:
In three short months he rounds the solar sphere,
His seasons shifts, and ends the transient year.” (y)

2. Mercury's proximity to the sun, renders him, except at a few particular seasons, invisible to the inhabitants of our world. From the vast exuberance of light in which he is almost lost in our view, astronomers have, I believe, been hitherto unable to ascertain the period of his diurnal motion on his own axis; or even to pronounce with certainty, whether he have any diurnal motion, or not.—Similar are many secret acts of prayer, praise, faith, love, and humiliation, which true believers exercise towards their heavenly Father. Remote from the prying eye of man, they pour out their souls into the bosom of the Lord, and, wrapt in the comforts of his presence (like Mercury in the beams of the sun), the curiosity of others wishes in vain to know the whole of what passes between God and them. As, on one hand, there are occasions, when it is our bounden duty, for the honour of our master and for the edification of our neighbour, to let our light shine before men; there are at times also, when it behoves us to enter into our closets, and to shut the door about us, and hold sequestered communion with him who sees in secret. This distinction reminds me of a little anecdote, not entirely foreign from the subject. A late prelate in the North of England, had conceived some illiberal prejudices against a clergyman of his diocese. With intent to embarrass the divine, his lordship thus addressed him, at a public visitation: “Mr. —, you give away a great deal to the poor; but your charity is of the ostentatious kind. You are too public, in the distribution of your bounty, I do not hear of any private good you do. It is all with sound of trumpet.” The answer was sensible and pertinent: “My lord, I care not how much you hear of my public charities, nor how little you hear of my private ones."

(s) The earth, for example, communicates a much greater quantity of light to the moon, than the moon can possibly reflect to the earth. Admitting the moon to be fifteen times smaller than our own planet; the latter must impart fifteen times more light to her, than she to us.

3. Mercury, though rarely discernible, is sometimes seen, like a dark spot on the sun's disk, as he passes between him and us. (z) The transit of this planet is said to have been first observed by Gassendi, in the year 1632.—Thus the illumined side of Mercury commonly eludes our notice: but his dark hemisphere excites our attention, and strikes our view. We too frequently act a similar part by each other. A fellow Christian, or any conspicuous character, may shine unregarded: whereas, if his brightness become in any respect clouded and over-cast, our telescopes are up, our eyes in full employ, our tongues proclaim his defects; and it is well, if magnifying and multiplying glasses do not lend their assistance on the occasion.

4. Not a single moon, or secondary orb, accompanies Mercury in his progress. He pursues his solitary journey without a servant, without a companion. Yet in no wise discouraged by this circumstance, he cheerfully speeds his rapid course, and rather flies than rolls round the vivifying centre of light and heat. The sun is, to him, in the stead of every other friend; and more than supplies the absence of a thousand attendants.—Providence may, perhaps, cast your lot, O Christian, in a place, or fix you in a family, where you may not find any with whom you can take sweet religious counsel, and walk in the house of God as brethren. Be not, however, disheartened; neither dejectly ask, Who will shew me any good? but make the psalmist's prayer your own: Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me! If you experience continual nearness of God through the Spirit; and are as Mercury, in sole positus, irradiated and warmed by direct communion with Christ, no matter whether you travel to heaven in company or alone. In the best sense of the word, you are sure of not being alone; for all the persons in the godhead, and angels who minister to the heirs of salvation, are your companions and guardians, your guides and familiar friends. Nor will they cease to watch over you for good, and to keep you in all your ways, until you enter the celestial house not made with hands; where you will, to all eternity, associate with the innumerable assembly and church of the first-born, who were written in heaven.

5. The solar light and heat are supposed to strike the surface of Mercury with seven-fold greater intenseness, than is experienced on the surface of our earth at the hottest seasons. If this be the case, and if the inhabitants of that planet are embodied beings, their eyes must be differently constructed from ours, to sustain such excess of light; and their whole corporeal system differently constituted, to endure such extremity of heat. But shall we conclude, that Mercury is not inhabited, because, according to our present temperament, we should probably be unable to live there, on account of its vicinity to the sun? A Mercurian might with equal propriety pronounce the earth (a) uninhabitable, because of its comparative remoteness from the grand luminary. After all, to adopt the reasoning of an elegant and profound philosopher, "As the animal constitution with respect to heat and cold may be widely different on the same planet; so there may not be such a difference of the degrees of heat and cold, on the planets nearer to and more distant from the sun, as we imagine. The nature of an atmosphere, and the alterations happening in it, produce sometimes sultry heat, and sometimes piercing cold, contrary to what should be the effect of the sun's rays separately considered: so that heat and cold do not absolutely depend on a planet's nearness to, or distance from, the sun; but, together with these on some other causes. We are considerably farther from the sun in the summer months than in the winter: yet our weather is then generally much warmer.—Though Saturn has but about the hundredth part of the

(a) "Some fancy, should the planetary train
A race of living animals contain,
Those fix'd in Mercury's too splendid seat
Must sink, oppress'd, beneath the fervent heat;
Or, by too strong a ray, the tortur'd sight
Fail, quite o'erpower'd with unabating light.
"Allow me this, what disputants maintain:
Nor will it render our opinion vain,
The same of us, might the Mercurials hold,
A planet uninhabitably cold!
And those, reverse, in Saturn's icy seat,
Suppose us scorch'd with more than Aetna's heat.
Each by their world comparing ours, might deem Their reasons firm, and err in wide extreme.
"But let th' objection stand. Some orbs, suppose, Scorch'd with hot rays, or chill'd by prising snows.

No doubt the Almighty could his worlds replete
With creatures suited to their various seat;
Intense degrees of cold or heat to bear,
Of light or gloom a pleasing proper share:

To them agreeable, by nature blest,
Painful howe'er imagin'd by the rest.

"Of this, on earth, similitude we find;
Each place to fit inhabitants assign'd,
The bird of Jove, with an undazzled sight,
Kens the clear sun, and tow'rs to reach his light:
While the benighted bat, and owl obscene,
Attend the chariot of the shadowy queen,
Upward the feath'ry nations all repair,
And range, at large, th' extensive fields of air
To firmer earth the grosser kinds adhere,
And watery realms the funny natives cheer.
The ant and mole their downward courses guide;
And deep intrench'd, a gloomy race reside:
And bees their artful palaces contrive
In the close cavern of their darksome hive.
"Pleas'd, to his destined mansion each is prone; Form'd best to suit, and best approve, his own."

See Browne's Essay, u. s. where the argument for the habitability of the planets is very ingeniously pleaded; and, in my opinion, satisfactorily proved.

sun's heat which we feel, I am not sure whether the hundredth part of our heat will amount to any degree of positive or real cold, without the co-efficiency of some other positive and real cause; and it is not difficult, I think, to conceive that the constitution of his atmosphere may be such as to make that planet a mild and temperate clime. And if there be any weight in this reasoning, it will not be hard to apply it to the inferior planets, Mercury and Venus. For we sometimes feel the heat of our summer as much qualified by some different cause as the rigour of our winter." (b)

6. Mercury being very considerably nigher the sun than we, the dusk of that illustrious object, viewed by a Mercurian spectator, appears (as is computed) seven times larger than it does to us.—Thus, the nearer we spiritually dwell to God, the more glorious does Christ, both as a divine person and as a Mediator, shine to the eye of faith. They who unhappily entertain low and degrading ideas of Jesus, give but too infallible demonstration that they themselves are far, extremely far, removed from the light of Jehovah's truth, and from the warmth of Jehovah's grace.

7. Mercury's appearances (like those of our moon) are (c) various, according to his situation in respect of the sun. Sometimes he seems quite dark; at others falcated, or horned; and sometimes shining fully, or with a hemisphere entirely illuminated.—In the present stages of spiritual experience, the believer's interior comfort and his exterior lustre greatly depend on the position of his heart toward the uncreated sun of righteousness. How obscure and benighted are our views, and how languid our exercise of grace, when an unbelieving, a worldly, or a careless spirit interrupts our walk with God! But if the out-goings of our souls are to him, and if the in-pourings of his blessed influence be felt, we glow, we kindle, we burn, we shine. This may be called (to borrow an astronomical phrase) our superior conjunction with the sun; and at those distinguished seasons of peace and joy in the Holy Ghost,

Clearly we see and win our way,
Shining unto the perfect day,
And more than conquer all."

1. Next beyond the orbit of Mercury is that of Venus, a planet not so respectable for her magnitude as for her beauty, arising from the brilliancy, the clearness, and the steadiness of her light. A very accomplished (d) astronomer observes that "Venus is the brightest when she is about 40 degrees removed from the sun; at which time only a part of her lucid disk is to be seen from the earth. In this situation Venus has been many times seen in the day-time, and even in full sun-shine. This beauty and brightness of Venus are very admirable, who, having no native light of her own, and only enjoying the borrowed light of the sun, should yet break forth into so great a lustre, that the like is not to be observed in Jupiter, nor even in our moon when she is in the same elevation from the sun. It is true the moon's light is (to our view) much greater, on account of her apparent magnitude, than that of Venus, yet it is but a dull and, as it were, a dead light, which has nothing in it of the vigour and briskness that always accompany the beams of Venus."—Thus should the ministers of Christ shine with gospel-light derived from him, and irradiate the visible church with the purest and most vivid beams of celestial truth. In allusion to this part of their character, our Lord styles his messengers the light of the world, the candles in the midst of the churches, and the stars which he holds in his right hand. In point of steadiness and of consistency, and of communicativeness to others, they should resemble the suns, or fixed stars, which never deviate from their spheres, but impart unwavering and unremitting light to all around them. In point of zeal, and of activity, and of indefatigableness in their holy calling, they should, like the planetary globes, without cessation and without weariness, pursue their shining course, and, conformably to the maxim of Julius Cæsar,

"Think nothing done while aught remains to do." (e)

2. In this respect Venus is a pattern both to ministers and to private believers. She rolls round the sun in about 225 days, which constitute her year, and at the rate of 70,000 miles an hour; which exceeds the velocity of the earth's annual motion by about 10,000 miles an hour. Thus this exemplary planet connects the most pleasing graces of lustre and delicacy with all the ardour of diligence and rapidity; like some elegant and industrious lady, who crowns the charms of personal beauty with the still more valuable services of domestic housewifery.

3. Besides her yearly tour around the sun, it is more than probable that Venus performs a regular revolution about her own axis. From the maculae, or spots, which, in the years 1665 and 1666, Cassini and Campani discovered on her surface, (f) those two philosophers have ascertained the reality of her diurnal motion, which diurnal motion she accomplishes in about 23 days; so that one of her days is equal to 23 of ours. One duty should not be permitted to supersede another. There are personal duties which we owe to ourselves, no less than relative duties which we ought to exercise toward our neighbours. Connect the two together in your own practice, and you will exhibit a moral exemplification of the harmony with which Venus and the other moving spheres accomplish their compound (i. e. their annual and diurnal) rotations, without any shadow of competition or interference.

‘On their own axis as the planets run,
Yet make at once their circle round the sun;
So two consistent motions act the soul,
And one regards itself, and one the whole.’ (g)

But be it carefully remembered, that as the sun is the ultimate and common centre of all the planetary movements, so we shall never be able to discharge our various personal and social duties acceptably to God, in spirit and in truth, until his glory is the grand and sole end of all the works and duties we perform, whether immediately referable to ourselves or others. “As unto the Lord, and not [merely] unto men,” least of all for the pleasing or aggrandizing of that wretched thing called self, may stand as the universal motto to every virtue that is truly Christian and evangelical.

4. Venus, though so justly admired for her beauty, and celebrated for her lustre, still has her dark side. When this is turned toward our earth, her rays are no longer beheld, and she herself becomes invisible.—As each believer, shine he ever so brightly, is at present sanctified but in part, need we wonder if, on some occasions, the splendour of his gifts and the radiancy of his graces suffer a temporary eclipse? At such times let our candour and forbearance have their perfect work. After a certain period Venus will emerge from the shade and beam forth in all the loveliness of her usual lustre; and when the declining saint has sat his appointed time in darkness, the Lord will again be a light unto him. Happy is that benighted soul whose faith (for it is the peculiar business of faith’s eye to see in the dark) can pierce the gloom, anticipate the return of day, and long for a final approximation to the sun of righteousness in that world of glory where no more cloud nor darkness shall obscure our views, tarnish our graces, or damp our joys for ever.

5. The solar light and heat on Venus are estimated to be four times greater than on the planet inhabited by us. Why? Because her distance from the source of both is considerably less than ours.—In like manner bright evidences and warm experiences of our interest in Christ, and of the work of his Spirit upon our souls, are generally the blessed consequences of living near to God, and of walking closely with him in all holy conversation, prayer, and watchful godliness. The joy and liveliness of grace (though not grace itself) may be sinned away. Spiritual comfort is a tender plant, and requires much delicacy of treatment. To be triumphant and alert in the ways of God, you must take equal heed of wandering and of slumbering.

6. Venus’s orbit, or path of rotation, is, for the most part, extremely regular, hardly any point of it being more remote from the sun than another. Hence this planet is remarkable for always preserving nearly an equal distance from that luminary. Similar is the experience of some believers. They enjoy rather an even and settled peace, than any exuberant overflowings of consolation. Their habitation is mostly on the middle region of Mount Tabor, instead of being now elevated to the summit, and anon turned down into the valley below. The manner is not always exactly the same in which the Holy Spirit trains his disciples to a meetness for their heavenly inheritance. Like a judicious and careful tutor, he wisely and condescendingly adapts his modes of instruction to the genius and to the particular improvement of each individual pupil, until, having taken their appointed degree in grace, they ascend, one by one, to their glorious home above.

7. Venus is in size somewhat less than our earth, and yet contains about the same quantity of matter, though in a smaller compass. In other words, the body of Venus is denser than that of the earth, as being so much nearer the sun. Appearances are not the invariable standard of intrinsic worth. Our globe, which is undeniably larger, or occupies more space than Venus, is not more wealthy, in constituent particles, than she. Her’s lie closer together than our’s, and therefore make less show. Our’s are less compact, or compressed, than her’s, and therefore swell into a greater visible magnitude.

8. It is probable that Venus, like Mercury, has no attending satellite, or moon. Cassini, indeed, in the last century, thought he had discovered one; but he seems to have been mistaken. Venus's vicinity to the sun seems to render the services of such a companion unnecessary. Just as, in the world of the blessed, the saints will need no ministry of the word, nor other means of grace, because they will then walk in the light of the Lamb, and, with open face, behold the glory of the Lord.

(f) See Chambers, on the word Venus.

(g) Pope’s Essay on Man, Epist. 3.

9. Towards the beginning of the present century, Monsieur De la Hire descried some mountains in Venus, which, on accurate investigation, he found to be considerably larger, not only than the largest on earth, but than even the largest mountains hitherto discovered in the (h) moon itself. Does any man ask, "Wherefore, and for the accommodation of what intelligent beings is the surface of Venus, like those of the earth or the moon, diversified with mountains, vallies, and plains?" The only answer which can at present be returned is, that the Almighty Creator both wrought and continues to order all things according to the counsel of his own will, which will is but another name for infinite rectitude and unerring wisdom, operating, by sovereign and omnipotent power, through the fittest means, and to the noblest ends.

10. During part of the year Venus smiles as a (i) morning star, considered in which capacity she was called by the Greeks, Phosphorus, and by the Latins, Lucifer, both which appellations signify a brighter light. She never acts in this character, nor sustains this appellation, except when she is rather to the westward of the sun, and consequently rises before he does. Then, and then only, it is that she sparkles as the mild and beauteous harbinger of the day. When she is to the eastward of the sun, and sets after his disappearance, she enters on her short vesperian regency, and shines by the name of Hesperus, or the evening-star. Milton has given us a fine description of her under this title:—

"————— Now glow'd the firmament
 " With living sapphires: Hesperus, that led
 " The starry host, rode brightest, till the moon,
 " Rising in clouded majesty, at length
 " Apparent queen, unveil'd her peerless light,
 " And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw." (k)

(h) "The lunar mountains are much higher, in proportion to the body of the moon, than any mountain upon our globe (for the geometers can take the height of them as easily as they can find the measure of a mountain upon our earth.) The height of St. Katharine's Hill in the moon is nine miles, which is three miles higher than the tops of our highest hills on earth." Keill, Lect. x.

For the manner by which the height of the lunar mountains is measured and demonstrated, see Keill, ibid., and also Derham's Astro Theology, book v. chap. 2. Note i.

Again:

"The sun was sunk; and, after him, the star
 " Of Hesperus, whose office is to bring " Twilight upon the earth: short arbiter
 " Of day and night." (l)

Thus this lovely planet, like a ready and faithful friend, hastens to bring us the good news of approaching sunshine; and at other times, like a disinterested brother, that is born to soften our adversity, stays with us when the sun has left us; exerting the utmost of its light, to cheer the widowed earth, and to brighten the gloom of the incumbering shades.

11. There is another particular, whereby Venus preaches an important lesson to the followers of Christ, viz. that the earth was never yet known to come between her and the sun. Whence the languor and the spiritual declensions, the darkness, and the soul distresses of many a child of light? Come they not, very frequently, from giving way to earthly cares, earthly joys, and earthly pursuits? No wonder that we move heavily and walk in "the dark, while we cultivate that friendship with this world which is enmity with God." (m) But if, on the contrary, our affections are set on the things above; if our treasure and our hearts are with Christ in heaven, we shall probably walk in the light, as he is in the light, and enjoy an abiding perception of interest in his precious blood, which cleanseth from all sin. With regard to our worldly accommodations, if his kind providence vouchsafes to give us a competency as may enable us to pay turnpikes, and to do some good to others, as we travel through the wilderness, we are rich, amply rich, to all the real purposes of sublunary happiness.

OBSERVATIONS AND REFLECTIONS. (n)

ABASEMENT.

THE sweetest seasons on this side heaven are, when the soul sinks as into nothing before the face of God, and is absorbed in the sight of Christ and the love of the Spirit: when we feel the presence of Deity, and silently wait on him, at the foot of the cross,

(i) This year (1777) Venus was the evening star until June 1, from which day she became the morning star, and will continue so to the end of the year.

(k) Paradise Lost, book iv. (l) Ibid. book ix.

(m) James iv. 4.

(n) These considerations by Mr. Toplady, and the extracts, are arranged under their respective heads. Diamonds never appear so splendid as when set in a crown. However, when thrown in confusion they are still jewels: and, therefore, worth the gathering. From these brilliants a bouquet is made up, for the gratification of the reader. EDITOR.

with weeping eyes, melting affections, and bleeding hearts.

When Christ entered into Jerusalem, the people spread their garments in the way. When he enters into our hearts, we pull off our own righteousness, and not only lay it under Christ's feet, but even trample upon it ourselves.

ACCEPTANCE.

What coming and what returning sinner need despair of acceptance? No man can be worse than St. Paul was before his conversion; and no man can be worse than St. Peter was after his conversion.

ACTIONS.

Where scripture is totally silent concerning the lawfulness or unlawfulness of any action, consult the book of your own conscience, and follow its dictates. Observe also, what does, or does not, tend to take off from your mind that exquisite sense of divine love which a believer would ever wish to cultivate and cherish.

AFFECTIONS.

A believer's affections are, too often, like a cascade, or waterfall, that flows downward; instead of being like a fountain, which rises and shoots upwards toward heaven.

AFFLICTIONS.

If you thoroughly exhaust a vessel of the air it contains, the pressure of the air on the outside will break that vessel into (perhaps) millions of pieces; because there is not a sufficiency of air within to resist and counteract the weight of the atmosphere from without. A person who is exercised by severe affliction, and who does not experience the divine comforts and supports in his soul, resembles the exhausted receiver above described; and it is no wonder if he yields, and is broken to shivers, under the weight of God's providential hand. But affliction to one who is sustained by the inward presence of the Holy Ghost, resembles the aerial pressure on the outer surface of an unexhausted vessel. There is that within which supports it, and which preserves it from being destroyed by the incumbent pressure from without.

Some persons are apt to walk in their sleep. They are said to be effectually cured of this dangerous habit by only once horse-whipping them soundly until they awake. God's people are apt to doze, and run themselves into danger; on which Providence takes the horsewhip of affliction, and brings them to themselves. Was he to spare the rod, his children would be spoiled.

The world is a sea of glass, affliction scatters our path with sand and ashes and gravel, in order to keep our feet from sliding.

In a long sunshine of outward prosperity, the dust of our inward corruptions is apt to fly about and lift itself up. Sanctified affliction, like seasonable rain, lays the dust, and softens the soul, and keeps us from carrying our heads too high.

The earth must be ploughed, and sown, and harrowed, and weeded, and endure many frosty nights and scorching days, in order to its being made and preserved fruitful. Gentle showers, soft dews, and moderate sun-shine will not suffice always. So it is with the soul of a fruitful Christian.

A person was lately observing of some fine ornamental china on his chimney-piece, that the "elegance of its figures, and the perpetuity of its colours were owing to its having been consolidated by passing through the fire." Is not the same remark applicable to the afflicted people of God?

ANTINOMIANS.

Christ is still crucified between two thieves; Antinomianism and Pharisaism.

ARMINIANS.

I much question whether the man that dies an Arminian can go to heaven. But certainly he will not be an Arminian when he is in heaven. The employ of the blessed is to cast their crowns at the feet of God and the Lamb, and to sing, "Not unto us, O Lord."

Should it be thought harsh to question the salvation of one who dies under the blindness of Arminianism; as if a man who only robs God in part might miss of glory; let it be considered that, even on earth, if a person robs me only of my watch, or of a single guinea, he has forfeited his life to the law, as much as if he had robbed me of all I am worth.

The old Arminians mentioned in scripture are blamed for thinking wickedly that God was such an one as themselves; but our new Arminians out-sin their predecessors, and actually represent God as a being in many respects considerably inferior to themselves. They suppose him both to form schemes with less wisdom, and to execute them with less power, spirit, and success, than a prime minister of common sense forms and executes his. They dare ascribe to God such impotence, blunders, imperfections and disappointments, as they would blush to ascribe to a Ximenes, or a Sully.

Arminians consider the grace that is inspired into a true believer's heart, as a text of scripture written upon a pane of glass, liable to be demolished by the first hand that flings a stone at it.

All the disputes between us and the Arminians may be reduced to these two questions: 1. Is God dependant on man, or is man dependant on God? 2. Is man a debtor to God, or God a debtor to man?

When the Arminians foolishly affirm concerning the will of an unregenerate man, viz., that "its liberty consists in an indifference to good or evil, like a balance in equal poise;" holds true of a regenerate man in some circumstances, and in some respect, viz., that a person who is happily resigned to God's providential disposals, may (in point of absolute acquiescence) be said to have his will in equilibrio, i. e. he wishes to be quite conformed to the divine pleasure, and to incline neither to prosperity nor adversity, life nor death, but is desirous that God's own hand may incline the scale. We are never truly contented, nor of (course) truly happy, until God and we have but one will between us.

The Arminians think, that in conversion God does little or nothing for men, but gives them a pull by the elbow, to awake them from their sleep. Rather, he acts as maritime officers do by their sailors; he cuts down the hammock of carnal security in which the elect are; down they fall, and the bruises and surprise they receive awaken them from their death in sin, and bring them to themselves whether they will or no.

According to Arminianism, grace has the name, but free-will has the game.

Arminians suppose God to give us heaven, as the king grants a brief for building a church. The brief runs, "We have granted our most gracious letters patent." But these same most gracious letters are amply paid for before they are granted. No fee, no brief.

Some people (especially the Arminians) seem to speak of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Established Church, as if those articles were like Mr. Van Bushel's newly-invented elastic garters, which are so contrived by springs, that they will accommodate and fit themselves to any leg that should wear them.

Arminians will ask, "Where's the use of preaching the doctrines of grace, even supposing them to be true? since we may go to heaven without a clear knowledge of them." And a man may go to heaven with broken bones; yet it is better to go thither in a whole skin. A man may get to his journey's end, though it rain and thunder all the way; yet it is more comfortable to travel in fair weather. You or I might make a better shift to live upon a scanty allowance of bread and water; yet, surely, an easy fortune, and a decent table are, in themselves, abundantly preferable to poverty and short commons. Who would wish to go upon thorns when his way may be strewn with roses?

Where is the difference between Arminianism and Epicurism? To suppose a fortuitous concurrence of incidents is no less Atheistical than to suppose a fortuitous concurrence of atoms.

I can compare some ranting Arminian preachers, who represent salvation as a matter of chance, and press men to help forward their own conversion, upon pain of damnation, to none so well as to auctioneers; who, with the hammer in their hands, are always bawling out, "Now is your time; now is your time: a-going, a-going, a-going."

Such a method is equally inconsistent with the analogy of faith, and subversive of the majesty of the gospel. Shall I order a dead soul to awake, and raise itself to life? Let me rather address the living God, and say, "Awake, and put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord! Breathe on these slain, that they may live!"

ASSURANCE.

It is not deemed presumptuous for the favourites of an earthly king to know and be conscious that they are so; and why should it be deemed presumptuous for the favourites of God to be assured of his love?

BELIEVER.

A truly enlightened believer (i. e. one who has a clear view of gospel privileges, and makes conscience of gospel duties), stands between two fires; the pharisees call him an Antinomian, and the real Antinomians call him a pharisee.

There is a true and sound sense in which we may say that a true believer may live as he will; for it is the prevailing will and desire of every real believer to live only to the glory of God. He is not a Christian who doth not delight in the law of God, after the inner man.

BIBLE.

To unconverted persons, a great part of the Bible resembles a letter written in cypher. The blessed Spirit's office is to act as God's decypherer by letting his people into the secret of celestial experience, as the key and clue to those sweet mysteries of grace, which were before as a garden shut up, or as a fountain sealed, or as a book written in an unknown character.

Whenever I preach from any passage in the Book of Canticles, or in the Book of Revelation, I consider myself as standing on ground peculiarly consecrated and mysterious. The scripture in general may be considered as the temple at large : but these two books as the holy of holies.

The most convincing argument, and most infallible demonstration that the scriptures are indeed the word of God, is to feel their enlivening, enlightening, and transforming power in our hearts.

BIGOTS.

Bigots are stiff, straitened, and confined ; like Egyptian mummies, which are bound round with thousands of yards of ribbon.

Bigots are like some trees that grow by the sea shore, which do not spread their branches equally on all sides, but are blown awry, and stand entirely one way.

Bigots (like Nebuchadnezzar), if you fall not down at the word of command, before whatever image they set up, consign you at once to the burning fiery furnace.

CALL.

The largeness of the gospel (more properly termed, the ministerial) call does by no means imply the universality of grace. A fisher throws his net into the sea at large ; not from an expectation of catching all the fishes that are in the sea, but with a view of catching as many as he can. And this is the end of indefinitely preaching to all.

CAPTIOUS HEARERS.

Wherever there is a Paul to preach, there will be a Tertullus to find fault.

CAVILLING.

Some people can no more help cavilling at the doctrines of grace, than some dogs can help howling at the sound of a trumpet.

CHRIST ALONE.

The house that is built partly on a rock, and partly on the sand, will fall ; and the sinner who rests his hope of salvation partly on Christ, and partly on his own works, will be damned.

You may as well trust in the supposed merits and pretended intercession of the Virgin Mary, or other saints departed, as trust in your own good works, prayers, or any thing you can do and suffer, either as a compensation to God's justice for your sins, or as conducive toward your acceptance and salvation.

CHRIST'S PURCHASE.

It is a common saying, that " He who buys land, buys stones," and all the weeds and rubbish which belong to the soil.— When Christ accepted of us in the decree of election (when the Father gave and made us over to him), and when he bought us afterwards with his blood ; he took us with all our imperfections and wretchedness, for better for worse, as a bridegroom takes his bride, and as a purchaser buys an estate.

CHRISTIAN GRACES.

Wrap up ever so good a flint in silk or satin, and not a spark of its latent fire will appear. But bruise it with a hammer, or strike it with a steel, the dormant sparks will shew themselves. In prosperity the graces of a saint too often lie hid. In adversity they shine forth with light and heat, like a flint in collision with a steel.

CONFIDENCE.

If a merchant of incontestible opulence and honesty gives me his note of hand binding himself to pay me so much money ; I have no reason to fear a failure of payment. " Mr. ——— is a person of vast wealth, and of as great integrity : my money, therefore, is as sure as if I had it in my pocket." Thus we reason concerning human things.

Give the same implicit credit to God's promises. We have it in his own writing, under his own hand and seal, that " Every one who believeth shall have everlasting life ;" and " Whoso cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out," &c. &c. Do not dishonour God's note of hand, by letting unbelief question either his ability or his veracity. Do not withhold from the God of heaven and earth that confidence which, in many cases, you cannot withhold from man.

CONSEQUENCES.

I am resolved, in the strength of grace, to preach all the truths of the gospel so far as I know them ; and leave God to take care of consequences.

CONTEMPT.

To expose ourselves to worldly contempt and persecution for Christ's sake, is like going into the cold bath. At first it gives us a shock ; but it grows easier and easier every time ; until, by degrees, it ceases to be disagreeable.

CONTROVERSY.

It is in the Church as it is with nations : war must sometimes be carried on, in order to establish a sound and durable peace at last.

One moment's communion with God is worth all the controversial volumes in the world

CONVERSE.

A Christian too conversant with people of the world, resembles a bright piece of plate too much exposed to the air: which though in reality it continues plate still, yet grows tarnished and loses its fine burnish, and needs a fresh cleansing and rubbing up.

DARKNESS.

When a saint is in darkness all his expedients for delivering himself out of it are vain: they are literally dark lanterns, and will not afford him a single gleam to see by. The day will not dawn nor the shadows flee away until the sun of righteousness arises with healing in his wings. And we can no more command the rising of the spiritual sun within, than we can that of the natural sun without. We can only, like Paul's mariners, cast anchor and wish for day.

DEATH.

Believers should not have a slavish dread of death. Where is the infant that is afraid to go to sleep in its nurse's arms?

In those countries that are the seat of war, it is common to see a fine field of standing corn flourishing one hour and laid waste the next; when a party of the enemy have cut down, with their swords, what was ripening for the sickle, and given that to their horses for fodder which the husbandman hoped would repay him for his toil.—So does death, sickness or unforeseen disappointment, frequently disconcert our worldly schemes; and blast our expectations in a moment. Man turneth to his dust, and then all his thoughts perish.

To a true believer, death is but going to Church: from the Church below to the Church above.

A man would not be sorry to be ejected from a cottage in order to his living in a palace: and yet how apt we are to fear death, which to a child of God is but the writ of ejection that turns him out of a prison, and transmits him to his apartments at court!

I have known many a believer go weeping to the river of death; but I never knew a believer go weeping all the way through it.

Even an earthly parent is particularly tender and careful of a dying child. Much more will the great and gracious Father of the elect support, cherish and defend his own children in the hour of death.

The world is a nursery of elect sinners. At death God transplants them, one by one, into the garden above; and fills up their places below with a fresh succession of spiritual trees.

The Church of the elect, which is partly militant on earth, and partly triumphant in heaven, resembles a city built on both sides of a river. There is but the stream of death between grace and glory.

Death to God's people is but a ferry-boat. Every day and every hour the boat pushes off with some of the saints, and returns for more.

DENOMINATIONS.

You may have seen the children of some fruitful family walking to church all clothed in a different colour. Yet are they all children of one parent; all brothers and sisters. So the various denominations of God's believing people.

DEPENDENCE.

The best watchfulness I know of is a continued looking to, and dependence on the grace of God's Holy Spirit, from moment to moment.

DIGNITY of the Children of GOD.

God's people below are kings incog. They are travelling disguised like pilgrims to their dominions above.—Once a king unto God always so: God does not make kings for the devil to unmake at his pleasure.—If you are spiritual kings, be holy. Should I meet a person all in dirt and rags, I should be mad was I to take that person for a king or a queen. Nor can I believe you to be royally descended, or crowned for the skies, unless you carry the marks of royalty in your life and conversation.—If any of God's anointed kings so far forget their dignity as to live in sin; their throne will shake; the crown will tremble on their heads; they will be driven from their palace for a time, like David, when he fled from Absalom, and went weeping over the brook Kidron. But like David, they shall be brought back again to Jerusalem (for Christ will not lose the purchase of his blood): though not until they have severely smarted for it.

God's people are kings and priests, Rev. i. 6.

1. As kings they are (1.) ordained to a kingdom of glory; and in the mean while, have an internal kingdom of holiness and happiness. (2.) They are anointed with the Holy Ghost. (3.) They are crowned. The doctrines of the gospel are the Church's crown and ornament, Rev. iii. 11. and xii. 1. (4.) They have the sceptre of God's strength to lean upon (5.) And a globe also. They only truly enjoy even present life. Earthly kings hold a globe in their hands; but the spiritual kings have the globe under their feet. (6.) They have robes. The inner robe of sanctification; and the outer robe of Christ's righteousness for justification before God, Psalm xlv. (7.)

They have their guards: angels, grace, providence.

Before conversion they are reges designati, kings elect; after it reges de facto, actual kings.

2. As priests, they are devoted to God, and set apart for his service by a spiritual ordination. Here is a truly indelible character conferred: when the Holy Ghost lays the hand of his grace, not only upon the sinner's head, but upon the sinner's heart.—They offer up spiritual and moral sacrifices.—They pray.—They are blessers both in will and in act.

Inward holiness and eternal glory are the crown with which God adorns and dignifies his elect. But they are not the cause of election. A king is not made a king by the royal robes he wears, and by the crown that encircles his brow: but he therefore wears his robes, and puts on his crown because he is a king.

DISCRIMINATING GRACE.

Many pharisaical censures have been passed on such of God's ministers and people as have rejoiced at the indubitable, though late, conversion of Mr. D——s. (o) Let those unfeeling professors who carp and murmur at that, and similar displays of the Holy Spirit's condescending goodness and power, remember that they themselves, with their entire mock trappings of imaginary excellence and inherent perfection must be unfrocked of all, and trust in the above righteousness of Jesus with brokenness of heart, or they will never enter the paradise of God; the holiest saint stands exactly on the same level with the vilest of mankind, in point of merit, and has just as much righteousness (i. e. absolutely none at all) to qualify him for an interest in Christ, and for justification with the Father.

May not God have mercy on whom he willeth to have mercy, without asking leave of men or angels? Is not his grace totally and infinitely free? and may not he bestow his own blessing when and where he pleases? Let not our eye then be evil and envious because his is gracious? Away, then, with these anti-christian bickerings, and let none who call themselves believers, be sorry for that which makes angels glad.

DISPOSITIONS.

Some believers are very rude and very ignorant. Grace, in the hearts of sour, unpolished people, resembles a jewel of gold in a swine's snout.

DISPUTANTS.

Disputing, captious, bigotted people, do but pump themselves dry.

Unfair disputants are ever for dwelling on the most unfavourable side of an argument; like the blundering painter, who being to take the profile of a lady that had lost an eye, very injudiciously drew her blind side.

Cavilling publications are not always to be regarded. Who would be at the pains to kill an insect of a day? Let the poor creature alone, and it will soon die of itself. Do not make it considerable by taking notice of it. If a child of four years old comes against me with a straw, that is no reason I should knock him down with the poker.

DIVINE LOVE.

The terrors of the law have much the same effect on our duties and obedience as frost has on a stream: it hardens, cools, and stagnates. Whereas, let the shining of divine love rise upon the soul; repentance will then flow, our hardness and coldness thaw and melt away, and all the blooming fruits of godliness flourish and abound.

DIVINE JUSTICE.

To the humble, self-emptied, self-re-nouncing sinner, even the sword of Divine Justice is a curtana, a sword of mercy, a sword without a point.

DYING.

As the setting of the sun appears of greater magnitude, and his beams of richer gold, than when he is in his meridian; so a dying believer is usually richer in experience, stronger in grace, and brighter in his evidences for heaven, than a living one.

When a person is going into a foreign land where he never was before, it is comfortable for him to consider, "Though I am embarking for an unknown country, yet it is a place where I have many friends, who are already settled there: so that I shall be, in fact, at home the instant I get thither."—How sweet for a dying believer to reflect that, though he is yet a stranger in the world of spirits, still the world of spirits are no strangers to him. God, his Father, is there. Christ, his Saviour, is there.—Angels, his elect brethren, are there. Saints, who've got home before him, are there; and more will follow him every day. He has the blood and righteousness of Christ for his letters of recommendation, and the Holy Spirit for his introducer. He also goes upon express invitation from the King of the country.

ELECTION.

The book of life, or decree of election,

(o) A person executed for forgery.

is the marriage-register of the saints; in which their everlasting espousal to Christ stands indelibly recorded by the pen of God's free and eternal love.

As the bullion of which money is made is the king's property even before it is struck into coin, and before it visibly bears the royal image and superscription; so the unregenerate elect are God's own heritage, though they do not appear to be such, until the Holy Spirit has made them pass through the mint of effectual calling, and actually stamped them into current coin for the kingdom of heaven.

The elect were betrothed to Christ from everlasting in the covenant of grace; they are actually married to him, and join hands with him, in conversion; but they are not taken home to the bridegroom's house until death dismisses them from the body.

ENVY.

Poor people envy the rich, and rich people envy the poor. Why? Because neither of them are privy to the troubles of the other. Unconverted persons (i. e. the far greater part of mankind) go on envying each other's imaginary happiness, and snarling under their own crosses. And so the world goes round.

EPITAPH.

Little more can be said concerning the generality of men, than that they lived, and sinned, and died. But concerning all God's people it may be said that they lived, were converted, preserved to the end, and went to heaven.

EVIDENCE.

Many of the enemies to God's truths, when they are silenced by the force of evidence, do, like a snail provoked, draw in their horns and spit.

EXPERIENCES.

If a person who has been long in possession of a large estate comes, in process of time to have his title disputed, he rummages every corner of his scutore, and of his strong boxes, to find the original deeds; which, having found, he appeals to as authentic vouchers.

Thus past experiences of the grace of God, though not proper to be rested in, may yet be recollected with comfort, and referred to with advantage, by a deserted saint in an hour of doubt and darkness.

We cannot heartily love the distinguishing truths of the gospel, without experiencing them, and we cannot experience them without loving them.

FAITH.

Faith in God's promises may be compared to a bank note; full and felt possession of the blessings promised is like ready cash. The man who has bank-notes to any given value, looks upon himself as possessed of so much money, though, in reality, it is only so much paper. Thus faith is as satisfied, and rests with as great complacency in the promises of Jehovah, as if it had all the blessings of grace and glory in hand. In faith's estimation, God's note is current coin.

Weak faith says, "God can save me if he will." Strong faith says, "God both can and will save me." See Dan. iii. 17.

What can be more feeble than the ivy, the jessamine, or the vine? Yet these, by the assistance of their tendrils, or claspers, rise and are supported until they sometimes mount as high as the tree or the wall that sustains them. So the weak believer, laying hold on Jesus by the tendril of faith, rises into the fulness of God, defies the invading storm, and becomes as a fruitful vine upon the wall of an house.

Under the influence of the blessed Spirit, faith produces holiness, and holiness strengthens faith. Faith, like a fruitful parent, is plenteous in all good works; and good works, like dutiful children, confirm and add to the support of faith.

Faith is the eye of the soul, and the Holy Spirit's influence is the light by which it sees.

FEARS.

In the hands of a skilful husbandman even weeds are turned to good account. When rooted up and burnt, they are good manure, and conduce to fertilize the land they annoyed before. So the doubts and fears, and the infirmities of the elect are overruled by Almighty grace, to their present and eternal good: as conducing to keep us humble at God's footstool, to endeavor the merits of Jesus, and to make us feel our weakness and dependance, and to render us watchful unto prayer.

I have known several wealthy persons who, contrary to all sense and reason, have teased and harassed themselves with a fear that they should at last come to want. Equally, nay, infinitely more absurd and groundless, are the doubts of those who have fled to the righteousness and blood of Christ for salvation. Such must be in a state of grace; they must and infallibly are accepted of God; and they certainly shall persevere to the end. They who think themselves the poorest in spiritual things, are immensely rich, without knowing it. But such is the state of man below, that if God does not lay crosses upon us we are sure to create crosses for ourselves.

FLATTERY.

Flattery is nectar and ambrosia to little minds. They drink it in, and enjoy it, like an old woman sucking metheglin through a quill.

FORBEARANCE.

As I would not throw away my watch for varying a few minutes from the exact point of time; so neither would I disclaim a regenerate person for his not in every thing exactly thinking with me. Christians are no more infallible than watches.

FREE GIFTS.

If a person of exalted rank and vast opulence desires you to make his house your home, and you avail yourself of the invitation, would it not affront him, if you was to offer at paying him for the accommodations? What greater affront can be offered to the majesty of God, than to imagine that he sets his favours to sale, and that you must pay him for admitting you into the kingdom of grace and glory?

Christ has received gifts for men, and bestows the gifts he has received. God grant, that we may, if I may so speak, give him continual receipts for these gifts, from time to time, in large returns of love and duty, thankfulness and obedience!

“Get grace—get faith—get an interest in Christ,” say the Arminians. When, in truth, grace is not of man’s getting, but of God’s giving; nor is faith of man’s acquisition, but of God’s operation.

FREE-WILL.

A man’s free-will cannot cure him even of the tooth ache, or of a sore finger; and yet he madly thinks it is in its power to cure his soul.

The greatest judgment which God himself can, in the present life, inflict upon a man is, to leave him in the hand of his own boasted free-will.

Look where you will, and you will generally find that free-willers are very free livers.

GENEROSITY.

Even among men, if a generous antagonist has his adversary down, he will spare his life. If God, O sinner, has humbled thee, and thrown thee down, he will not kill thee, but spare thee, and give thee quarter, raise thee up, and save thee.

GOD AS A FATHER.

God, who knows the unfaithfulness of the human heart, will not trust his grace to the keeping of his own people; if he did, they would soon make havock of it, like the prodigal son. He therefore acts by them as a prudent father would make provision for an extravagant child, viz. not by giving them the stock to manage for themselves; but by leaving it in trust, to be dealt out to them, from time to time, by stated allowance.

GOD ALL SUFFICIENT.

We will suppose that some opulent person makes the tour of Europe. If his money falls short, he comforts himself with reflecting, that he has a sufficient stock in bank, which he can draw out at any time by writing to his cashiers. This is just the case, spiritually, with God’s people. They are travellers in a foreign land, remote from home. Their treasure is in heaven, and God himself is their banker. When their graces seem to be almost spent and exhausted, when the barrel of meal and the cruise of oil appear to be failing; they need but draw upon God by prayer and faith and humble waiting. The Holy Spirit will honour their bill at sight; and issue to them, from time to time, sufficient remittances to carry them to their journey’s end.

GOD’S SOVEREIGNTY.

A Practical Discourse, by ELISHA COLES.

It would be entirely needless, to say any thing in favour of a book which has given such profitable and universal satisfaction to God’s people, of all denominations, for almost a century past: it will, and must ever be considered, as one of the choicest treasures which the God of infinite wisdom has vouchsafed to his Church. Since the days of the Apostles, it is a work calculated for the instruction, establishment, and consolation of little children, of young men, and of fathers in Christ. Would the newly awakened penitent, the advanced convert, and the repenting saint, wish to read merely for the sake of seeing the light of truth, of feeling the warmth of grace, and of rising into the holy image of God, let them make Elisha Coles their companion, their guide, and their own familiar friend.

O ye believers in Jesus, whom God has intrusted with any thing above a bare sufficiency of this world’s good, seize the opportunity of furnishing the poor and needy with a book, the best calculated of almost any other to extend the knowledge of gospel salvation, to diffuse the fragrance of gospel comfort, to elevate the glorious standard of gospel grace, and to promote the vital interests of gospel holiness and good works.

GOOD WORKS.

Good works, like the golden ear-rings of the Israelites, are valuable in themselves; but if once exalted into a golden calf, to be worshipped and relied upon, are damnably pernicious.

GOSPEL.

The bite of the tarantula (an Italian spider) can only be cured by music. Nor can any thing heal the wounds which sin and Satan have made in the soul, but the music of the gospel; the sweet, harmonious, and joyful sound of free salvation by the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ alone.

GRACE.

A true believer lives upon free grace as his necessary food. And, indeed, he who has really tasted the sweetness of grace, can live upon nothing else.

There is no difference between the brightest archangel in glory and the blackest apostate spirit in hell, but what free-grace has made.

If I might not have both, I would rather nave grace without learning, than learning without grace. I would infinitely rather be a Bunyan than a Grotius.

Grace cannot be severed from its fruits. If God gives you St. Paul's faith, you will soon have St. James's works.

The graces of God's Spirit in our hearts resemble, during the present life, the citrons and other noble fruits imported from abroad: we have them, but not in perfection. Our graces will ever be defective, until we get to heaven, the country where they grow.

Gifts may differ: but grace, as such, is the same in all God's people. Just as some pieces of money are of gold, some of silver, others of copper; but they all agree in bearing the king's image and inscription.

The way to heaven lies, not over a toll-bridge, but over a free-bridge: even the unmerited grace of God in Christ Jesus.

We may not be proud of grace, but we ought to be glad of grace.

Good works cannot go before regeneration. Effectual grace is that which builds the soul into an habitation of God. Holy tempers and holy obedience are the furniture of the house. And a house must be built before it can be furnished.

Grace finds us beggars, and always leaves us debtors.

GRACE AND GLORY.

Inherent grace below resembles silver in the ore, which, though genuine silver, is mingled with much earth and dross: glory above resembles silver refined to its proper standard, and wrought into vessels of the most exquisite workmanship.

GREEK TESTAMENT.

The Greek Testament is, beyond all competition, the most important volume in the world. The inexhaustible richness of its contents, and its unequalled beauties as a composition, are such as must for ever exalt its worth infinitely above that of all other books which have appeared, or which will appear, while heaven and earth remain. Every judicious attempt, therefore, to lead us into a deeper and clearer acquaintance with this inestimable magna charta of our salvation, and to unlock its heavenly treasures, has a direct tendency to advance the glory of God, by promoting the knowledge, the happiness, and the sanctification of men.

HEARING.

Some people hear the gospel as a butterfly settles upon a flower, without being at all the better for it. Others hear the gospel as a bee settles upon a flower; they enjoy its fragrance, they imbibe its honey, and return home richly laden with its sweets. And some hear the gospel as a spider visits a flower: they would, if possible, extract poison from the rose of Sharon.

HEAVEN.

Even on earth the "joy of harvest" is great; but what infinite joy will ensue when the number of the elect is accomplished,—when the bodies of the saints are all retrieved from the grave, and Christ celebrates his "harvest-home!"

The kingdom of heaven is elective, to which men are chosen by God; and yet, at the same time, it goes by indefeasible, hereditary right: it proceeds in the line of election and the line of regeneration.

HOLY SPIRIT

When the rays of the sun fall on the surface of a material object, part of those rays are absorbed, part of them are reflected back in strait lines, and part of them refracted, this way and that, in various directions. When the Holy Ghost shines upon our souls, part of the grace he inspires is absorbed to our own particular comfort, part of it reflected back in acts of love and joy and prayer and praise, and part of it refracted every way, in acts of benevolence, beneficence, and all moral and social duty.

The most correct and lively description of the sun cannot convey either the light, the warmth, the cheerfulness, or the fruitfulness which the actual shining of that luminary conveys; neither can the most laboured and accurate dissertations on grace and spiritual things impart a true idea of them without an experience of the Holy Spirit's work on the heart.

In vain do the inhabitants of London go to their conduits for supply, unless the man who has the master-key turns the water on. And in vain do we seek to quench our thirst at ordinances, unless God communicates the living water of his Spirit.

Scripture can be savingly understood only in and by the inward illumination of the Holy Ghost. The gospel is a picture of God's free grace to sinners. Were we in a room hung with the finest paintings, and adorned with the most exquisite statues, we could not see one of them if all light was excluded. Now the blessed Spirit's irradiation is the same to the mind that outward light is to the bodily eyes.

As the sails of a ship carry it into the harbour, so prayer carries us to the throne and bosom of God. But as the sails cannot of themselves speed the progress of a vessel, unless filled with a favourable breeze, so the Holy Spirit must breathe upon our hearts, or our prayers will be motionless and lifeless.

An excellent divine of the last century, Mr. Thomas Cole, compared "the Scriptures to a seal, and the heart of man to wax." I would add that the Holy Ghost is the fire that warms, and penetrates, and softens the wax, in order to its becoming susceptible of impression.

The word of God will not avail to salvation without the Spirit of God. A compass is of no use to a mariner unless he has light to see it by.

A house uninhabited soon comes to ruin; and a soul uninhabited by the Holy Spirit of God verges faster and faster to destruction.

HOLINESS.

The progress of holiness is sometimes like the lengthening of day-light after the days are past the shortest. The difference is for some time imperceptible, but still it is real, and in due season becomes undeniably visible.

In one of Mr. Pope's letters (if I mistake not) mention is made of an eastern fable to this effect:—"On a time the owls and bats joined in a petition to Jupiter against the sun, setting forth that his beams were so insufferably troublesome that the petitioners could not fly abroad with comfort, but were kept prisoners at home for at least twelve hours out of the twenty-four. Jupiter seeing Apollo shortly after, informed him of the application he had received, adding, I shall, however, take no notice of the petition; and for you, do you be revenged by shining." O believers, when Papists and Arminians charge the doctrines of grace with a tendency to licentiousness, let your lives be a confutation of the falsehood. Be revenged by shining.

HUMILITY.

It is a great thing to have gospel humility. If you know you want it, it is a sign you are not quite without it.

Children much indulged are apt to take liberties. To keep us humble, God must sometimes seem to frown.

HUSBANDS.

Many husbands are like some members of parliament, all complaisance, humility, and fair speeches beforehand, but no sooner in possession of the desired object than the supple-candidate becomes a haughty master.

HYPOCRITES.

There is sometimes on trees and flowers what florists call a false blossom: how many such do we see in the world of professing Christians!

Different members of the body have different offices and are some of greater, others of less importance; but they all belong to the body. Hypocrites are not real members, but excrescences of the Church, like falling hair, or the parings of the nails.

IDEAS.

Definitions, or accurate ascertainments of the precise ideas which we mean to convey, by particular terms and phrases, are of great consequence in disembarassing a question, and in shortening a debate.

IGNORANCE.

Men adopt vice and error for want of knowing the true deformity of both: as in Russia, where unmarried women constantly wear veils, it is frequent for the bridegroom never to see his wife's face until after marriage.

ILLUMINATION

The Holy Ghost must shine upon your graces, or you will not be able to see them; and your good works must shine upon your faith, or your neighbours will not be able to see it.

IMPERFECTION.

If I build a house, it is ten thousand to one if I do not afterwards find it defective in some respect or other: there is continually something to add, or something to alter, and something that may be improved for the better.—If I write a book, I find it imperfect. Some errata of the printer, some defects in the language, something to add, or something to retrench. So it is with all human works. The work of Christ's righteousness and redemption is the only finished, the only perfect work that ever was wrought among men. God give me faith in it!

IMPUTED RIGHTEOUSNESS.

The form of salutation in some countries is by respectfully touching or lifting up the corner of the person's garment you would address; but to kiss his vest is the highest token of reverence.—And the highest instance of regard you can show Christ is by embracing the robe of his imputed righteousness.

INCOMPETENCY.

Man, even in his most enlightened state, can no more form a competent idea of the wisdom that lies at the bottom of God's effective and permissive decrees, than an earth-worm or a beetle can enter into the political views which actuate the movements of a prime minister.

INNOVATION.

I have known an unskilful weeder pull up and destroy flower-roots and herbs under the notion of their being weeds. Just such would be the conduct of the present restless enemies to the Church of England, if their innovating wishes were to take effect. (1772.)

INTEREST IN CHRIST.

Our interest in Christ does not depend on our sanctification, but our sanctification depends on our interest in Christ.

INTREPIDITY.

Go to heaven boldly, let men say what they will. Use yourself to the weather: a little rain will not melt you. The more you wrap up, the more liable you will be to take cold.

JUSTICE.

Some harbours have bars of sand which lie across the entrance and prohibit the access of ships at low water.—There is a bar, not of sand, but of adamantine rock, the bar of Divine Justice, which lies between a sinner and heaven. Christ's righteousness is the high-water that carries a believing sinner over this bar, and transmits him safe to the land of eternal rest. Our own righteousness is the low-water, which will fail us in our greatest need, and will ever leave us short of the heavenly Canaan.

JUSTIFICATION.

Antiquarians set an inestimable value on unques, i. e. on such curiosities of which there is but one of a sort in the world. Justification is in the number of the believer's unques. There is but one justification (properly so called) in the whole universe, and it equally belongs, through grace, to all the children of God, and the Christian wishes to be viewing it every moment.

Christ's sheep do not contribute any part of their own wool to their own cloathing. They wear, and are justified by, the fine linen of Christ's obedience only.

KNOWLEDGE IN THEORY.

I am acquainted with a lady who is a thorough mistress of music as a science, and can play the harpsichord with great judgment; but though she understands it, she does not love it, and never plays if she can avoid it. Too strong a picture of some who know the gospel in theory, but neither love it in sincerity, nor practice its precepts with a good will!

LANGUAGE.

It were to be wished that the advocates for the best of causes would, with Solomon, seek out acceptable words. I acknowledge that genteel drapery adds nothing to the value, but it adds much to the agreeableness of truth, which is not the better received for appearing in dishabille, much less for being attired like a sloven. If we do not decorate her with what Lord Chesterfield terms "lace and embroidery," that is, with rich metaphors and refinement of style, yet an author should not permit her to walk abroad either in sluttish negligence, or in the garb of a shabby old gentlewoman fallen to decay.

LAW.

The terrors of the law have much the same effect on our duties and obedience as frost has on a stream; it hardens, cools, and stagnates. Whereas, let the shining of divine love rise upon the soul, repentance will then flow, our hardness and coldness thaw.

LIFE OF CHRIST.

The life of Christ on earth may be compared to the garden of Eden before Adam fell, in which was no plant growing but such as were beautiful and salutary, none that was either useless or hurtful.

LORD'S DAY.

It is certainly no small point gained to prove, that what is now generally considered as the first day of the week is, in reality, and in order of rotation from the beginning, the seventh or primeval Sabbath, and that God incarnate rose from the tomb on that very day in succession on which God absolute ceased from the works of creation. Indeed, the compilers of our Liturgy seem to have had some light into this matter, else they would hardly have engrafted the fourth commandment (which expressly and peremptorily enjoins the sanctification of the seventh day) into the communion service, and directed all the members of the Church to unite in prayer to God for grace to keep that law.

LOVE TO GOD.

The people of Christ are not merit-mongers. Love to the captain of their salvation ranks them under his banner. They are not like the Swiss, who fight for pay.

As fruits artificially raised or forced in a hot-house, have not the exquisite flavour of those fruits which grow naturally and in their due season; so that obedience which is forced by the terrors of the law, wants the genuine flavour and sweetness of that obedience which springs forth from a heart warmed and meliorated with the love of God in Christ Jesus.

If Christ has your good will, he will certainly have your good word. If you truly love him, you will not be ashamed to speak for him.

MARRIAGE.

When a believer marries an unbeliever, what is it but reviving the old cruel punishment of tying the living and the dead together?

MEMORY.

Many of God's people lament the badness of their memory. And yet, after all, a heart-memory is better than a mere head-memory. Better to carry away a little of the life of God in our souls, than if we were able to repeat every word of every sermon we have heard.

MINISTERS.

Gospel ministers should not be too hasty and eager to wipe off every aspersion that is cast on them falsely for Christ's sake. Dirt on the character (if unjustly thrown), like dirt on the clothes, should be let alone for a while, until it dries; and then it will rub off easily enough.

Ministers then only draw the bow successfully, when God's Holy Spirit sharpens the gospel arrow, and wings it to the hearts of them that hear.

Gregory Nazianzen says, in his eulogium on Basil, Βροντη σεις λογος αστροπη δε βιος; "thy word was thunder and thy life was lightning." Such should the preaching and the conversation of every minister be.

The weight of opposition will always fall heaviest on those who sound the gospel trumpet loudest.

Gospel ministers do, indeed, in some sense, turn the world upside-down. The fall of Adam has turned human nature upside-down long ago; and converting grace must turn us upside-down again, in order to bring us right.

Gospel ministers are usually, in will and desire at least, employed for God to the last moment of their lives. Their work being accomplished, they are called from labour to heaven; as Cincinnatus was found at the plough when he received his call to the dictatorship of Rome.

Among the great variety of preachers, some give the pure gospel wine, unadulterated and undashed. Others give wine and water. Some give mere cold water, without a drop of wine among it.

Were evangelical preachers and writers to stop, and give a lash to every spiteful noisy cur that yelps at them in their way to the kingdom of God, they would have enough to do before they got to their journey's end.

Next to being a true believer, it is the hardest thing in the world to be a faithful minister.

Ministers are the bow: the law is the arrow. God must bend the bow by the impulse of his own arm, and wing the arrow, or it will never hit a sinner's heart.

I have read of some harbour abroad, where salt water and fresh run together in one amicable stream, but without mingling. Such should be the case of God's ministers. They are to preach both law and gospel; but without mixing or confounding them together.

The best clock in the world will be spoiled, if you are perpetually moving the hand backwards and forwards, and altering it in order to make it keep time with a variety of other clocks; it will hardly ever go regularly and well. So a minister, who shapes and accommodates his sentiments and discourses to the tastes and humours and opinions of other people, will never be happy, respectable, or useful.

Different ministers are sent of God to different persons. Just as a great man who keeps many servants, sends them with letters or messages to such or such particular people.

A minister can only lay on the caustic; God alone can make the hearers feel it.

MORALITY.

To amuse fallen sinners with lectures on morality is like going to an hospital and haranguing to a company of sick folks on the advantages of health. Rather let us labour to cure them of their diseases, and then they will know the value and comforts of health without our giving them a dissertation upon it. Lead sinners to Christ and to the Holy Spirit, and then they will love and practise morality as naturally as sparks fly upward.

Morality not flowing from faith in Christ resembles an artificial flower; which has the appearance, but neither the life, the beauty, nor the fragrance of a real one.

I have no more conception of a true believer without morality, than of a river without water, or of a sun without light and heat.

NATIONAL CONCERNS.

National matters at present carry a very gloomy aspect. But it is in things civil as well is spiritual; and I regard my country and myself in a similar view. Considered in myself, I am a most unworthy and sinful creature; considered in Christ, I am without fault before the throne of God. Consider the state of public affairs as they are in themselves; and hardly any thing can be more threatening, cloudy, or unfavourable. Consider them in a providential view, and whatever is, is right. This is my sheet anchor, concerning that black and dismal storm which now seems to be bursting over the English empire. A. T. Bath, Aug. 4. 1775.

NEGLIGENCE.

When persons loiter on a journey they are sometimes benighted afterwards: and when believers are not diligent in the use of ordinances, and in the performance of good works, no wonder if they walk in darkness.

NEW BIRTH.

All God's children are still-born. They come spiritually dead into the world. And dead they continue till they are born again of the Holy Ghost.

Every believer has four births. A natural birth into the world; a spiritual birth into the kingdom of grace, at regeneration; a birth into glory at death; and a new birth of his body from the grave at the resurrection.

No man can remember the day of his natural birth; but most of God's people can remember the day when they were born again.

OBLOQUY.

The times are such that it is almost impossible for a man to go to heaven without getting a nickname by the way. But it is better to go to heaven with a nick name, than to go to hell without one. If I must either give up the truths of God, or lose my character; then farewell character, and welcome the truths of God.

OLD AND NEW MAN.

Old Adam never was a saint yet, and never will be; Rom. vii. On the other hand, the new man, or principle of grace in the heart, never sinned, and never can; Rom. vii. 1 John.

ONE CHURCH.

Take a mass of quicksilver, let it fall to the floor, and it will split itself into a vast number of distinct globulas. Gather them up, and put them together again, and they coalesce into one body, as before. Thus God's elect below are sometimes crumbled and distinguished into various parties, though they are all, in fact, members of one and the same mystic body. But, when taken up from the world, and put together in heaven, they will constitute one glorious undivided church, for ever and ever.

In North America have been lately reckoned no fewer than seventy-five religious denominations. And were there seventy-five thousand it would not signify seven pins heads. Denomination is nothing.—Grace is grace in every converted person. There is but one Church after all.

ORIGINAL SIN.

Before the fall, man's will was free to good, and burned with a pure celestial flame. Original sin acted as an extinguisher; and leaves the soul in the dark, until lighted again by the fire of God's Spirit.

PERSECUTION.

Some harbours are fenced with massy chains of iron, reaching from side to side, to obstruct the access of shipping. Similar is the profession of Christ and his cause in persecuting times. But as a ship has often been able to force its way into the port, and burst the chains that oppose its entrance by the aid of a favourable tide and a strong breeze, so persecution is nothing to a believing soul whose sails are filled with the breathings of the Holy Ghost, and the full tide of whose affections is turned by grace to God and Christ and heaven.

PHARISEES.

Pharisees are pharisees in all ages and all countries. What is the difference between a pharisee in Judea and a pharisee in England?

Nothing but the lancet of God's law in the hand of the Spirit can let out the proud blood of a pharisee, and reduce the swellings of self-righteousness.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

Some time after the commencement of the 17th century, a singularly ingenious piece of spiritual allegory was published under the following title: "The Isle of Man, or the legal Proceeding in Maushire against Sin." The author was the Rev. Mr. Richard Bernard, rector of Batcombe, in Somersetshire. This performance seems to have had a great run: my copy is of the eighth edition, printed at London, A. D. 1632.

The above work, in all probability, suggested to Mr. John Bunyan the first idea of his "Pilgrim's Progress," and of his "Holy War." The former of these is, perhaps, the finest allegorical work extant, describing every stage of a believer's experience, from conversion to glorification, in the most artless simplicity of language, yet peculiarly rich with spiritual unction, and glowing with the most vivid, just, and well-conducted machinery throughout: it is, in short, a master-piece of piety and genius, and will, I doubt not, be of standing use to the people of God so long as the sun and moon endure. It has been affirmed, and I believe with truth, that no book in the English tongue has gone through so many editions, the Bible and Common Prayer alone excepted.

POWER.

It is a saying that kings have long hands. This is eminently true of Christ, the king of saints. He has a long hand to reach his enemies in a way of judgment, and a long hand to lay hold on his elect, and to bring nigh those who once stood afar off from him and his righteousness.

PRAYER.

The longer we neglect writing to an absent friend, the less mind we have to set about it. So the more we neglect private prayer and closet communion with God, the more shy we grow in our approaches to him. Nothing breeds a greater strangeness between the soul and God than the restraining of prayer before him. And nothing would renew the blessed intimacy if God himself, the neglected party, did not, as it were, send us a letter of expostulation from heaven, and sweetly chide us for our negligence. Then we melt, then we kindle, and the blissful intercourse gradually opens as usual.

David would not have been so often upon his knees in prayer if affliction had not weighed him down.—There are, I believe, more prayers in the writings of David and of Jeremiah than in any other portion of Scripture.

The longer you are with God on the mount of private prayer and secret communion with him, the brighter will your face shine when you come down.

We may pray spiritually by a form, and we may pray formally and coldly without one.—Suppose I was to say to a converted dissenter, "Sir, you do not sing the praises of God spiritually." He would ask, "Why not?" Was I to answer, "Because you sing by a form: Dr. Watts's psalms and hymns are all precomposed: they are forms in the strictest sense of the word;" the good man would reply, "True: they are precomposed forms; but I can sing them very spiritually for all that." I should rejoin, "And I can pray in the words of the Liturgy as spiritually as you can sing in the words of Dr. Watts."

PREACHING.

Mere moral preaching only tells people how the house ought to be built. Gospel preaching does more, for it actually builds the house.

Was I a layman, and Providence was to cast me in a place where I could not possibly hear the gospel preached, but should be forced to hear either an Arian or an Arminian ministry if I heard any at all, I should much rather choose to spend my Lord's days at home in reading and praying privately. By the same rule that I would rather stay within, and take such a dinner as my own house affords, than go abroad to dine where I should be sure of sitting down (at best) to a dish of gravel or sand, if not of arsenic.—See Ezek. xi. 16.

PRESENCE OF GOD.

If you go to Court, you know whether you have seen the king, and whether he has spoke to you or not. And when you attend an ordinance, you know whether you have enjoyed the presence of God or not.

PRESERVATION.

If God had not chosen thee in his Son, he would not have called thee by his Spirit; and he that called thee by his Spirit will preserve thee to his kingdom.

If a coach or waggon be likely to run over us, we exert all our strength and speed to get out of its way. If a storm overtakes us, we look out for a place of shelter. O that we were equally sedulous to flee from the wrath to come!

PROFESSORS.

People who profess to believe the doctrines of the gospel, and yet do not experience the power of those doctrines unto sanctification, resemble a man who looks over a hedge into a garden without going into it.

Some professors pass for very meek, good-natured people until you displease them. They resemble a pool or pond which, while you let it alone, looks clean and limpid, but if you put in a stick and stir the bottom, the rising sediment soon discovers the impurity that lurks beneath.

As the most florid people do not always enjoy the firmest state of health, so the most shewy professors are not always the holiest and most substantial believers.

There is a set of fellows in the present age jocosely called Jessamies and Maccaronies, who affect to dress as fine as butterflies, and to be squeamishly delicate and elegant; so that you would almost take a macaroni to be a Semiramis or a Cleopatra in men's clothes. But there are spiritual maccaronies as well as worldly ones. And who are those? Your self-righteous people, and perfectionists above all; who surveying themselves, not in the unflattering glass of God's law, but in the delusive mirror and through the false medium of self-conceit, fall in love with their own image (like Narcissus), and think themselves to be spiritually rich and beautiful, though all the while they are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. Christ's imputed righteousness constitutes the best dress, and sanctification by his Spirit constitutes the real beauty of the soul. And if we have not his righteousness to wear, and his grace to make us holy, we are but paltry maccaronies, be our profession ever so splendid.

PROMISES.

All the promises of man to man ought to be conditional. It is only for God to make absolute promises, for he alone is unchangeable and omnipotent.

POOR PERSONS.

If our Lord was upon earth, and there were in the same street two persons, the one rich and the other poor, but both equally desirous of his company, I verily believe that he would visit the poor man first.

PROSPERITY.

Too much wealth, like a suit of cloths too heavily embroidered, does but encumber and weigh us down, instead of answering the solid purposes of usefulness and convenience.

Generally speaking, the sun-shine of too much worldly favour weakens and relaxes our spiritual neryes; as weather too intensely hot relaxes those of the body. A degree of seasonable opposition, like a fine dry frost, strengthens and invigorates and braces up.

PUSILLANIMITY.

I have no notion of a timid, sneaking profession of Christ. Such preachers and professors are like a rat playing at hide and seek behind a wainscot, who pops his head through a hole to see if the coast is clear, and ventures out if nobody is in the way, but slinks back again when danger appears. We cannot be honest to Christ except we are bold for him. He is either worth all we can lose for him, or he is worth nothing.

REASON

Reason is God's candle in man. But as a candle must first be lighted ere it will enlighten, so reason must be illuminated by divine grace ere it can savingly discern spiritual things.

REDEMPTION.

The covenant of redemption, which is a covenant of absolute grace to us, was to Christ a covenant of works and a covenant of sufferings.

REFORMATION.

Mere reformation differs just as much from regeneration as white-washing an old rotten house differs from taking it down and building it anew.

REGENERATION.

Some people laugh at regeneration by the Spirit of God, and think there is nothing in it. A plain sign that they themselves are quite without it. If a man was to come and tell me that there is no such thing in the world as money, I should take it for granted that he therefore thinks so because he himself never had any.

RIGHTEOUSNESS OF CHRIST.

A celebrated heathen said, Mæd virtute me involvo; "I wrap myself up in my own virtue." A true believer has something infinitely better to wrap himself up in. When Satan says—thou hast yielded to my suggestions—when conscience says, thou hast turned a deaf ear to my admonitions—when the law of God says, thou hast broke me—when the gospel says, thou hast neglected me—when justice says, thou hast insulted me—when mercy says, thou hast slighted me—faith can say, all this is too true; but Christi justitiâ me involvo, I wrap myself up in the righteousness of Jesus Christ.

The gates of heaven fly open before the righteousness of Christ, as certainly as the door of Lydia's heart flew open under the hand of God's regenerating Spirit.

By nature we are all weavers and spinners. We shut our eyes against the garment ready wrought : and, like silkworms, we shall die and perish in our own web, if the Spirit of God does not unravel it for us, and lead us to the righteousness of Christ.

SAFETY.

We may safely go as far as the candle of God's word goes before.

SALVATION.

We should be in a bad condition indeed, if our salvation was suspended on conditions of our own performing.

God's everlasting love, his decree of election, and eternal covenant of redemption, are the three hinges on which the door of man's salvation turns. When man fell from God, infinite justice put a lock upon the door : a lock which nothing but the golden key of Christ's blood and righteousness can open. The Holy Ghost (if I may venture to use so familiar a comparison) is, as it were, the omniscient keeper of the door ; and he lets no souls in but such as he himself has washed and justified and sanctified in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by his own efficacious grace.

I should as soon expect to be saved by my sins as to be saved by my good works.

SAYING.

An old proverb says, "They who are not handsome at twenty, will never be handsome : they who are not strong at thirty, will never strong : they who are not wise at forty, will never be wise : and they who are not rich at fifty, will never be rich." However this may generally be, yet the grace of God is free, and not bound to time or place. Some come to Christ in childhood ; some in youth ; some in maturer age ; and some who go unconverted to a dying bed, rise converted from a dying bed to heaven. Happy they who are effectually caught by grace ; whether at the first, the third, the sixth, the ninth, or the eleventh hour ! Our law says, nullum tempus occurrit regi : and I am sure it is the case with God.

SCRIBBLERS.

When I have been in a post-chaise, I have often seen a dog pursue it with much noise and self-importance. The poor animal thought the carriage was running away from him ; whereas, in truth, it was going at an equal rate long enough before he appeared, and continued to do so long after he was out of hearing. When public persons are attacked by wretched scribblers too mean to answer ; the scribblers affect to think that the omission is owing to their own superiority in argument. While, in fact, they are too scurrilous and unimportant to be noticed.

SELF-RIGHTEOUS.

Self-righteous people are like a man who has run up a very slight house for his own residence ; in which, while he sits or sleeps securely, a sudden storm arises, and blows down the whole fabric, and buries the builder in the ruins. God will either bring us out of our self-righteous castle, or crush us with its fall.

SENSIBLE COMFORT.

A believer, with regard to spiritual enjoyments, resembles a barometer. As the silver in this instrument rises when the sun shines and the weather is fine ; but sinks when the air is heavy and loaded with damps ; so the Christian's sensible comfort rises when the Holy Spirit's countenance shines upon his soul, but subsides when left to the evil workings of his own heart.

SIGHT.

It is in grace as it is in nature. Some have a sharp sight, some are near-sighted. Some can clearly see their interest in Christ ; some can hardly discern it at all. Some have likewise a clear view of gospel doctrines : some a confused one.

SIMILARITY.

It is a peculiar happiness to observe, that in matters of spiritual concern, the philosopher and ploughman (if truly regenerate) have the same feelings, and speak the same language ; they all eat of the same spiritual meat, and drink of the same spiritual rock which follows them, and that rock is Christ. Hence that similitude of experience, or to speak figuratively, that strong and striking family likeness which obtains among the converted people of God, in every period of time, and in every nation under heaven. They all, without exception, feel themselves totally ruined by original sin ; they all, without exception, take refuge in the righteousness and cross of Christ, and unite in ascribing the whole praise of their salvation to the alone free grace and sovereign mercy of Father, Son, and Spirit.

SIN.

Suppose a loving and beloved husband dies a violent death. Can his widow love and admire and value the sword or the pistol by which her husband lost his life ? As little can true believers love sin ; for by it Christ, the bridegroom of their souls, was put to death.

If a person fall and break his leg, or be burnt out of his house, most people pity and sympathize with him. But if a man live in sin, where are the neighbours that feel for his danger and labour to reclaim him? Or, if a believer be overtaken by a fault, how few professors will commiserate his case, and endeavour to restore him in the spirit of meekness?

Our corrupt hearts are like gunpowder, apt to kindle at every spark of temptation. The Spirit of God must be continually throwing water upon the soul in order to preserve it from taking fire.

SINNER.

Nothing but Christ will do for a dying sinner; and why should we dream that any thing else will do for a living sinner?

Sin cannot enter into heaven; but a sinner may.

SUCCESSION.

I know but of two uninterrupted successions. 1. Of sinners, ever since the fall of Adam. 2. Of saints; for God always had, and will always have, a seed to serve him.

SPIRITUAL ADVANTAGE.

Want of spiritual comfort is often attended with spiritual advantage. A person who walks in the dark is usually the more cautious and careful where and how he treads.

SPIRITUAL NUMBNESS.

It is with our souls as it is with our bodies; we sometimes catch cold we know not how.

STRICTNESS.

How many people deceive themselves under a profession of extraordinary strictness! The Capuchin friars make a vow never to touch any piece of money whatever while they live. Offer them a shilling, or a guinea, they will refuse to take it; but wrap it up in a bit of paper, and they will receive and pocket it without scruple.

SUBMISSION.

God knows best what to do with us. We are not qualified to choose for ourselves. The patient ought not to prescribe for the physician, but the physician for the patient.

SUPPLIES.

When Hagar was quite disconsolate with fatigue of body and distress of mind, there was a fountain by her, though she knew it not. So the weeping believer has relief at hand which he cannot see. God's word, God's Spirit, and God's ministers, are the angels that direct and lead his afflicted people to the fountain opened.

The acts of breathing which I performed yesterday will not keep me alive to-day. I must continue to breathe afresh every moment, in order to my enjoying the consolations, and to my working the works of God

TIME.

Was a man, every day, to throw a purse of money, or even a single guinea, into the sea, he would be looked upon as a mad man, and his friends would soon confine him for such. But a man who throws away that which is of more value than gold, than mines, than the whole world; even his health, his peace, his time, and his soul; such a one is admired, esteemed, and applauded by the greater part of mankind.

TEMPTATION.

Worms and other insects take up their habitation under the surface of the earth. A plat of ground may be, outwardly, verdant with grass, and decorated with flowers. But take a spade in your hand, and turn up the mould, and you soon have a sample of the vermin that lurk beneath. Temptation is the spade which breaks up the ground of a believer's heart, and helps to discover the corruptions of his fallen nature.

TRUST.

Trust the promise, and God will make good the performance.

We can never be truly easy and happy until we are enabled to trust God for all things: and the more we are enabled to trust him, the more gracious and faithful we shall find him.

A good king carefully observes the law. Christ, the king of Zion, kept the divine law in all respects; and his converted subjects first trust in him as a law-fulfiller ere they can obey him acceptably as a law-giver.

Many turnpike-gates bear this inscription in large capital letters, "No trust here." This is the very language of our own unbelieving hearts. We do not trust God. We do not give him credit. Hence all murmurings, anxiety, &c.

UNDETERMINATE.

People of fluctuating principles resemble what is fabled of Mahomet's iron coffin suspended in the air between two large loadstones, but without touching either of them.

UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE.

Some have entertained a chimerical idea of a universal language. There is, indeed, spiritually speaking, a language common to all the converted, of every age and country. The language of Canaan is understood all the world over, by every one who is taught of God.

UNFRUITFUL.

It is a common thing in London, when a house is uninhabited and shut up, for boys to write in chalk on the window-shutters and door "Empty." When a person professes godliness, and does not bring forth good works in his practice, we too may write the word "Empty" on all the profession he makes.

UNIVERSALITY.

"Universality," say the Papists, "is a mark of the true Church. There are some Catholics in every country under heaven." But if this be a just mark, the Jews will bid the fairest of any for being the true Church. For they are sifted among all nations.

UNREGENERACY.

It is said of the original Indians of Florida that, when they could not pay their debts, they took a short method of settling the account by knocking their creditors on the head. Sinners, in a state of unregeneracy, though partly sensible that they do not keep the law of God, yet think to knock God's justice on the head by pleading absolute mercy.

An unregenerate man is absolutely dead in a spiritual sense. He has no hearing of the promises; no sight of his own misery, of the holiness of God, of the purity of the law, nor of Christ as covenanting, obeying, dying, and interceding; no taste of God's love in Christ, and the sweetness of communion with him by the Spirit; no feeling of conviction in a way of grace, humiliation, and self-renunciation; no scent after God and glory; no hungerings and thirstings after spiritual consolations and assurance; no motion toward divine enjoyments and evangelical holiness.

VICISSITUDE.

God's people are travellers. Sometimes they are in dark lanes and deep vallies; sometimes on the hills of joy, where all is light and cheerful.

WORKS.

Mount Sinai, or the hope of being saved (in part at least) by our own works, may be compared to a dreary rock. Satan is the monster that gapes to devour. Christ is Perseus, who, by the sword of his Spirit, slays the monster's power, breaks the legal chain, and sets the awakened soul at liberty.

Mount Sinai (i. e. salvation by works), is labour-in-vain hill. Do all you can, you will never get up to the top of it, not so much as half way up.

The business of Christ's blood is to wash our bad works out, and to wash our good works clean.

WRITINGS.

Some mens' writings resemble a dark night, enlivened by a few occasional flashes of lightning.

I was lately asked what my opinion is of Mr. John Fletcher's writings: my answer was, that in the very few pages which I had perused, the serious passages were dulness double condensed; and the lighter passages impudence double distilled.

YOUNG CONVERTS.

Young converts are generally great bigots. When we are first converted to God, our brotherly affection too often resembles the narrowness of a river at its first setting out. But as we advance nearer to the great ocean of all good, the channel widens, and our hearts expand more and more, until death perfectly unites us to the source of uncreated love.

EXCELLENT PASSAGES FROM EMINENT PERSONS. (p)

ACCEPTANCE.

It is a fallacy of Satan's, to argue, from the sinfulness of our duties, to the non-acceptance of them. "Will God," says he, "take such broken groats at thy hand? Is he not a holy God?"—Learn, here, to distinguish. There is a two-fold acceptance. 1. A thing may be accepted as a payment of a debt; or, 2. As a proof

(p) In the course of various readings, these judicious extracts are professedly transcribed by our author from the writings of several Protestant divines of the last (and a few of the present) age; they will be perused with pleasure and peculiar advantage by those who have a prevailing regard for dignity of sense and plain truth, delivered in honest and open language, unlike the delicate race of our refined preachers, who "scorn to mention hell to ears polite." These selections are a specimen of the subjects that employed the tongues and pens of those intrepid champions in the cause of God who, having fought the good fight, and exemplarily executed the commission received from their Lord and Master, are now set down in the kingdom of heaven, crowned with glory and immortality. EDITOR.

of love.—God, who will not accept of broken money in a way of payment will, nevertheless, kindly accept of it from his friends as a testimony of gratitude.

It is true, O Christian, the debt thou owest to God must be paid in good and lawful money: but here, for thy comfort, Christ, and Christ only, is thy pay-master. Send Satan to him; bid him bring his charge against Christ, who is ready at God's right hand to produce a clear account, and shew his receipt in full for the whole debt.—As to thy performances and obedience, they fall under a quite contrary class; as mere tokens of thy love and thankfulness to God. And so gracious is thy heavenly Father, that he accepts thy bent sixpence, and will not throw away thy crooked, broken mite. Love refuses nothing that love sends. Gurnall.

ACTIVITY.

Industry on our parts is not superseded by the greatness and freeness of God's grace. As when a schoolmaster teaches a boy gratis, the youth cannot attain to learning without some application of his own; and yet it doth not therefore cease to be free, on the teacher's part, because attention is required from the learner; so it is here. Arrowsmith.

AFFLICTIONS.

Sanctified afflictions are spiritual promotions. Dr. Dodd of the last cent.

There is no affliction so small, but we should sink under it if God upheld us not: and there is no sin so great but we should commit it if God restrained us not. ibid.

A good old Scotch minister used to say to any of his flock when they were labouring under affliction, "Time is short: and, if your cross is heavy you have not far to carry it."

When the grace of an afflicted saint is in exercise, his heart is like a garden of roses, or a well of rose-water, which, the more moved and agitated they are, the sweeter is the fragrance they exhale. Anon.

As no temporal blessing is good enough to be a sign of eternal election; so no temporal affliction is bad enough to be an evidence of reprobation: for the dearest Son of God's love was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Dr. Arrowsmith.

Afflictions scour us of our rust. Adversity, like winter weather, is of use to kill those vermin which the summer of prosperity is apt to produce and nourish. ibid.

Every vessel of mercy must be scoured in order to brightness. And however trees in the wilderness may grow without culture; trees in the garden must be pruned to be made fruitful: and corn-fields must be broken up, when barren heaths are left untouched. Dr. Arrowsmith.

The Church below is often in a suffering state. Christ himself was a man of sorrows; nor should his bride be a wife of pleasures. ibid.

God may cast thee down, but he will not cast thee off. Mr. Case.

Afflictions are blessings to us when we can bless God for affliction. Dyer.

God had a Son without sin, but none without sorrow; he had one Son without corruption, but no Son without correction. ibid.

Christian, hath not God taught thee, by his word and Spirit, how to read the shorthand of his providence! Dost thou not know that the saint's afflictions stand for blessings? Gurnall.

Those whom God loves he takes to pieces; and then puts them together again. Anon.

Through Christ's satisfaction for sin, the very nature of affliction is changed, with regard to believers. As death, which was at first the wages of sin, is now become a bed of rest (they shall rest upon their beds, saith the prophet); so afflictions are not the rod of God's anger, but the gentle physic of a tender Father. Dr. Crisp.

All the afflictions that a saint is exercised with are neither too numerous nor too sharp. A great deal of rust requires a rough file.

Mr. Moses Browne, in conversation, Oct. 24, 1769.

If we have the kingdom at last, it is no great matter what we suffer by the way. Dr. Manton.

Nothing can reconcile the soul to afflictive allotments, but looking on them as covenant-dispensations. Mr. William Mason.

David's pen never wrote more sweetly than when dipt in the ink of affliction. ibid.

When you see the refiner cast his gold into the furnace, do you think he is angry with the gold and means to cast it away? No. He sits as a refiner. He stands warily over the fire, and over the gold, and looks to it, that not one grain be lost. And when the dross is severed, he will out with it presently; it shall be no longer there. Crisp.

Crosses and afflictions are God's call to examine our hearts and our lives. Richardson.

No affliction would trouble a child of God, if he but knew God's reason for sending it. ibid.

Afflictions are as needful for our souls as food is for our bodies. ibid.

The Lord's wise love feeds us with hunger, and makes us fat with wants and desertsions. Rutherford.

It is a good sign when the Lord blows off the blossoms of our forward hopes in this life, and lops the branches of our worldly joys to the very root, on purpose that they should not thrive. Lord, spoil my fool's heaven in this life, that I may be saved for ever!

Rutherford.

ALL-MIGHTY.

"Esto diabolus magnipotens; nunquam erit omnipotens," saith Luther: I confess the Devil is all-mighty, but he will never be all-mighty, as my God and Saviour is.
Arrowsmith.

ARMINIANS.

Arminians represent the universe as the governess of God, instead of representing God as the governor of the universe. Mr. R. Hill, in con. March 6, 1770.

The Pelagians and Arminians are for making nature find its legs. They persuade man that he can go alone to Christ; or, at least, with a little external help of a hand to lead, or an argument to excite, without any creating work in the soul. Alas, for the blindness of nature! How false is all this stuff, and yet how glibly it goes down!
Gurnall.

ASSURANCE.

Assurance of pardon is a free gift of God, as much as faith, or pardon itself.
Arrowsmith.

Nothing more inflames a Christian's love to God than a firm belief of his personal election from eternity; after he hath been enabled to evidence the writing of his name in heaven by the experience of a heavenly calling and of a heavenly conversation. When the Spirit of God (whose proper work it is to assure, as it was the Father's to elect, and the Son's to redeem) hath written the law of life in a Christian's heart, and caused him to know assuredly that his name is in the book of life, he cannot but melt in sweet flames of holy affection.

ATTRACTION.

The loadstone draws all the iron and steel that comes near it, and also communicates of its own virtue to the iron it draws. Such a loadstone is Christ. He draws many after him, and when he has drawn them communicates his own virtue to them, so that they become useful to others; as a magnetic needle attracts other needles, by virtue of the power itself has received.

AVENGE.

When true grace is under the foot of a temptation, it will even then stir up a vehement desire of revenge, like a prisoner in the enemy's hand, who is thinking and plotting how to get out; waiting and longing every moment for an opportunity of deliverance, that he may again take up arms. "O God, remember me," saith Samson, "this once, I pray thee; and strengthen me, that I may be avenged on the Philistines for my two eyes," Judges xvi. 27. Thus prays the gracious soul, that God would spare him and strengthen him, that he may be avenged for his pride, unbelief, and all those sins by which he has dishonoured God.

Gurnall.

BANISHMENT.

There goes a rumour that I am to be banished. And let it come, if God so will. The other side of the sea is my Father's ground as well as this side.
Rutherford.

BELIEVER.

The weakest believer shall partake of such hidden things, such excellencies of Christ, as all the world shall never be able to dive into, reach, nor comprehend. Crisp.

A believer, in a poor condition, resembles a fine and valuable picture in a broken frame.
Jenkin.

Men are believers because they are elected; not elected because they are believers.
Sladen.

[Believers do, in general, wish to experience little else but the sweetness and comforts of religion; whence Mr. Rutherford says of himself,]

I am like a child that hath a golden book, and playeth chiefly with the ribbons, and the gilding, and the picture in the first page; instead of reading the more profitable contents.

BELIEVING.

To believe the gospel is but to give God credit for being wiser than ourselves.

Madan.

Believing is the most wonderful thing in the world. Put any thing of thy own to it and thou spoilest it.
Wilcox.

BESTOWMENT.

God is not only the rewarder, but is himself the reward of his. A king may enrich his subjects with gratuities; but he bestows himself upon his queen.

Cripplegate Lecture.

BIBLE.

When a believer is in a state of comfort and prosperity, he can read other books beside the Bible: but when he is in temptation, or burdened with distress, he betakes himself to the Bible alone. He wants pure wine without any mixture of water.—This shews the worth of the Bible above all other books.

Mr. Searl in con. at B. Hamb. Idem. Aug. 28.

When you experience on your soul the happy energy of the Scriptures, every attempt to stagger your belief, or withdraw your veneration from the Bible, will be like an attempt to shatter the rock in pieces with a bubble, or to pierce the adamant with a feather.

Mr. Hervey.

The page, of Scriptures like the productions of nature, will not only endure the test but improve upon the trial. The application of the microscope to the one, and a repeated meditation on the other, are sure to display new beauties and present us with higher attractives.

ibid.

Without the powerful agency of the blessed Spirit to enlighten our understandings and to apply the doctrines of the Bible to our hearts; we shall be, even with the word of light and life in our hands, somewhat like blind Bartimæus sitting amidst the beams of day; or like the withered arm with invaluable treasures before it.

By the blessed influences of God's holy Spirit, our understandings are opened to know, and our hearts opened to receive, the Scriptures; to understand them in all the fulness of their heavenly meaning; to receive them in all the force of their transforming power.

ibid.

Of most other things it may be said, "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity:" but of the Scriptures, "Verity of verities, all is verity."

Arrowsmith.

In the Scriptures, there are Ερωικια, songs of victory; but such as exalt not the prowess of man, but the glory of God. So Exod. xv.

Επικηδία, or funeral songs; but such as celebrate Christ's death, and the good-will of God therein. So Psalm xxii. and Isa. liii.

Ερωικα, songs of love: but such as set forth the love of Christ to his spouse the Church, and her mutual affection to him. So Psalm xlv. and the Book of Canticles. There are also

Βεκολικα, sacred pastorals: but such as magnify no other shepherd but God alone. Yea.

Γεωργικα too, or songs relative to husbandry: but such as ascribe all to him. Let Virgil be asked, "Quid faciat lætas segetes," or what makes a good harvest? And he will wholly insist on this or that secondary cause of fertility.—Ask David, he presently falls in his georgics, upon praising God as the author of all fruitfulness: "Thou visitest the earth and blestest it; thou makest it very plenteous. Thou makest it soft with the showers of rain, and blestest the increase of it. Thou crownest the year with thy goodness, and thy clouds drop fatness," Psa. lvi.

The two Testaments, Old and New, like the two breasts of the same person, give the same milk.

[Grace is the same as to principle in all God's children, how various soever it may seem]. If you draw water out of one and the same well, with vessels of different metal; one of brass, the other of tin, a third of earth; the water may seem at first to be of a different colour; but when the vessels are brought near the eye, this diversity of colour vanishes, and the water in each, when tasted of, has the same relish.—The same remark may likewise be accommodated to the several styles in which the penmen of Holy Scripture have respectively written. Let such as choose it make their boast of other things, for which England is famous; as fine churches, bridges, wool, &c. If I was asked, "What advantage have Englishmen, and what profit is there of living in this island?" My answer should be, "Much every way: but chiefly because to us are committed the oracles of God, and liberty to read our Father's mind in our mother's-tongue."

Arrowsmith.

ibid.

We are generally desirous to have fair and well-printed Bibles: but the fairest and finest impression of the Bible, is to have it well printed on the reader's heart.

ibid.

Quaint notions, philosophical speculations, and strains of wit, if set in competition with the oracles of God, are but as so many spiders' webs to catch flies; fitter for the taking of fancies than the saving of souls.

ibid.

Other books may render men learned unto ostentation; but the Bible only can make them really wise unto salvation.

ibid.

The dust or the finery about your Bibles is a witness now, and will at the last day be a witness of the enmity of your hearts against Christ as a prophet.

Boston.

Do not you teach the Bible, but let the Bible teach you. A saying of the late Mr. Fanch, of Romsey, Hants.

BIGOT.

For wolves to devour sheep is no wonder; but for sheep to devour one another, is monstrous and astonishing.

Anon

BLOOD OF CHRIST.

The fountain of Christ's blood is always open. We sin daily; and every day we sue out our discharge in Christ's name. The best of God's children make but too much work for pardoning mercy. We contract new filth by walking up and down in a dirty defiling world.

Dr. Manton.

It is said of the diamond;

*Incidit gemmas, sed non inciditur ipse:
Hircino tantum sanguine mollis erit.*

i. e. "It cuts other jewels; but is itself cut of none: nothing will soften it but steeping it in the blood of goats."

Nor will man's adamant heart be softened to purpose, until steeped in the blood of Christ, the true scape-goat.

Arrowsmith.

Nothing but the blood of God can satisfy the justice of God, or calm the awakened conscience.

A saying of the Rev. Mr. Walter Chapman's.

If thou hast not the blood of Christ at the root of thy profession, thy profession will wither and prove but painted pageantry to go to hell in.

Wilcox.

Without the blood of Christ upon thy conscience, all thy services are dead. ibid.

I may be ashamed to think that, in the midst of so much profession, I know so little of the blood of Christ, which is the main thing in the gospel. ibid.

[The works of men], without the blood of sprinkling will be but as a withered leaf amidst the inextinguishable burning.

Hervey.

Happy the people on whom the blood of Christ is sprinkled! this will screen and protect them like the mark which the man, clothed with linen, set on the foreheads of God's chosen ones, Ezek. ix. 6. or, like the line of scarlet thread, which Rahab bound to the window of her house, Josh. ii. 18, 19.

BLASPHEMOUS SUGGESTIONS.

[Blasphemous suggestions] will be charged on the tempter alone, if they be not consented to; and will no more be laid to the charge of the tempted party, than a bastard laid down at a chaste man's door will fix guilt upon him. [It may indeed give him trouble and vexation, but still he is not the father.] Anon.

BODY.

My soul, thou art now as a bird in the shell; in a shell of flesh which will shortly break and let thee go. This feeble vessel of the body will certainly ere long be split on the rock of death; and then must thou, its present pilot, forsake it, and swim to the shore of eternity. Therefore, O everlasting creature, see and be sure thou content not thyself with a transitory portion.

Arrowsmith.

CALLING.

CAUTION.

Were saints their own carvers they would soon cut their own fingers. Dyer.

When thou art enlarged in duty, supported and most assisted in thy Christian course, remember that thy strength lies in God, not in thyself. When thou hast thy best suit on, thy best suit of spirituality and strength, remember who made it, who paid for it, and who gave it thee. Thy grace, thy comfort, is neither the work of thy own hand, nor the price of thy own desert. Be not therefore proud of that which belongs to another, even God. Divine assistance will be suspended if it becomes a nurse to pride.

Gurnall.

Strong affections make strong afflictions. Dr. Owen.

High professor, despise not weak saints. Thou mayest come to wish to be in the condition of the meanest of them. Wilcox.

CHURCH MILITANT.

While Israel marched through the wilderness, the blackest night had a pillar of fire; and the brightest day a pillar of cloud. So in this world, things never goes so well with God's Israel, but they have still something to groan under; nor so ill but they have still comfort to be thankful for. In the Church militant, as in the ark of old, there are both a rod and a pot of manna.

Arrowsmith.

CHARACTERS.

Every man has two characters: a good one from his friends; and a bad one from his enemies. The best way perhaps for us to form a just estimate of any person whatever, is by mixing his two characters together and making one of both.

My uncle, Francis Toplady, in Conversation at Rochester, May 18, 1770.

CHILDREN.

I write my blessing to your child. You have borrowed him from God: for he is no heritage to you but a loan. Love him as folks do borrowed things. Rutherford.

[To one who had lost several children, Mr. Rutherford writes]

They are got into the lee of the harbour before the storm comes on. They are not lost to you, but laid up in Christ's treasury above. You shall meet them again. They are not sent away but sent before.

CHRIST.

Whoever hath Christ, cannot be poor; whoever wants him cannot be rich. Dyer.

If Christ be not thy Jacob's staff, to guide thee to heaven, he will never be thy Jacob's ladder, to lift thee thither. ibid.

The Lord Jesus is as a strong arm that draws a bow. The greater the strength of the arm is, the swifter is the flight of the arrow, and the farther the arrow goes. Christ being the strength of all believing souls, he draws the bow for them with a mighty arm. Dr. Crisp.

Though men of the lowest stations have generally the fewest troubles; yet it was not so with Christ. His case was alike remote both from the grandeur of princes and from the tranquillity of the vulgar.

Pre-eminence in the vast multitude of his sorrows, and the first place among the afflicted and oppressed was his distinction.

CHRIST THE WAY.

Merchants go to sea. The end of their voyage is it may be the Indies: but they have also business in France, Holland, Spain, or Turkey; and they accordingly put in there. Now their business is not their way to the end; but it is something they have to do in the way before they come to their journey's end. Thus all our obedience and righteousness are but so many several businesses here, which we are to dispatch while we are in Christ (who is our only way) towards heaven: and Christ himself being our way, he so provides for us that our business goes on. Crisp.

Believers must and will serve God, in duty and obedience; but they must not expect that their duties and obedience will bring them any thing. It is Christ brings every thing you get. While you look to get by what you do, you will but get a knock; because of so much sinfulness in your duties. If you would have any good, you must get it by Christ. Your obedience is that wherein you are to walk in the world, and before the world, that you may [shew forth the power of faith and] be profitable unto men. But as for getting any thing, assure yourself, that while you labour to get by your duties you provoke God, as much as lies in you, to punish you for such presumption, and for the filthiness of the things which you perform. ibid.

When men would have any favour from a king, they do not apply to a scullion in the kitchen, but to the favourite; by whom the king has declared he will grant and deliver all things. When the people came to Pharaoh, Pharaoh sent them to Joseph; and as Joseph said, Pharaoh would do. So would you have any thing of God, go to Christ; and by Christ, go to the Father. ibid.

CHRIST A SHELTER.

The obedience and atonement of Christ are as sufficient to secure perfectly all sinners that fly by faith under the covert of his wings, as the immeasurable circuit of the sky is roomy enough for a lark to fly in, or as the immense brightness of the sun is lightsome enough for a labourer to work by. Hervey.

When the thunders roar and the lightnings flash; when the clouds pour down water, and a horrid storm comes on; all that are in the open air retire under the branches of a thick tree, or fly to some other commodious shelter. [So] the blood and righteousness of Christ are a covert. Hither we may fly and be screened; hither we may fly and be safe. Safe as was Noah, when he entered the ark, and God's own hand closed the door, and God's own eye guided its motions. Hervey.

CHRIST A FOUNDATION.

If we are for setting buttresses to the house that is built upon a rock, what is this but a disparagement to the foundation? If the foundation be already firm and good, why are you for endeavouring to strengthen it? So far as you set up any props unto Christ the foundation, who is to bear up all by himself, so far you disparage Christ, so far you bring him down, and give him not the pre-eminence. Dr. Crisp.

Christ is a sure foundation. So sure that lay what load you can upon him, he stoops not: and therefore he was excellently typified by the pillars of brass in Solomon's Temple. They were made of brass to shew their strength, whereon the whole weight of the porch of the temple lay. ibid.

CHRIST THE HEAD.

You that are believers and are under some particular trial; if you run to any inherent grace, or temper of spirit that is in yourselves, or any qualifications, or any performances that you can tender, and look after all or any of these, as that which will bring you the comfort, the support, or the supplies you want; while you look faintly and coldly upon Christ, and on the freeness and sureness of the grace which Christ brings along with himself; so long you deny unto Christ that pre-eminence which God has given him above all beside. Dr. Crisp.

CHRIST A ROCK.

If thou ever sawest Christ, thou sawest him a rock higher than self-righteousness, Satan and sin. And this rock doth follow thee: and there will be a continual dropping of honey and grace out of this rock to satisfy thee. Wileox.

CHRIST A GIFT.

Hast thou but a mind to Christ? Come and take the water of life freely. It is thine. It is given to thee. There is nothing looked for from thee, to take thy portion in Christ. Thine he is as much as any person's under heaven. Dr. Crisp.

Dost thou thirst? that is, hast thou a mind really to Christ, that Christ should say really to thy soul, I am thy salvation? It may be thou art suspicious of thyself, and thy heart is apt to say, "Christ is not my portion; I am not fit for Christ; I am a great sinner; I must be holy first." Alas! this is bringing a price to Christ. But you must come without money and without price. And what is it to come without money or price? It is to take Christ, and the waters of life, merely and simply as a gift.

Dr. Crisp.
These are the sure mercies of David, when a man receives the things of Christ only because Christ gives them; and not in regard to any action of our's as the ground of taking them. ibid.

CHRIST IN THE HEART.

Let men be ever so great enemies to Christ, yet as soon as he sets up himself in their hearts they will love him, own him, serve him, and suffer for him. Dyer.

CHRIST'S CROSS.

Seeing Christ hath fastened heaven to the far end of the cross, and he will not loosen the knot himself, and none else can (for when Christ ties a knot, all the world cannot undo it); let us then count it exceeding joy when we fall into divers temptations. Rutherford.

The noise and expectation of Christ's cross are weightier than the cross itself. ibid.

Christ and his cross are two good guests worth entertaining. Men would fain have Christ by himself, and so have him cheap: but the market will not come down. ibid.

The cross of Christ is so sweet and profitable, that the saints (such are its gain and glory) might wish it were lawful either to buy or borrow his cross. But it is a mercy that they have it brought to their hand for nothing. ibid.

The cross of Christ (or suffering for his sake), is a crabbed tree to look at; but sweet and fair is the fruit it yields. ibid.

Welcome the cross of Christ and bear it triumphantly: but see it be indeed Christ's cross, not thy own. Wilcox.

A believer studies more how to adorn the cross than how to avoid it. Dyer.

Christ with his cross is better than the world with its crown. ibid.

CHRIST THE SAVIOUR.

Christ the law-giver will always speak in vain without Christ the Saviour. Venn.

CHRIST'S WORK.

If you have been looking at works, duties, and qualifications, instead of looking to Christ, it will cost thee dear. No wonder you go complaining. Graces are no more than evidences: the merits of Christ alone, without thy graces, must be the foundation for thy hope to bottom on. Christ only is the hope of glory. Wilcox.

He that builds upon duties, graces, &c. knows not the merits of Christ. This makes believing so hard, and so far above nature. If thou believest thou must every day renounce (from being any part of thy dependance) thy obedience, thy baptism, thy sanctification, thy duties, thy graces, and thy tears, thy meltings, thy humblings; and nothing but Christ must be held up. Wilcox.

When we come to God, we must bring nothing but Christ with us. Any ingredients or previous qualifications of our own will poison and corrupt faith. ibid.

In the highest commands look at Christ; not as an exactor to require, but as a debtor by promise, and as an undertaker to work. ibid.

As water, falling on a rocky way, glides off as fast as it falls; whence the way is hard as before the rain fell, and a man may stand as firmly there as before; so all our sinfulness, while we are in the way of Christ, as thick as it falls, passeth off from us to him, and from him also, by virtue of that satisfaction which he hath made to the justice of God. Crisp.

As the payment of a great sum all at once, and at a day, is a better payment than by a penny a year, until a thousand years be out; so Christ's satisfying the Father at once, by one sacrifice of himself, is a better satisfaction, then if we should have been infinite days in paying that which his justice requires, and his indignation to sin doth expect. ibid.

Let it be observed, that Christ's active obedience to the law for us, and in our room and stead, does not exempt us from personal obedience to it; any more than his sufferings and death exempt us from a corporal death, or suffering for his sake. It is true, indeed, we do not suffer and die, in the sense he did, to satisfy justice and atone for sin; so neither do we yield obedience to the law, in order to obtain eternal life by it. By Christ's obedience for us we are exempted from obedience to the law, in this sense; but not from obedience to it, as a rule of walk and conversation, by which we may glorify God, and express our thankfulness to him for his abundant mercies. Dr. Gill.

It is Christ's work, to take every present sin off the conscience of the believer, by the application of his blood and sacrifice — Hence he is said to be the Lamb of God that taketh away, that continues to take away, the sins of the world. ibid.

Before God enlightened me into the righteousness of Christ, and justification by it; I used to wonder how it was that, seeing Christ lived thirty three years and six months upon earth, only his death, or at most, the last week of his life, should be of any avail for the salvation of sinners. But blessed be God, I have long seen that Christ was all that time working out a perfect obedience for my acceptance with the Father. "By the obedience of one shall many be made righteous," is a text that amply accounts for his having spent above thirty-three years below previous to his crucifixion; and is a truth by which my soul is nourished and fed to life everlasting.

Mr. Romaine, in conversation, July 18, 1769.

If I had the righteousness of a saint, says one, O how happy should I be! If I had the righteousness of an angel, says another, I should fear no evil. But I am bold to say, that the poorest sinner, who believes in Christ, has a righteousness infinitely more excellent than either saints or angels. If the law asks for sinless perfection, it is to be found in Christ, my divine Surety. If the law requires an obedience that may stand before the burning eye of God, behold, it is in Jesus my Mediator. Should the strictest justice arraign me, and the purest holiness make its demands upon me, I remit them both to my dying and obedient Immanuel. With him the Father is always well-pleased; and in him the believer stands complete.

Mr. Hervey.

Jesus says concerning his people, "If they have sinned, I have taken their sins upon myself. If they have multiplied transgressions as the stars of heaven, my Father hath laid on me the iniquities of them all. They are my redeemed ones; I have bought them with my blood; I cannot lose my purchase. If they are not saved, I am not glorified."

ibid.

CHRIST'S COMPANY.

While Christ was upon earth, he was more among publicans and sinners, than among scribes and pharisees; for these were self-righteous [and so, not fit company for him who came to seek and to save the lost].

Wilcox.

CHRIST'S LIBERALITY.

Christ is not more rich himself, than he is liberal to contribute of his treasures. He makes his people sharers to the uttermost of all that he has.

Crisp.

CHRIST'S PRESENCE.

I know the sun will overcloud and eclipse, and I shall again be put to walk in the shade. But Christ must be welcome to come and go as he thinketh meet. Yet his coming would be more welcome to me than his going.

Rutherford.

Christ is ever present in and with his people: and while he is on board, the ship cannot sink. He may, indeed, seem to sleep, for a time; and to disregard both the vessel and the storm. Do you awake him by prayer and supplication.

CHRIST'S CARE.

A true friend divides the cares and doubles the joys of his brother in affection.

Christ does more; for he takes the cares of his people entirely on himself; and not only doubles their joys, but makes all his joys their own.

Anon.

Suppose a king's son should get out of a besieged city, and leave his wife and children behind, whom he loves as his own soul; would this prince, when arrived at his father's palace, delight himself with the splendour of the court, and forget his family in distress? No: but having their cries and groans always in his ears, he would come post to his father, and entreat him as ever he loved him, that he would send all the force of his kingdom to raise the siege, and save his dear relations from perishing. Nor will Christ, though gone up from the world, and ascended into his glory, forget his children for a moment that are left behind him.

Gurnall.

CHRIST'S NECESSITIES.

Why was the bread of life hungry, but that if he might feed the hungry with the bread of life? Why was rest itself weary, but to give the weary rest? Why was the prince of peace in trouble, but that the troubled might have peace? None but the image of God could restore us to God's image. None, but the prince of peace, could bring the God of peace, and the peace of God, to poor sinners.

Dyer.

CHRIST'S PURCHASE.

The whole election of grace, all the children of God scattered about in the world; all the Lord's people that ever have been, are, or shall be; may truly be said to be the pearl of great price, which Christ came into this world to seek for, and found: and finding it, sold all that he had, shed his blood, parted with his life, and gave himself for it, and bought it.

Dr. Gill.

CHRIST'S SUFFERINGS.

We cannot [fully] understand the sufferings of Christ. God only knows what is in the curse of the law. God alone knows what is the true [and utmost] desert of sin. How, then, do we know what Christ suffered, when the punishment due to our sin, when all our iniquities met on him, [and he had] the curse of the law upon him! God only knows what is in these things.

Dr. Owen.

CHRIST'S LOVE.

It is a peculiar kind of expression Eph. iii. 19. where the apostle prays that, they might "know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge." We may know that experimentally which we cannot know comprehensively; we may know that in its power and effects which we cannot comprehend in its nature and depths. A weary person may receive refreshment from a spring, who cannot fathom the depth of the ocean whence it proceeds.

Dr. Owen.

I have seen the white side of Christ's cross. How lovely hath he been to his oppressed servant.

ibid.

How little of the sea can a child carry in his hand! as little do I take away of my great sea, the boundless love of Christ.

Rutherford.

[Written from Aberdeen prison by Rutherford.]

My Lord Jesus is kinder to me than ever he was. It pleaseth him to dine and sup with his afflicted prisoner. The king feasteth me, and his spikenard casteth a sweet smell. Put Christ's love to the trial, and throw all your burdens upon it, and then it will appear love indeed. We employ not his love, and therefore we know it not.

CHRIST'S WILLINGNESS.

It is less injurious to Christ, to doubt even of his existence, than to doubt of his willingness to save a wounded, broken-hearted sinner.

CHRIST THE ONLY SAVIOUR.

Do not legalise the gospel; as if part remained for you to do and suffer, and Christ were but a half-mediator: or as if you were to bear part of your own sin, and make part satisfaction. Let sin break thy heart, but not thy hope.

Wilcox.

Christ will be a pure, total Redeemer and Mediator, and thou must be an undone sinner, or Christ and thou will never agree.

CHRIST'S RIGHTEOUSNESS

Sin has stripped man of his moral clothing. Man's own righteousness will not cover his nakedness; and whoever is destitute of Christ's righteousness, is a naked person.

Dr. Gill.

Christ's righteousness is called, The righteousness of the law, Rom. viii. 4. For though righteousness does not come by our obedience to the law, yet it does by Christ's obedience to it as performed by man, no flesh living can be justified; yet by the deeds of the law, as performed by Christ, all the elect are justified.

Christ's righteousness is also called The righteousness of faith, Rom. iv. 13; not as if faith were our righteousness, either in whole or in part, but because faith receives the righteousness of Christ, puts it on, rejoices in it, and boasts of it.

ibid.

Christ's righteousness is called The best robe, Luke xv. 22; or, as the Greek text hath it, the first robe, την σολην την πρωτην. For though Adam's robe of righteousness in innocence was the first in wear, this was first provided in the covenant of grace: this was first in designation, though that was first in use.

We must be declared free from guilt, and invested with a righteousness that will stand before the law of sinless perfection and entitle us to the kingdom of heaven. And if we have it not in ourselves, where must we look for it but as existing solely in the person of Jesus Christ? Dependence therefore upon that righteousness, as wrought out by him for believers, and appointed of God for sinners to trust in, is the gracious faith of the gospel by which the soul is justified.

Satan and the world may ask us, "How can ye be justified by a righteousness which is not your's?" We answer, "The righteousness of Christ is our's, and our's by as great a right as any other thing we possess to wit, by the free gift of God; for it hath pleased him to give us a garment who were naked, and to give us, who had none of our own, a righteousness answerable to justice."

Bp. Cowper.

Men generally think that, besides Christ and his merits, there is something more in the way that leadeth to life, namely, a man's own righteousness, to act in conjunction with Christ: "these together," say they, "are the way to salvation." Alas for such! Christ alone is the way to heaven; and he himself has declared that way to be a narrow one. It is, among other respects, narrow in this regard; that all a man's own righteousness [as a ground, cause, or condition of justification and eternal life] must be clean shut out. It is so narrow that there can be nothing in the way but the righteousness of Christ. When a man's own righteousness is supposed to be a part of the way, we make the way broader than God will allow.

Dr. Crisp.

Whatever comes in when thou goest to God for acceptance, besides Christ, call it antichrist; bid it be gone; make only Christ's righteousness triumphant. All besides that is Babylon, which must fall if Christ stand; and thou shalt rejoice in the day of the fall thereof.

Mr. Wilcox.

Do as much as thou wilt, but stand with all thy weight upon Christ's righteousness. Take heed of having one foot on thy own righteousness and another on Christ's.

ibid.

It is the hardest thing in the world to take Christ alone for our righteousness. Join any thing to him of your own, and you unchrist him.

ibid.

Whatsoever is of nature's spinning must be all unravelled before Christ's righteousness can be put on.

ibid.

Nothing can kill sin but the beholding of Christ's righteousness.

ibid.

CHRIST'S EXALTATION.

Christ's exalted state in glory does not make him neglectful of poor sinners, nor scornful to them: no, he has the same heart in heaven that he had on earth. He went through all thy temptations, dejections, sorrows, and desertions. He drank the bitterest of the cup, and left the sweet. The condemnation is out. He drank up all the Father's wrath at one draught, and nothing but salvation is left for thee. ibid.

CHRIST'S INTERCESSION.

Christ commands in heaven as he does upon earth. There is nothing he can ask of the Father but it is answered. He never has a nay. If any come to be a suitor to him, to put up a petition for him, he is sure to speed. Crisp.

If you would pray but cannot, and so are discouraged, see Christ praying for you, and using his interest with the Father for you. Wilcox.

CHRISTIANS.

Thou, who hast seen Christ all, and thyself absolutely nothing; to whom Christ is life, and who art dead to all righteousness besides; thou art a Christian, one highly beloved, and who has found favour with God. Wilcox.

None can make a Christian but he that made the world. Hart.

The sons of God have much in hand, and more in hope. Manton.

God's people are too touchy in looking so much for respect from men. It argues a secret leaven of pride if they murmur when the world doth not esteem them. A Christian is an unknown man in the world, and therefore should not take it ill if he finds himself slighted. ibid.

A Christian that roweth against the stream of the flesh and blood is the world's wonder and the world's reproof. ibid.

The best of Christians are found in the worst of times.

COMMUNION WITH GOD.

Though a gracious soul may not always enjoy sensible communion with God in the ordinances, yet it has always this good sign, that it cannot be easy and satisfied without it. Dr. Giffard.

Have you any reason to believe that you have at any time had communion with God, in private or in public, in your closet or in the family, or in the house of God, under any ordinance, either the ministry of the word, or prayer, or the supper of the Lord? Then you may be assured Christ has made satisfaction for you, or you would never have enjoyed such communion. Anon.

CIRCUMSPECTION.

Persons who make a peculiar profession of godliness should be peculiarly circumspect in their moral walk, else they hurt not only their own character, but, above all, the cause of religion itself; and resemble a man who carries fire in one hand and water in the other. Mrs. Bacon, Feb. 16, 1770.

COMFORTS.

Of all created comforts God is the lender. You are the borrower, not an owner. Rutherford.

God's comforts are no dreams. He would not put his seal on blank paper, nor deceive his afflicted ones that trust in him. ibid.

If comfort fails, God's faithfulness does not. What though your pitcher is broke? The fountain is still as full as ever.

The Rev. Mr. Williams.

I had rather be a means of comforting one of God's dear children than gain the applause of a nation. Ryland.

COMPANY.

Better is it to go with a few to heaven than with a multitude to hell, and be damned for the sake of company. Parr

COMPLAINING.

Complaining of God is one thing; complaining to God is another. Mr. Caser.

COMPARISON NO CRITERION.

Sometimes perhaps thou hearest another Christian pray with much freedom, fluency, and movingness of expression, while thou canst hardly get out a few broken words in duty. Hence thou art ready to accuse thyself, and to admire him. As if the gilding of the key made it open the door the better. Gurnall.

Take heed of judging thyself unconverted, because thou mayest not have felt so much horror as some others in thy first convictions. O believer, that has not heard so much, it may be, of the rattling of the chains of hell, nor, in thy conscience, so much of the outcries of the damned, as to make thy very flesh tremble; but hast thou not seen that, in a bleeding Christ, which hath made thy heart melt, and mourn, and loathe thy lusts? It is strange to hear a patient complain of the physician (when he finds his prescriptions work effectually) merely because the operation did not affect him so violently as in some others. Soul, thou hast the more reason to bless God, if the convictions of his Spirit have wrought so kindly on thee, without those extremities of terror which have cost others so dear. ibid.

It may be thou seest another abound with that joy which thou wantest, and art therefore ready to think his grace is more, and thine less, than it really is; while perhaps thou mayest have as much real grace as he, only thou wantest a light to shew thee where it lies. ibid.

CONCEIT.

There is a strong resemblance between a pert, overbearing, conceited opinionist and a drunken man. You may see him reeling to and fro; now entertaining this odd conceit, to-morrow that, and the next day a third: unstable in all. Vomiting, too, and casting out scornful reproaches against such as differ from him. Talkative, as drunkards commonly are; prating, and obtruding his own opinions on every body. Self-sufficient, and boasting himself and his party as too hard for all their opposers. Thus, as our proverb saith, "one drunkard is forty men strong."—Whoever attempts to reason with such a dogmatist will soon find him as incapable of conviction as Nabal was of Abigail's narration, until his wine was gone out of him.

Dr. Arrowsmith.

CONFIDENCE.

Even when a believer sees no light, he may feel some influence; when he cannot close with a promise, he may lay hold on an attribute, and say, "Though both my flesh and my heart fail, yet divine faithfulness and divine compassions fail not. Though I can hardly discern at present either sun, moon, or stars, yet will I cast anchor in the dark, and ride it out until the day break, and the shadows flee away."

Arrowsmith.

CONSOLATIONS

Divine consolations are the nearest to us when human assistances are furthest from us.

CONSTITUTION SINS.

Watch against constitution sins. See them in their vileness, and they will never break out into act.

Wilcox.

CONTENTMENT.

Be willing to want what God is not willing to give.

Dyer.

Contentment without the world is better than the world without contentment.

ibid.

Be contented with a mean condition. This is not the time for the manifestation of the sons of God. Though others that are wicked may have a larger portion and allowance than you, yet God doth not misplace his hands (as Joseph thought his father did, Gen. xlviii.), but puts them upon the right head, and assigns temporal blessings to the right persons. Ephraim is not preferred before Manasseh without reason.

Manton.

Brown bread with the gospel is good fare.

Dodd.

When the heart is full of God, a little of the world will go a great way with us.

Mr. Storer, in conversation Dec. 15, 1769.

Content is all we aim at with our store:
"If that be had with little, what need more?"

CONTRAST.

As the wicked are hurt by the best things so the godly are bettered by the worst.

CONVERSION.

It is a greater act of grace, for God, to work conversion in a sinner than to crown that conversion with glory. It is more gracious and condescending in a prince to marry a poor damsel, than having married her, to clothe her like a princess. He was free to do the first or not; but his relation to her pleads strongly for the other. God might have chosen whether he would have given thee grace, or no; but having done this, thy relation to him, and his covenant with thee in his Son, do oblige him to add more and more, until he hath fitted thee as a bride for himself in glory.

Gurnall.

If Satan seeks to puzzle thee about the time of thy conversion, content thyself with this, that thou seest the streams of grace, though, perhaps, the exact time of thy first receiving it (like the head of Nilus) may not easily be found.

You may know the sun is up, though you did not observe when it rose.

ibid.

Conversion of the soul to God is like changing a kernel of mud into a river of crystal.

Mr. Engleheart, in conversation at London, May 14, 1776.

Since Christ looked upon me in conversation, my heart is not my own: he hath run away with it to heaven.

Mr. Rutherford.

CONVERSATION.

A daily conversation in heaven is the surest forerunner of a constant abode there. The Spirit of God, by enabling us hereunto, first brings heaven into the soul, and then conducts the soul to heaven.

Arrowsmith.

CONVICTION.

Happy conviction of guilt! which performs the same beneficent office the Baptist discharged of old; it prepares the way of the Lord, and renders his salvation inestimably precious to the soul.

Venn.

The greatness of Christ's merit is not known but to a poor soul at the greatest loss. Slight convictions will occasion but slight prizings of Christ's blood and righteousness.

Anon.

CORRECTION.

God's corrections are our instructions; his lashes our lessons; and his scourges our school-masters. Whence both in Hebrew and Greek, chastening and teaching are expressed by one word, מַסָּר and παιδεία.

Brookes.

It is of the Lord's mercy that our affliction is not execution, but correction.

He that hath deserved hanging may be glad to escape with a whipping. Brookes.

“If we run away from the Lord, he has a covenant-rod for our backs; but it is a rod in the hand of a father.” A dying Saying of my friend, Mr. Lovett, who went to Heaven, September 4, 1775.

The correction which you at present consider as an argument of wrath, may be an evidence of love and an act of mercy. God will prune thee, but not hew thee down. The right of his clemency knows what the left hand of his severity is doing. Better for thee to be a chastened son than an undisciplined bastard. Arrowsmith.

CREATURE COMFORTS.

Creature comforts are often to the soul what suckers are to a tree; and God takes off those that these may thrive. Mr. Ryland, in conversation, Dec. 23, 1769.

CRITERION.

When thou gettest no comfort in hearing, nor ease to thy spirit in praying, and yet growest more eager to hear, and art more frequent in prayer; Oh soul, great are thy faith and patience.

Blessed is your condition if you have this testimony in your conscience; that, acknowledging your own natural ignorance and blindness, you call upon the name of the Lord Jesus, to enlighten your mind, to make his way plain before you, and to give you a strong and distinct perception of the great things that concern your eternal peace.

Blessed is your condition if, feeling your utter incapacity to procure the favour of God by the best of your duties, reformations, or performances, and confounded in your own sight, for your great defects, you build all your hope of acceptance with God, on what Christ has done and suffered for you. Blessed is your condition, if afflicted with the exceeding great vileness of your natural affections, and longing for victory over them; for a more spiritual mind, and for a farther progress in love both to God and man; you depend on the renewing, sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit, to work this divine change within you.

This is to believe in the only begotten Son of God without partiality and without hypocrisy. This the word of God pronounces to be that dependance on Christ which shall never be confounded. Venn.

DARKNESS OF SOUL.

If you are under darkness of soul, first go to God with it; and then go to some experienced saint of your acquaintance. It is good sometimes to light your candle at a neighbour's fire. Anon.

DEAD IN SIN.

Great was the cry in Egypt when the first-born in each family was dead; but are there not many families where all are dead together? Boston.

Death is a friend of grace, and the enemy of nature. Dodd.

Mankind are like sheep grazing on a common: the butcher comes continually and fetches away one, and another, and another; while the rest feed on unconcerned, until he comes for the last.

Mr. Herne, formerly Rector of Blagdon, Somerset.

The dread and dislike of death do by no means prove that a person is not a child of God. Even a strong believer may be afraid to die. We are not in general, fond of handling a serpent or a viper, even though its sting is drawn, and though we know it to be so.

Mr. John Martin, London, May, 1774.

Though a believer may have his darkness, doubts, and fears, and many conflicts of soul while on his dying-bed; yet usually these are all over and gone before his last moments come, and death does its work and office upon him. From the gracious promises of God, to be with his people even unto death; and from the scriptural accounts of dying saints; and from the observations I have made through the course of my life; I am of opinion, that generally speaking, the people of God die comfortably; their spiritual enemies being made to be as still as a stone, while they pass through Jordan, or the stream of death. Dr. Gill.

The consideration of the state of the dead as of persons asleep, should moderate our sorrow for the loss of departed friends. What master of a family can be uneasy at finding his family, his wife, his children, his servants, in a sound fast sleep at midnight? May he not expect that they will rise in the morning well and healthful, and ready to go about any service that may be proper for them? When Christ said, concerning Lazarus, “Our friend Lazarus sleepeth;” “Lord,” said the disciples, “if he sleep, he shall do well.” The saints, who are fallen asleep, must needs do well. They cannot do otherwise than well, who not only sleep but sleep in Jesus. ibid.

As a man that takes a walk in his garden, and spying a beautiful full-blown flower, crops it, and puts it into his bosom; so the Lord takes his walks in his gardens, the churches; and gathers his lilies, souls fully ripe for glory, and with delight takes them to himself. ibid.

There is no way to live with God, in glory, but by dying. Christians would be clothed with a blessed immortality, but they are loathe to be unclothed for it: they pray, thy kingdom come; and, when God is leading them thither, they are afraid to go. What is there in this valley of tears, that should make us weep to leave it.

Cripplegate Lect.

DECREES OF GOD.

A cockle-fish may as soon crowd the ocean into its narrow shell, as vain man ever comprehend the decrees of God. Anon.

DEFAMATION.

How harmless is defamation from a fellow-creature, when the great Creator smiles! Anon.

DEISM.

We can never expect to see Deism decline, whilst those principles which support it, are maintained by [professing Christians] themselves. But would Protestants return to their ancient Protestant doctrines, and live and practise accordingly, then would religion flourish; and Atheism, Deism, Arianism, and every other ism sink apace.

Dr. Gill.

DEPRAVITY.

Nature is so corrupted as not to understand its own depravation. Dr. Owen.

If we trace man's forgetfulness of God up to its real source, it will afford us the most afflicting evidence of his natural depravity, and prove that he is a despiser of the Lord God Omnipotent. Venn.

DEPENDENCE ON CHRIST ALONE.

A lively dependance on the Lord Jesus Christ implies an intimate and most interesting connection between him and the soul; a knowledge of him, affecting to the heart, and full of influence; an application to him, daily and persevering. So that a man who is living in such dependance on the Son of God, might as reasonably call in question the reality of transactions passing between himself and his friends on earth, as whether he is indeed a believer on Jesus. ibid.

A Judas may have the sop; the outward privileges of baptism, the Lord's supper, Church-membership, &c. But like John, to lean on Christ's bosom, is the gospel ordinance posture in which we should hear, pray, and perform all duties. Wilcox.

Nothing but lying on Christ's bosom will dissolve hardness of heart, and make thee mourn kindly for sin, and humble thee indeed, and make thy soul cordial to Christ, yea, transform the ugliest piece of hell into the image and glory of Christ. ibid.

Looking at the natural sun weakens the eye; but the more you look at Christ, the sun of righteousness, the stronger and clearer will the eye of faith be. Look but on Christ, and you will love him and live on him. Wilcox.

See Christ, and you see all. Keep your eye steadily fixed on his blood and righteousness; and only look at your graces in the second place. Else, every blast of temptation will shake you. ibid.

If you would so see the sinfulness of sin, as to loathe it, and to mourn for it; do not stand looking upon sin, but first look upon Christ as suffering and satisfying. ibid.

He who looks upon Christ through his graces, is like one that sees the sun in water; which wavers and moves as the water doth. Look upon Christ, only as shining in the firmament of the Father's grace and love; and there you will see him in his own genuine glory and unspeakable fullness. ibid.

He who sets up his sanctification to look at to comfort him, sets up that which will strengthen his doubts and fears. Do but look off Christ, and presently, like Peter, you begin to sink into distress, discouragements, and despondency. ibid.

A Christian seldom wants comfort, but by breaking the order and method of the gospel; i. e. by looking upon his own righteousness, instead of looking off to the perfect righteousness of Christ. What is this, but choosing rather to live by candle-light, than by the light of the sun? ibid.

DESIRE.

Of a small handful of outward things, I am ready to say, it is enough. But that, which I long passionately for, is, a large heartful of God in Christ. Arrousmith.

I would rather utter one of those groans the apostle speaks of, Rom. viii. 26. than shed Esau's tears, have Balaam's prophetic spirit, or the joy of the stony-ground hearer. Boston.

DESERTS.

Thy deserts are hell, wrath, rejection; Christ's deserts are life, pardon, acceptance. If God hath shewn thee the former, he will give thee the latter. Wilcox.

DISAPPOINTMENTS.

When I have been asked to spend an afternoon with gentlemen of learned education and unquestionable ingenuity, I have fancied myself invited to take a turn in some beautiful garden, where I expected to have been treated with a sight of the most delicate flowers, and most amiable forms of nature: when to my surprise, I have been shewn nothing but the most worthless thistles, and contemptible weeds. Mr. Hervcy.

Is a father to be blamed, for striking a cup of poison out of his child's hand? Or fallest down some precipice or other, by thy irregular acting. Gurnall.

God, for stripping us of those outward comforts which would run away with our hearts from him? Mr. Madan.

DISCRIMINATING GRACE.

By nature, there is no difference between the elect and reprobate. Paul was as bloody a persecutor as Domitian, or Julian; Zacheus as unconscionable and covetous of a worldling as was that rich glutton damned to hell. The elect and reprobate, before converting grace make the difference, are like two men walking in one journey, of one mind, and one heart. They resemble Elijah and Elisha, walking and talking together, when, lo! a chariot of fire suddenly severs them; and Elijah is rapt up into heaven, while Elisha is left behind upon earth.—So is it when God's effectual calling, quite unlooked for, comes and separates those two who before were walking together, yea, running to the same excess of riot. The one returns back to the Lord, from whom he was fallen; while the other, being himself untouched by God, marvels that his former companion hath forsaken him, and walks on still in the old course of his sins, to his final condemnation. Bishop Couper

When God called Paul, he found him a persecutor. Saul was seeking his father's asses when Samuel came to call him to the kingdom. Peter and Andrew were mending their nets; Matthew was sitting at the receipt of custom; when Christ called them. So, when we do inquire of our own consciences how we were employed when the Lord called us by his grace; we shall find that we were employed either in vain, wicked, or worldly things: so that we had no mind to his kingdom. Let the praise therefore of our calling be reserved to the Lord only. ibid.

What are all the visible impieties in this world but so many comments on the depravity of our fallen nature? A converted person may say, "Lord, such a drunkard, such an adulterer, such a sodomite, or murderer, &c. was cut off from the same piece that I was; and only free-grace came between us." O Christian, if grace hath made thee white paper, thou wert by nature as very a dunghill-rag, as the filthiest sinner Criplegate Lectures.

DISPUTES.

In glory, all religious differences and disputes will for ever cease. There will be an universal shaking of hands in heaven. Mr. S. Wilkes, in conversation, Dec. 23, 1769.

DISCRETION.

If discretion sit not in the saddle, to rein and bridle in thy zeal, thou wilt soon be hurried over hedge and ditch, until thou

DIVINE LIGHT.

The things which the Holy Ghost discovers are no other for substance but those very things which are contained in the written word: only he affords regenerate persons clearer light to discern them by, than they had before conversion.—Turn a learned man to the same author which he perused when a young student; he will find the self-same matter, but see a great deal further into it, because he hath now got further light and knowledge. Arrowsmith.

DIVINE GOODNESS.

Created goodness, being limited, may be liable to fall short. Esau might have somewhat to plead for saying, "Hast thou but one blessing, O my father?"—But divine goodness is an ocean that hath neither bank nor bottom. Our heavenly Father hath blessings reserved, as well as bestowed. ibid.

DIVINE POWER.

Zion's king gets no subjects but by stroke of sword in the day of his power. None come to him but such as are drawn by a divine hand. Boston.

DIVINE HELP.

Divine help is the nearest when our misery is at the greatest. Man's extremity is God's opportunity. When Mordecai is thoroughly humbled, Haman shall be hanged. Dyer.

DIVINE SOVEREIGNTY.

We are, in God's hand, as clay in the hand of the potter. Did you ever know a potter thank a vessel of his own making for its beauty or usefulness? Surely the praise is due, not to the pot, but to the potter. In a still infinitely higher degree is the whole praise due to God for the graces and the good works which he has given us.

Mr. R. Hill, London, August 30, 1775.

DOUBTS.

Oh trembling believer! if Satan should at any time move thee to doubt of thy election, answer him by telling him that he was never of God's cabinet-council. Anon.

Who had more testimonies of God's favour than David? Yet was he sometimes at a loss, not only to read, but even to spell his evidences. Gurnall.

Unbelief may, perhaps, tear the copies of the covenant which Christ hath given you; but he still keeps the original in heaven with himself. Your doubts and fears are no parts of the covenant; neither can they change Christ. Rutherford.

I have questioned whether or no I ever knew any thing of Christianity, save the letters which make up the word. Rutherford.

Doubtings are your sins: but they are also the drugs and ingredients which Christ, the good physician, makes use of for the curing of your pride. ibid.

DUST.

Art not thou the son of Adam? And was not he the son of dust? And was not that dust the son of nothing? "Why art thou proud, O dust and ashes?" says the son of Sirach, Eccles. x. 9. And Bernard puts this excellent question: "Cum sis humillimus, cur non es humillimus?" Arrowsmith.

DUTIES.

Take up all duties in point of performance; and lay them down in point of dependance. Duty can never have too much of our diligence, nor too little of our confidence. Dyer.

Be serious and exact in duty, having the weight of it upon thy heart: but be as much afraid of taking comfort from thy duties themselves as from thy sins. Wilcox.

They who act in the path of duty and depend on the power of God, are equally safe at all times and in all circumstances: no less safe when surrounded by enraged enemies, than when encircled by kind and assiduous friends. Mr. Newton.

DYING BEDS.

Visit dying beds [especially of saints] and deserted souls, much. They are excellent scholars in experience. Wilcox.

Go to dying beds; there you will learn the true worth of deliverance from damnation by the death of Christ. Ask some agonizing friend: he, and he alone, can tell you what a blessing it is to have the king of terrors converted into a messenger of peace. Hervey.

EARLY CONVERSION.

If I could lawfully envy any body, I should envy those that are converted to God in their youth. They escape much sin and sorrow; and resemble Jacob, who carried off the blessing betimes. Anon.

EFFICACY.

The least sight of Christ is saving; the least touch of him is healing. Wilcox.

EFFECTUAL CALLING.

Effectual calling is the middle link in the undividable chain of salvation: he that hath it, is sure of both the ends [i. e. of his past predestination to life, and of his future glorification]. Our calling is the manifestation of our secret election, and a sure forerunner of glory: being, in effect, the voice of God telling us beforehand that he will glorify us. Bp. Couper.

As the best way when you are on the main land to find out the sea is to walk by a river that runneth into it; so he that would proceed from election to glorification, let him trace his calling, which is, if I may so express it, a river flowing out of the brazen mountains of God's eternal election, and running perpetually upward until it enter into the heaven of heavens. ibid.

There is much the same difference between election and effectual calling, as between a private manuscript and a printed book. In election God, as it were, wrote and entered us in his heavenly register: but it is still kept by him, and none know the contents but himself: whereas in effectual calling God, as it were, prints off a sheet of the book of life, and publishes it and makes it known to the soul. Gurnall.

ELECTION.

Election depends on God alone; all other blessings upon election: saith Heinsius. "Cætera pendent ab electione; electio a Deo." Arrowsmith.

Election having once pitched upon a man, it will find him out and call him home, wherever he be. It called Zaccheus out of accursed Jericho; Abraham out of idolatrous Ur of the Chaldeans; Nicodemus, and Paul, from the college of the Pharisees, Christ's sworn enemies; Dionysius, and Damaris, out of superstitious Athens. In whatsoever dunghills God's jewels are hid, election will both find them out and fetch them out. ibid.

Prove your conversion, and you need not doubt of your election. Mr. Joseph Allein.

It was well said by Sir Francis Bacon, that "old wood is best to burn; old friends best to trust; and old books best to read." What vast value do scholars put upon an ancient manuscript! Doubtless, the oldest of all manuscripts is the book of life; and the writing our names therein, the first-born of all God's favours. If God sets a value on the first-fruits of our services, how careful should we be to magnify the first-fruits of his goodness? If old charters be of so great esteem as they are in the world, what an immense estimate should we set upon the most ancient magna charta of our eternal election, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his! ibid.

It is a good saying of Austin, "Intra mundum facti sumus, ante mundum electi sumus." We were made within the world, but chosen before it. ibid.

The Lamb's book of life (so named because Jesus stands there enrolled at the head of it, as the head of all the elect, and as the captain of that salvation to which they were chosen) is a book of love.

"Behold my servant whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased." It was so said of Christ, and may be applied to all the elect, in their measure. Hence Paul styles the Thessalonians, "Beloved of the Lord; because God had chosen them unto salvation." And God himself expresses the election of Jacob, by "Jacob have I loved;" to shew that free love on God's part is the source and foundation of this favour.

Mr. Joseph Allein.

If that saying of the Stoics be true, "In sapientum decretis nulla est litura," i. e. in the decrees of wise men there can be no blotting nor blurring; how much more may it be asserted concerning the decrees of the infinitely wise God? If it became Pilate to say, what I have written, I have written; it would certainly misbecome the great and immutable God to blot so much as any one single name out of the Lamb's book of life, written by himself before the world was. We may rest assured that this book will admit of no deleatur, nor of any expurgatory index.

As, in military affairs, commanders have their muster rolls, wherein are contained the names of all the soldiers they have listed: whence the phrase, "conscribere milites;" and in commonwealths, there are registers kept, wherein are recorded the names of such as are chosen to offices of trust and preferment; whence the title of patres conscripti, given to the Roman senators: so the condescension of Scripture, which speaks of God after the manner of men, ascribes to him a book of life, wherein it represents a legible writing and registering of the names of all those persons whom he hath irreversibly predestinated to life everlasting.

Your election will be known by your interest in Christ; and your interest in Christ by the sanctification of the Spirit. There is a chain of salvation: the beginning of it is from the Father; the dispensation through the Son; the application by the Spirit. In looking after the comfort of election, you must look inward to the work of the Spirit in your hearts; then outward to the work of Christ on the cross; then upward to the heart of the Father in heaven.

Mr. Samuel Clark.

By a work of grace in thee thou mayest as surely know thou art elected as if thou hadst stood at God's elbow when he wrote thy name in the book of life.

Gurnall.

Before you go to the university you ought to go to school. Do not meddle with election and predestination until you have experienced something of divine grace in your effectual vocation.

Ascribed to Mr. Bradford, the martyr.

Let us take those words, Rom. viii. 30. which way we will; let us read them backwards or forwards; they tell us that election and salvation, both initial and final, are undivided, and inseparably united together.

Mr. Sladen.

In every congregation where the faithful word is preached, there are some who belong to the election of grace, [and are either to be called or comforted].

ibid.

The evidence of our election is in time; the decree itself is from eternity.

ibid.

EMPLOYMENT.

Some employments may be better than others; but there is no employment so bad as the having none at all: the mind will contract a rust, and an unfitness for every good thing; and a man must either fill up his time with good, or at least innocent business, or it will run to the worst sort of waste, to sin and vice.

Anon.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

In all doubtings, fears and storms of conscience, look at Christ continually. Do not argue it with Satan; but send him to Christ for an answer.

Wilcox.

There are in heaven many thousands of as rich monuments of mercy as ever thou canst be. The greatest sinner did never surpass the grace of Christ.

ibid.

Throughout the whole Scripture there is not one ill word against a poor sinner who is stript of his self-righteousness. Nay, the Scripture expressly points out such a man as the subject of gospel-grace, and none else.

ibid.

ENJOYMENTS.

To a lively believer, who enjoys continual fellowship with God, every day is a sabbath, and every meal a sacrament.

A saying of the late Mr. Hervey.

ERROR.

Believers are not afterwards the worse for having been once Arminians. They are the better qualified, when God has brought them out of darkness and bondage, to discern and defeat the sophistry of those errors wherewith they themselves have been deluded. Just as a person who has been prisoner in an enemy's country can, when he gets away, turn his knowledge to the advantage of himself and the better annoyance of his adversaries.

Mr. Tozer in conversation, Oct. 22. 1769.

ESTIMATE.

A ragged saint is dearer to God than a glittering emperor that is without grace.

Anon.

ETERNITY.

No worldly thing seems great to him that minds eternity.

Richardson.

EVANGELICAL OBEDIENCE.

The law [rightly understood] will not suffer you to consider the most conscientious course of obedience in any other light than as a testimony that you believe, with godly sincerity, the delightful truth that Jesus purged away your sins by the sacrifice of himself: for which unspeakable benefit, you love him, you keep his commandments, you abhor those iniquities which made him groan and bleed and die. Venn.

EVIDENCES.

File up thy old receipts which thou hast had from God, testifying the pardon of thy sins. There are some festival days when God comes forth, clothed with the robes of his mercy, and holds forth the sceptre of his grace more familiarly to his children than ordinary; bearing witness to their faith, &c. Then the firmament is clear, and not a cloud to be seen to darken the Christian's comforts. Love and joy are the soul's repast and pastime while this feast lasts. Now when God withdraws and this cheer is taken off, Satan's work is how to wear out the remembrance and certainty of these sweet evidences. It behoves thee, therefore, to lay up thy writings safely. Such a testimony may serve to nonsuit thy accuser many years hence. One affirmative from God's mouth for thy pardoned state carries more weight, though of an old date, than a thousand negatives from Satan's.

Gurnall.

If Satan haunts thee with fears of thy spiritual estate, ply thee to the throne of grace, and beg a new copy of thy old evidence which thou hast lost.

The original is in the pardon-office in heaven, whereof Christ is master. Thy name is on record in that court. Make thy moan to God. Hear what news from heaven, rather than listen to the tales which are brought by thine enemy from hell. Can you expect truth from a liar, or comfort from an adversary? Did the devil ever prophesy well of believers? ibid.

EVENTS.

Duties are our's: Events are the Lord's. When we go to meddle with events, and to hold a court (as it were) upon God's providence, and to ask him, "How wilt thou do this or that?" Faith then begins to lose ground. We have nothing to do there. It is our part to let the Almighty exercise his own office, and steer his own helm. There is nothing left us but to see how we may be approved of him, and how we may roll the weight of our weak souls (in well doing) upon him who is God omnipotent: and when what we thus pursue miscarries, it shall neither be our sin nor our cross.

EVIL MEN.

It is better to have the praise of evil men's hatred than the scandal of their love and approbation. Manton.

EXAMINATION.

It is of the highest importance that you examine yourself, where the stress of your dependance, for the good of your soul is placed. To what fountain are you looking for pardon and strength, for comfort, sanctification [and salvation]? Whether to your own good purposes and endeavours, to your own prayers, meditation and good qualities; or to that inexhaustible treasury [of grace and glory which] God has provided for poor helpless guilty men in the person [blood, righteousness and intercession] of the Lord Jesus Christ? Venn.

Measure not thy graces by the attainments of others, but by Scripture-trials.

Wilcox.

EXAMPLE.

A believer's holy deportment often gives a check to the sins of others. The profane stand in awe, when grace comes forth, and sits like a ruler in the gate, to be seen of all that pass by. Gurnall.

EXPECTATION.

He in whom ye trust, O believers, is a great God, and loves to do all things like himself. Wherefore look for great things from him; great assistances; great enlargements; great deliverances; yea, the forgiving of great sins, and the great gift of a great salvation. Arrowsmith.

We often come off better than we expect, and always better than we deserve.

Mrs. Green (of Chelsea), March 8, 1770.

The Christian hath such a harvest of glory and happiness coming, as will never be fully got in. It will be always reaping-time in heaven. Cripplegate Lectures.

EXPERIENCES.

In all the experiences of the saints there is a universal oneness, and yet a beautiful variety.

Mr. David Fernie, Aug. 7, 1769, in conversation.

When a pump is dry a pail of water thrown into it will fetch it again. If your soul is in a dry cold frame, get a lively Christian to tell you his experience: the fire will probably catch from his heart to your's. Mr. Ryland July 7, 1769.

EXTREMITY.

When thou art at the greatest pinch, strength shall come. When the last handful of meal was dressing, then was the prophet sent to keep the widow's house. Gurnall.

FAITH.

It is the proper nature of faith to issue itself in the admiration of that which is infinite.

Dr. Owen.

Faith is thought of its object, who is Christ, with trust in him, or dependance upon him for life and salvation, under a conviction of our misery and helplessness in ourselves.

Mr. Brine against Johnson.

Pride and unbelief will put you on seeing somewhat in yourself first: but faith will have to do with none but Christ.

Wilcox.

Faith takes God at his word, and depends upon him for the whole of salvation. God is good, and therefore he will not, he is true and faithful, therefore he cannot, deceive me. I believe that he speaks as he means, and will do what he says: for which reason let me be strong in faith, giving honour to God, and rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Ryland.

Vigorous faith is not governed by sensible appearances. It looks through all the terrifying aspects of things to an invisible ever present God; a God who has left nothing to an after-thought in his decrees, nor is ever a moment too late in his actions.

Happy man, whosoever thou art, that can'st look by an eye of faith at the gospel as the charter of thy liberties; at the condemning law as cancelled by thy Surety; at the earth as the footstool of thy Father's throne; at heaven as the portal of thy Father's house; at all the creatures in heaven and earth, as an heir is wont to look at his father's servants, and which are therefore his, so far as he shall need them: according to that, "All are your's, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." Arrowsmith.

Faith can support when nature shrinks; faith can call God father when he frowns, and make some discovery of a sun through the darkest cloud.

Faith and love are the two arms and the two eyes without which Christ can neither be seen nor embraced.

ibid.

faith only can find out God, though not to perfection, yet to salvation.

ibid.

Sin is that which interposeth itself between the soul and the light of God's countenance. But whether it be a slender mist or a thick cloud, an infirmity or a rebellion, the sun of righteousness, eyed by faith, can and will dispel it, so as to make it vanish.

ibid.

The two conduits of faith and love, being lain from the Christian's soul to the fountain of living waters, fetch in from thence a daily supply of such grace as will certainly end in a fulness of glory.

ibid.

Faith is the soul's going out of itself for all [it wants].

Boston.

Faith empties the heart of sin, and fills it up with grace.

Anon.

It is grace, the grace of faith in the heart, that puts a difference between the Abba Father of the saint and the Ave Mary of a Papist.

ibid.

Presumption is heart-whole; but faith hath a sense of sickness, and looketh to the promises, and looking to Christ therein is glad to see a known face.

Rutherford.

The use of faith now (having already closed with Christ for justification) is to take out a copy of your pardon, and so you come to have peace with God. For since faith apprehends pardon, but never pays a penny for it, no marvel that salvation does not die and live, ebb or flow, with the working of faith.

ibid.

The Christian must trust in a withdrawing God. The boldness of faith ventures into God's presence as Ahasuerus's, when no smile is to be seen on his face, no golden sceptre of the promise perceived by the soul. Yea, faith trusts not only in a withdrawing, but in a killing God. Now for a soul to make its approaches unto God by a recumbency of faith, even while God seems to fire upon it, and shoots his frowns like envenomed arrows into it, is hard work, and will try the Christian to purpose. Yet such a masculine spirit we find in that poor woman of Canaan, who (as it were) took up the bullets which Christ shot at her, and with a humble holdness of faith sent them back again to him in her prayers, Isa. l. 10. — Job xiii. 15.

Gurnall.

True faith is of a working, stirring, lively nature. Fides pinguescit operibus, saith Luther. Faith is, in some sort, nourished by a holy life. As the flesh which clothes the frame of man's body, though it receives its heat from the vitals within, yet conduces to preserve the very life of those vitals [by a kindly reciprocation of influence], so works evangelically good, and actions truly gracious, though they have their life from faith, are yet powerful helps to maintain the liveliness of faith. We sometimes see a child nursing the parent that bore him, and therein he performs but his duty.

Faith in Jesus is the trust and alliance of the heart on him for help and deliverance.

Venn.

The essence of faith is an unfeigned, humble dependance upon, and submission to, the righteousness of God, as accounted or given to us; and that not of debt, but of grace.

ibid.

A base suspicion of salvation by faith being prejudicial to the interests of virtue; is hardly ever to be rooted out of the minds of men until they experience the power of faith in some degree themselves.

ibid.

Faith, though it may be weak and imperfect, instead of exalting itself against the justice of God, and standing before him in the confidence of a lie, puts all from itself, and gives the whole glory of our salvation where it is due. Venn.

FEAR.

Herod feared John, and did many things. Had he feared God, he would have laboured to have done every thing. Gurnall.

He that lives without fear shall die without hope. Dyer.

FELICITY.

Such is the omnipotency of our God, that he can and doth make to his elect sour sweet, and misery felicity. Mr. Philpot, the martyr.

FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD.

Although believing souls have here fellowship with God in Christ sufficient to stay their stomachs as at a breakfast, yet that degree of fruition is wanting which will satisfy them fully as at a feast superior to that of ordinances. Arrowemith.

FOOL.

Give me a man as full of policy as was Achitophel, as eloquent as Tertullus, and as learned as the Athenians were in St. Paul's time; yet if, with Achitophel, he plot against the people of God; if, with Tertullus, he have the poison of asps under his lips; and, with the Athenians, be given to superstition, for all his policy, eloquence, and learning, I am bold to call him, in Scripture language, a fool. Arrowsmith.

FORBEARANCE.

If a dog bark at a sheep, the sheep will not bark again at the dog. Dodd.

FORMS OF PRAYER.

Sense of want makes us eloquent. The true reason why books of prescribed forms of prayer pass through so many editions is, because the convincing influence of God's spirit passes through so few hearts.

Mr. Madan, Dec. 28, 1769.

FRAILTY.

It is man's frailty to fall; but it is the property of the devil's child to lie still.

FRIENDSHIP.

Most men look upon their friends as they do upon their sun-dials—only when the sun shines. Dyer.

Friendship is an union of spirits, a marriage, as it were, of hearts; and virtue is the golden hinge on which it turns. Anon.

FREE GRACE.

Every thing is within the reach of free grace, but nothing is within the reach of free-will.

Mr. Ambrose Serle, in conversation, at Broad Hembury Aug. 27, 1773.

FREE-WILL.

In its best estate free-will was but a weather-cock which turned at the breath of a serpent's tongue. It made a bankrupt of our father Adam; it pulled down the house and sold the land, and sent all the children to beg their bread. Rutherford.

That Saviour which natural free-will can apprehend is but a natural Saviour, a Saviour of man's own making; not the Father's Christ; not Jesus, the Son of the Living God, to whom none can come without the Father's drawing, John vi. 44, 46.

Mr. Wilcox.

The opinion of free-will, so cried up by some, will be easily confuted (as it is by Scripture) in the heart which has had any spiritual dealings with Jesus Christ respecting the application of his merits and subjection to his righteousness. ibid.

FULL ASSURANCE.

The full assurance of faith consists in a feeling application to Christ, or taking Christ to myself; being persuaded that, by God's free gift, Jesus Christ is mine; that I shall surely have life and salvation by him, a life of holiness and a life of happiness; and that whatever Christ did and suffered for the redemption of any one of the human race, he did the same for me; he did and suffered as much for me as for any soul in all the creation of God. Mr. Ryland.

The full assurance of faith triumphs over all base suspicions of God's fidelity to his promises. It disdains the vile imagination of God's being fickle in his purposes, or false to his word. Faith meets God in the Bible eye to eye and heart to heart. The actings of the believer's soul correspond to the tender and generous actings of God's soul in Scripture promises. ibid.

GIFTS.

A believer has not so much to boast of as a common beggar. He that gives to a beggar gives him a bare alms only; whereas God gives his people both Christ's righteousness to justify them, and also the hand of faith by which they receive it. Parr.

God can give us no greater gift than himself. We may say, as one said to Cæsar, "This is too great a gift for me to receive." "But it is not too great for me to give," answered Cæsar. Dyer.

GLORY OF GOD.

Such as do not truly know God can never sincerely aim at the glory of God in what they do. For what I do not know I cannot love; what I do not love I cannot desire; what I do not desire I can never intend. And, therefore, if I do not know God, I can never intend his glory in my actions; and if I do not intend his glory in my actions, I sin upon that very account, because I do not intend his glory. Anon.

GLORIFICATION.

There are three degrees of glorification. The first is in this life, and that is our sanctification, or transformation into the glorious image of God.—The second is in the hour of death, when our souls are beginning to be brought to a nearer union with Jesus.—The third will be the last day, when both soul and body shall be glorified together, which is the highest step of Solomon's throne, and to which we must ascend by the former degrees. Bp. Cowper.

GOD

Small Jacob shall arise, Amos vii. 5. and that because Jacob's God is great.

Arrowsmith.

O God, thou art my sun: the best of creatures are but stars, deriving the lustre they have from thee. Did not thy light make day in my heart, I should, amidst all things else, languish in a perpetual night of dissatisfaction. ibid.

God is called a rock, to teach us that as this continues stedfast and immoveable while the whole surrounding ocean is in a state of perpetual fluctuation, so, though all the creatures of God, from the lowest to the very highest of the intelligent kind are subject to change, capable of new additions with respect to their knowledge, their power, or their blessedness, God alone is absolutely the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Mr. Venn.

GOD FOR A PORTION.

A Christian cannot say, I have an estate in the world, and I shall have it for ever; but every Christian may say, I have God for my portion, and I shall have him for ever. Anon.

GOD A SUPPORTER.

God brings his grace into the heart by conquest. Now, as in a conquered city, though some yield and become true subjects to the conqueror; yet others plot how they may shake off the yoke: and therefore the same power which won it at first is requisite to keep it. The Christian hath an unregenerate part, which is discontented at this new supernatural change in the soul; so that if God should not continually reinforce this his new-planted colony of graces in the heart, the very natives (I mean the corruptions) that are left would come out of their dens and holes where they lie lurking, and eat up all the grace which the holiest person on earth is possessed of: it would be as bread to these devourers. Gurnall.

Whence come the sweet consolations of grace? What friend sends them in? They are derived, not from my own cistern, nor from any creature. It is my God that hath been here, and left this delightful perfume of comfort behind him in my bosom: my God, who has unawares to me filled my sails with the gales of his Spirit, and brought me off the flats of my own deadness, where I lay aground. O! it is his sweet Spirit, that held my head and stayed my heart, in such an affliction, or such a temptation; else I had sunk away in a fainting fit of unbelief. How can this choose but endear God to a gracious soul. ibid.

He that hath God's heart shall not want his arm. [Whom God loves he sustains, protects, and guides.] ibid.

The Christian, when fullest of divine communications, is but a glass without a foot; he cannot stand nor hold what he has received, any longer than he is held in the strong hand of God. ibid.

Iudwelling grace is, in this life, but weak, like a king in the cradle; which gives advantage to Satan to carry plots more strongly, to the disturbance of this young king's reign in the soul. Yea, he would put an end to the war, in the ruin of the believer's grace, did not God take the Christian into his own guardianship and protection. ibid.

As a father, when the way is rugged and difficult, gives his child his arm to hold by, so doth God reach forth his Almighty power, for his saints to exercise their faith upon. ibid.

As when a child travels in his father's company all is paid for, but the father himself carries the purse; so the expenses of a Christian's warfare and journey to heaven are paid and discharged for him by the Lord, in every stage and condition. Hence the believer cannot say, this I did, or that I suffered: but God wrought all in me and for me. ibid.

God himself is the stability of our spiritual strength. Were the stock in our own hands, we should soon prove broken merchants. ibid.

Our heavenly father knows that we are but leaking vessels; when fullest of grace, we could not hold it long, if left to ourselves: and, therefore, to make all sure, he set us under the streamings-forth of his own strength. ibid.

The rock followed the Israelites. Every believer has Christ at his back, following him with strength as he goes for every condition and trial. Gurnall.

The power of God is that shoulder (Luke xv. 5.), on which Christ carries his sheep home rejoicing all the way he goes. The everlasting arms of his strength are those eagle's wings, on which the saints are both tenderly and safely conveyed to glory. ibid.

GOD ALL SUFFICIENT.

What can we wish for in an heritage, that is not to be found in God? Would we have large possessions? He is immensity. Would we have a sure estate? He is immutability. Would we have a term of long continuance? He is eternity itself.

Arrowsmith.

God is a portion, of which his people can never be robbed. Impoverished you may be, but not undone; discouraged, but not disinherited ibid.

GOD'S DESIGNS.

To suppose God to perform any work which he did not at first design to perform, is to charge him with a degree of folly, and with acting below an intelligent agent.— [On the other hand], to suppose him to design to do a thing which he does not effect, is to tax him with impotence. If it is an instance of the wisdom and power of man first to design a work, and then to perfect it; the great God, who is infinite in oath these perfections, must design what he effects, and effect what he has designed. If we consider him as infinite in wisdom, and of almighty power, there cannot be a more rational way of arguing than from his acts to his designs. Sladen.

If God hath designed to save any persons, then they must be saved; otherwise God must repent, and change his mind concerning them; or be overpowered by some superior agency of theirs. To suppose either of which is not only to degrade, but to deny, the divine perfections. ibid.

Purposes are actions decreed; actions are purposes executed. As the promises of God are the revelations of his purposes of good will, so the actings of God upon his creatures are the execution of his purposes and the fulfilment of his promises. ibid.

GOD'S PRESENCE.

If God is with you, you will want neither company and comfort.

Said to me many years ago, by my late Rev. and dear friend, Mr. James Rutherford.

God sets the Christian at work, and then meets him in it. Gurnall.

GOD'S LOVE

It is foolish in us to muse upon vanity

when we have the love of God to think of; to let the mill grind chaff when there is such plenty of corn at hand. Manton.

Nothing can do us good but the love and favour of God in Christ; and that we shall have if we can seek it. Anon.

Do you ask, why were God's people elected to salvation? Why were they re-deemed, why justified, called, preserved, and sanctified? And why they shall all be infallibly glorified? That passage of St. John is an answer to every one of these questions: "God is love."

God's love makes a net for elect souls, which will infallibly catch them and haul them to land. Boston.

The heart of God, if I may so speak, is the ocean, the first rise of all love to his saints. Christ is the spring which first receives from God the Father; and then through him is all love diffused to them. All passes through Christ's hands. Crisp.

GOD THE CHIEF GOOD.

There are within me two great gulphs: a mind desirous of more truth, and a will capable of more good than finite beings can afford. Thou only canst fill me, who art the first truth and the chief good. In thee alone shall my soul be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, while my mouth praiseth thee with joyful lips.

GOD'S WORD.

Nothing is more cheerful and pleasing to eyes that are strong and sound than light; on the other hand, nothing more painful or disagreeable, to eyes that are weak and distempered. As different is the effect of God's word on them that believe, and on them that believe not. Parr.

GOD'S CHOICE.

God did not choose the eagle or lion for sacrifice; but the lamb and the dove. Mr. Jenkins.

GOD'S THRONE.

God has two thrones: one in the highest heavens, the other in the lowest hearts. Wright.

GOD'S DEED.

When the Lord doth any great thing, he puts his I to it. I, even I am he, &c. I will make a new covenant, &c. I will write my law in their hearts. I will pardon their sins: I will do them away as a thick cloud. Mrs. Wright.

GOOD WORKS.

Our works of obedience, coming immediately out of our hands, would be unfrustrant to God: wherefore Christ intercepts them in their passage, and so they are perfumed in the hands of a Mediator.

Dr. Manton.

As every good work comes from God's Spirit, so it passes through thy heart, and there it is defiled. "Partus sequitur ventrem:" our good works have more of the mother than of the father in them. Hence they are [in point of merit and of perfection] but dung and filthy rags.

ibid.

GOSPEL.

It is a great mercy to enjoy the gospel of peace, but a greater to enjoy the peace of the gospel.

Dyer.

All the altars of the law were but so many steps to the cross of the gospel.

ibid.

Every person that sits under the sound of the gospel should ask himself these three questions: "Do I know any thing of the excellency of the gospel? Do I feel the power of it? And do I live according to the rules of it?"

The late Mr. Fanch.

The gospel is a box of most precious ointment; by preaching it the box is broken and the fragrance diffused.

Mr. Romaine.

It is a difficult thing for us to keep the doctrines of the gospel always in view; and harder still to make use of them, and live up to them, when we want them most.

Dr. Gill.

The gospel is a sovereign plaister; but Christ's own hand must make it stick.

Manton.

GRACE.

It is the peculiar glory of gospel grace to humble every believer in the dust, to fill him with the most dreadful apprehensions of sin, to raise him from his dead state, to establish him in the truth of obedience from a root of thankfulness and love to God, from holy admiration of his perfections, and from an earnest desire to be partaker of his blessedness.

Venn.

Saving grace is a portion that can never be spent or run out. The more we live upon it, and the more use we make of it, the greater are our abundance, comfort and enjoyment.

Mr. Walker (of Horsington), July 14, 1769, London.

Grace is that never-failing spring to which all the fortitude and perseverance of the saints are owing. On its uninterrupted supply from moment to moment, our faithfulness to God depends. Had Paul been left to himself for an instant, when he was about to suffer martyrdom, he would in the very article of execution have saved his head at the expense of his soul, and to preserve his life, denied and abjured the Son of God (like Peter) with oaths and curses.

Ryland.

Grace is not effectual because free-will willeth; but free-will willeth because grace is effectual.

Mr. Parr.

A man may as truly say that he sea burns, or fire cools, as free grace and mercy can make a real believer do wickedly.

Brooks.

The doctrine of grace may be abused; but the principle cannot.

Dr. Owen.

A penitent, though formerly as bad as the worst of men, may by grace become as good as the best.

Bunyan.

Great grace and small gifts are better than great gifts and no grace. It doth not say, "The Lord gives gifts and glory;" but "The Lord gives grace and glory." Blessed is such an one to whom the Lord gives grace; for that is a certain forerunner of glory.

ibid.

If grace were (the sole) ministerial qualification, all the Lord's people would be what Moses wished they were, even all of them, prophets.

God, who enables sinners to thirst after grace, will surely give them the grace they thirst after.

Dr. Arrowsmith.

Nothing but free grace makes any difference between me and the devil.

Mrs. Wright.

Either exercise thy graces, or Satan will exercise thy corruptions; as one bucket descends the other rises.

Gurnall.

Little grace cannot die. It is immortal, because a child of God's everlasting covenant and promise.

ibid.

True grace when weakest is stronger than false when strongest.

ibid.

Grace is of a stirring nature; and not a dead thing (like an image) which you may lock up in a chest, and nobody know what God you worship. No; grace will shew itself; it will walk with you and talk by you in all places and companies; it will buy with you and sell with you, and have a hand in all your enterprises. It is too much alive to be smothered.

There is not a round in the ladder to heaven which does not give every one that steppeth upon it just occasion to sing, Grace, grace!

Arrowsmith.

When God overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea, it overwhelmed and drowned the greatest Egyptian commanders no less than the meanest foot soldier. The vast ocean overflows the lowest sands and the highest rocks. So does pardoning grace cover every transgression of every penitent believer.

ibid.

As when we see a flame we know there is fire, though perhaps we know not how nor when it began; so that the truth of grace in us may be discerned, though we know not how or when it was dropt into our hearts.

Boston.

As seed virtually contains in it all that afterwards proceeds from it, the blade, stalk, ear, and full corn in the ear; so the first principle of grace, implanted in the heart, seminally contains all the grace which afterwards appears, and all the fruits, effects, acts and exercises of it. Dr. Gill.

Be not afraid for little grace. Christ soweth his living seed, and he will not lose it. If he have the guiding of my stock and state it shall not miscarry. Our split works, losses, deadness, coldness, wretchedness, are the ground which our good husbandman laboreth. Rutherford.

Happy are they who are withheld from sin, (not merely as the unregenerate are) by God's restraining power; but (as the saints are) by God's restraining grace!

Miss Southgate, in conversation at Hampstead, Sept. 6, 1769.

Grace is the silver link that draws the golden link of glory after it. Dyer.

As paper receives from the press letter for letter; as the wax receives from the seal print for print; or as the glass receives face for face; so do believers receive from Christ grace for grace: i. e. for every grace that is in him there is a measure of the same in them. ibid.

Men dote upon establishing a righteousness of their own to bring them to Christ, and think it is presumptuous or licentious doctrine that Christ may be theirs, and they receive him, considered simply as ungodly and as enemies. But such are abominably injurious to the faith of Jesus Christ, and to the exceeding bounty of his grace, which saves from sin without respect of any thing in the creature, that he himself might have the praise of the glory of his own grace. Crisp.

Grace, properly so called, is nothing else but God's mere favour and bounty and loving-kindness itself. Consequently sanctification is not so properly grace itself as the fruit of grace. God first casts his favour and loving-kindness upon a person, and then, out of his favour, issue the several fruits of his loving-kindness; which fruits are those fruits of the Spirit frequently mentioned by the apostle. ibid.

God neither looks to any thing in the creature to win him to shew kindness, nor yet any thing in the creature to debar him; neither righteousness in men that persuades God to pardon sin, nor unrighteousness in men that hinders him from giving this pardon and acquitting them from their transgressions. It is only and simply for his own sake that he pardons men. ibid.

The sanctifying principle of grace in the heart may be compared to a candle in a lantern, which transmits its light through he lantern, though in and of itself the lantern still continues (what it was before) a dark body.

Lady Huntingdon, in conversation at Trevecha, Aug. 29, 1776.

I know no sweeter way to heaven than through free grace and hard trials together. And where grace is, hard trials are seldom wanting. Anon.

Grace embellished with gifts is the more beautiful; but gifts without grace are only a richer spoil for Satan. ibid.

As some believers exercise grace more than others, so in the profane world there are greater traders in sin than others, who return more wrath in a day than others in a month. Gurnall.

GRACES.

He that hath clothes will surely wear them, and not be seen naked. Men talk of their faith, repentance, and love to God: these are precious graces; but why do not such persons let us see those graces walking abroad in their daily conversation? Surely if such guests were in thy soul, they would look out sometimes at the windows, and be seen abroad in this duty or in that holy action.

GRACE AND GLORY.

If it should be said, "How shall we know that this is the case of our departed friends?" let the following question be put: "Is there any reason to believe that the grace of God was bestowed on them?" If this is a clear point, their safety is beyond all doubt; for nothing is more certain than that to whom God gives grace he also gives glory. We may be assured of the happiness of our friends in the next world, from their having tasted that the Lord was gracious to them in this. Gill.

Grace is glory militant, and glory is grace triumphant; grace is glory begun, glory is grace made perfect; grace is the first degree of glory, glory is the highest degree of grace. Dyer.

GRATITUDE.

The actings of gratitude to God are not only fruitful in every good work, but productive of the truest satisfaction. Somewhat like the fragrant steams of consecrated incense which, while they honoured the great Object of worship, regaled with their pleasing perfumes the devout worshipper. Hervey.

GRAVE.

There is a vileness in the bodies even of the saints (Phil. iii. 21.) which will never be removed until it be melted down in the grave, and cast into a new mould, at the resurrection to come forth a spiritual body. Boston.

GRIEF.

[Christian grief is not forbidden.] Abraham came to mourn for Sarah and to weep for her. Joseph made a mourning for his father seven days. The children of Israel wept for Moses, in the plains of Moab, thirty days. David lamented the deaths of Saul, Jonathan, and Abner. Christ wept over the grave of Lazarus. Devout men, who carried Stephen to his burial, made great lamentation over him. And the apostle Paul signifies concerning his friend Epaphroditus, who had been sick nigh unto death, that if the Lord had not had mercy on him he should have had sorrow upon sorrow.

Gill.

HAPPINESS.

The greatest happiness of a creature is not to have the creature for its happiness.

Dyer.

Enquire of saints yet militant on earth wherein their happiness consists? Their answer will be, "In having fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ."

Again, could we ask those saints whose spirits are now glorified and triumphant in heaven, what it is that renders their heaven so glorious, and their glory so incomprehensible? They would answer, that it is because they have now attained a complete enjoyment of that all-sufficient, all-satisfying, ever-blessed, and ever-blessing object, God in Christ.

Arrowsmi h.

HEART.

If the very idea of having a hard heart makes you tremble, it is a certain sign that your heart is not hard.

St. Bernard, if I mistake not

Thy corrupt heart is like an ant's nest, on which, while the stone lieth, none of them appear; but take off the stone, and stir them up but with the point of a straw, you will see what a swarm is there, and how lively they be. Just such a sight would thy heart afford thee did the Lord but withdraw the restraint he has laid upon it, and suffer Satan to stir it up by temptation.

Boston.

The heart of man is as passive in its first reception of God's image in regeneration as the canvas upon which a painter lays on his colours, nor is it more able to resist the operation of the agent.

Mr. Mogg, March 8, 1770.

"My heart," says David, "shews me the wickedness of the ungodly." As face answers to face in a glass, so the heart of man to man. When a believer considers the vile-ness of his own heart by nature, he does not wonder so much that others fall, as that he himself is kept from falling.

Mr. Madan.

God hears the heart, though without words; but he never hears words without the heart.

Bp. Hopkins.

All the angels in heaven cannot subdue the heart of a sinner. Heart-work is God's work. The great heart-maker must be the great heart-breaker.

Dyer.

There are some inns which are never empty, but as fast as one guest goes out another comes in. Such is the heart of an unregenerate man; as soon as one lust is served, another is calling for attendance.

Gurnall

HEALING.

Nature can afford no balsam fit for soul-cure: healing from duties, and not from Christ, is the most desperate disease.

Wilcox.

HEAVEN.

Heaven is worth dying for, though earth is not worth living for.

Hall.

The head and members are glorified together with the same kind of glory. God has not one heaven for his Son and another for his saints, but one and the same for both.

Dyer.

To be in Christ is heaven below; and to be with Christ is heaven above.

ibid.

There is no believer goes to heaven but goes in the arms of angels.

ibid.

HEAVENLY MINDEDNESS.

The higher a bird flies the more out of danger he is; and the higher a Christian soars above the world the safer are his comforts.

Mr. Sparke, in conversation, London, May, 1774.

HEAVENLY TREASURER.

There is this difference between rich and poor Christians: where a Christian is poor, his heavenly Father keeps the purse; but the rich keep the purse themselves. And it often falls out that it is better to have the purse in our Father's hands than our own.

Dodd.

HOLINESS.

Say not that thou hast royal blood in thy veins, and art born of God, except thou canst prove thy pedigree by daring to be holy in spite of men and devils.

Gurnall.

Gospel holiness includes a heart broken for sin, a heart broken off from sin, and a perpetual conflict with sin.

Mr. Medley.

To be holy is to put on Christ, Rom. xiii. 14., to resemble Christ in your spirit and carriage, as one man resembles another when he puts on his dress or imitates his manners.

Hervey.

As musk lying among linen perfumes it, so the real in-dwelling of God's Spirit imparts the sweet fragraney of holiness to the believer's heart, and tempers words and works.

Cripplegate Lect.

HOLINESS NO CONDITION.

Christ will make his people holy, and put his Spirit within them to change their hearts and to work upon their spirits. But this is not a condition required in order to partake of Christ. Christ himself gives himself; and then he bestows these things when he is given. Crisp.

HOME.

On earth God's people have their respective homes and particular places of residence; but when we come to heaven one home shall hold us all.

Mr. Holmes, in conversation with me, London, July 10, 1769.

HUMILITY.

Ever carry self-loathing about thee, and regard thyself as one fit to be trampled on by all saints.

Saints increase in humility as they draw nearer to heaven. Unworthy to be called an apostle, said Paul, concerning himself, some years after his conversion. As he advanced still farther in years he cried out, Less than the least of all saints. A little before his martyrdom his cry is, The chief of sinners. Observed by Mr. Watts, at London, Nov. 15, 1775.

As soon as pride is humbled enough not to enter into controversy with God about the justice of his own declarations, every man confesses himself a guilty sinner in danger of eternal ruin. Venn.

The nettle mounteth on high, while the violet shrouds itself under its own leaves, and is chiefly found out by its fragrance. Let Christians be satisfied with the honour that cometh from God only. Manton.

Generally speaking, those that have the most grace and the greatest gifts, and are of the greatest usefulness, are the most humble, and think the most meanly of themselves. So those boughs and branches of trees which are most richly laden with fruit bend downwards and hang lowest. Dr. Gill.

HYPOCRISY.

Joseph was alive though his coat was brought bloody to Jacob; and so are the sins of a hypocrite after all his mortified looks in duty, and all his outcries against iniquity. Gurnall.

In addresses from man to man hypocrisy is detestable; how much more in addresses from man to God! Venn.

Woe is me that the holy profession of Christ is made a stage-garment by many to bring home a vain fame, and Christ is made to serve men's ends; which is, as it were, to stop an oven with a king's robes. Rutherford.

IDOLATRY.

That which is now our idol may quickly become our burden, and we know not how soon we may be sick of what we were lately sick for. Mr. Henry.

"All the prayings, teachings, and actings of men," saith Luther, "are, out of Christ, idolatry and sin in the sight of God." Arrowsmith.

IGNORANCE.

Ignorance of the purity of God, of the extent and spirituality of his law, and of the total depravation of their own hearts, is that which makes any persons commence Arians or Socinians. Were they duly convinced of sin, they would need no other arguments to convince them that the Saviour, whose blood is able to expiate its guilt, is and must be very God.

Mr. Haweis, Sept. 6, 1769.

Quantum est quod nescimus! says the learned Gilb. Voetius. "How exceeding much is there of which we know nothing at all!" Arrowsmith.

IMAGE OF GOD.

As great men are sometimes wont to erect stately buildings, and then cause their own picture to be fixed up in the principal apartments, so when God had made the fabric of the world, the last thing he did was to set up his own picture in it, by forming man after his own blessed image and likeness.

The elect when converted are living images of God, but not in that high, strict, and peculiar sense in which Christ is so called, Col. i. 15. Heb. i. 3. The king's image is on his coin and in his son, but after a different manner. On his coin there may be likeness and derivation, but not identity of nature. In the saints are the two former; in Christ are all three.

IMPERFECTIONS.

There will be mistakes in divinity while men preach, and errors in government while men govern. Sir Dudley Chorleton, Biographical Dictionary.

IMITATION.

"The more we know of God, the more we shall desire to resemble him in holiness. Whoever truly loves another will desire to be like the person he loves, and to do what that person likes. Madan."

IMPATIENCE.

A soul impatient under affliction is like the devil in his chains, who rages against God while he is fettered by him.

INABILITY.

God will confound the language of those sons of pride who cry up the powers of nature; as if man with the slime of his own freewill, and the bricks of his own self-righteousness, was able to rear up a building whose top might reach to heaven itself.

Gurnall.

Mankind lie covered beneath the ruins of their lapsed state, and no more able to raise themselves from under their weight of guilt than one buried under the ponderous rubbish of a fallen house is able to free himself. The Holy Spirit finds sinners in as helpless a condition, as unable to repent, or believe on Christ for salvation, as they were to purchase it. ibid.

By nature, man is utterly void of all strength and ability of doing any thing of himself towards his own salvation.

If a ship launched, rigged, and with her sails spread, cannot stir until the wind come fair; much less can the timber that lies in the carpenter's yard hew and frame itself into a ship.

If a living tree cannot grow but by a communication of sap from the root; much less can a dead stake in the hedge, which has no root nor vegetating principle, live of its own accord.

In a word, if a Christian who hath the spiritual life of grace in him from God, cannot even exercise that life without the continual influx of strength from above; then surely one, void of this new life, and dead in trespasses and sins, can never be able to beget grace in himself, or concur in the production of it. ibid.

Though the righteousness of a man's person can never make a bad action good; yet the wickedness of a man's person doth always make a good action bad: and therefore, though a good man may do a bad act, yet a bad [i. e. an uregenerate] man can never do a [spiritually] good act [and such as is pleasing to God]. Bp. Beveridge.

After our creation, and before our corruption, we had power to do every thing pleasing unto God: but after our corruption, and before our regeneration, we have power to do nothing pleasing to him. ibid.

INCENTIVE.

Did Christ die, and shall sin live? Was he crucified in the world, and shall our affections to the world be quick and lively? Oh, where is the Spirit of him who by the cross of Christ was crucified to the world, and the world to him? Owen.

Be not ashamed because of your guiltiness. Necessity should not blush to beg. You are in the utmost want of Christ; therefore knock and cry. Rutherford.

Ten lives of black sorrow, ten deaths, ten hells of pain, ten furnaces of brimstone, and all exquisite torments whatever, were all too little for Christ, if our suffering could be a hire to buy him. And therefore faint not in your sufferings and hazards for him. ibid.

O believer, what matters it if God denies thee a kid to make merry; when he says, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine?" Hath a son any cause to complain that his father denies him a flower in the garden, when he makes him heir of his whole estate? Anon.

INEXHAUSTIBLE SUPPLIES.

For these six thousand years God has been multiplying pardons, and yet free grace is not tired—Christ undertook to satisfy, and he hath money enough to pay. It were folly to think that an emperor's revenue will not pay a beggar's debt. Mercy is an ocean, ever flowing yet ever full. The saints carry loads of experiences with them to heaven. Free grace can shew you large accounts and a long bill cancelled by the blood of Christ. Manton.

INFLEXIBILITY.

Have we sat down and reckoned what true religion cost us? Have we resolved, through the power of divine grace, to own Christ when the swords and staves are up? And to sail with him not only in a pleasure-boat, but if need be in a man of war? Cripplegate Lect.

INSOLVENCY.

Penitent sinners are then said to buy the wine and milk of spiritual comforts without money and without price, when being conscious that they have nothing of their own to answer divine justice with, nothing of their own wherewith to fetch in pardon, peace, and righteousness; they wholly disclaim all self-sufficiency, and come to Christ as to one that expects not to receive any thing from them, but to be himself received by them. All that he looks for from us at our coming to him by faith is that we be nothing in ourselves, but desirous to have all from him, and to partake of his fulness, grace for grace. Arrowsmith.

IMPOTENCY.

When you desire, and in earnest endeavour to live obedient to the spiritual commandments of God, without which a course of external religion is vain; you will immediately feel your own impotency, just as Samson did the loss of his strength, when he was rising to combat the Philistines. Venn.

INTRINSIC VALUE.

The world is glorious without, but the church is glorious within: its splendour lieth not in large possessions and great revenues, but in a plentiful effusion of gifts and graces.

Manton.

INVITATION.

All the conditions of the new covenant are fulfilled by Christ. Come then and partake of the heavenly blessings, as you partake of a marriage feast, when the entertainment is all prepared, and the bridegroom bids you welcome.

Hervey.

JEALOUSY.

Self-jealousy well becomes Christians. Lord, is it I? They that know the deceit of their bow will not be very confident that they shall hit the mark.

JOY.

Some have written to me, that I am possibly too joyful in the cross which God hath laid upon me. But my joy overleapeth the cross and terminates on Christ himself.

Rutherford.

Pearls are not gotten but from the bottom of the water; and gold is digged not from the surface, but from the deep entrails of the earth. So the joy of God is not to be found but in the inward recesses of a broken and contrite spirit.

Bp. Cowper.

The saints enter into God's own joy, Matt. xxv. 21. They have not only the joy which God bestows, but the joy which God himself enjoys.

Cripplegate Lect.

The common proverb is most certainly true in a spiritual sense; "Some men for joy do weep, others for sorrow sing." Believers weep for joy, and never mourn more kindly than when they taste the joy of the Holy Ghost, in the freeness and fulness of the Lord Christ poured out upon them. There is never a more kindly mourning for sin than when the soul is satisfied of forgiveness.

Crisp.

There is more joy in the penitential mournings of a believer than in all the mirth of a wicked man. I appeal to you that have had melted hearts, whether you have not found a secret content and sweetness in your mourning? So far from wishing to be rid of your meltings, you rather fear the removal of them.

ibid.

JUSTIFICATION.

Justification is an act of God's free grace, whereby he clears his people from sin, discharges them from condemnation, and reckons and accounts them righteous, for the sake of Christ's righteousness which he has accepted of and imputes unto them.

Dr. Gill.

The testimony of the Spirit, [witnessing our acceptance in Christ to our consciences], is not so properly justification itself, as an actual perception of justification, before granted by a kind of reflex act of faith.

ibid.

Justification by Christ's imputed righteousness is the centre arch of that bridge by which we pass out of time into a blissful eternity.

Mr. Ryland, July 3, 1769.

KNOWLEDGE.

Sagacity and knowledge are then only truly useful when joined with grace, meekness, discretion and benevolence. The serpent's eye does best in the dove's head.

Gurnall.

Knowledge of gospel doctrines is the candle without which faith cannot see to do its work.

ibid.

Moses was skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians: yet, not content herewith, he became an humble suitor to God for more and better knowledge than that: "I beseech thee shew me thy glory." Other notions may fill the head of a moral man: nothing short of the knowledge of God can satisfy the heart of a saint. Wherefore in answer to this request the Lord gave him a promise saying, "I will make all my goodness pass before thee."

Arrowsmith.

Learning in religious persons, like the gold that was in the Israelites' ear-rings, is a most precious ornament: but if men pervert it to base ends, or begin to make an idol of it (as they did a golden calf, of their ear-rings) it then becomes an abomination.

ibid.

Knowledge and good parts, under the management of grace, are, like the rod in Moses's hand, wonder workers; but turn to serpents when they are cast upon the ground, and employed in promoting earthly designs.

ibid.

LAW OF GOD.

When you consider the law of the Ten Commandments in this light [namely as designed to manifest our guilt, convince of sin and drive us for justification to the righteousness of Christ], what a striking propriety appears in that ancient custom of placing the two tables over the communion-table in our churches! By this means every intelligent receiver of the Lord's Supper, in the very act of receiving, is awfully reminded of the purity of that law which he has transgressed; of that law from whose insupportable curse no less a sacrifice than that of God's only begotten Son could possibly redeem him!

Venn.

Know your guilt and weakness, your desert and danger; think what you are bound to by the law, [even sinless obedience from the first to the last moment of your life], and what you have to trust to, if left under its [condemning] power [even everlasting punishment]; then view the loving kindness of God in giving his Son to fulfil all righteousness [in our stead], and then tell me, if it be possible [while under the lively sense of his mercy] to sin against so much goodness? ibid.

By ignorance of the law, even that virtuous character which has, perhaps, gained you much esteem among men, will prove a greater obstacle in the way of your salvation than [even] gross and long-indulged sins proved to others: since these last carry with them their own [glaring, palpable] condemnation; they have a tendency on the first lucid interval of consideration to excite strong confessions of guilt and cries for mercy. Whereas a behaviour more regulated in externals by the commands of God, when the law is not understood, does but administer fuel to self-sufficiency and self-applause. ibid.

The whole law is imprest on the gracious soul: every part of it is written over upon the renewed heart. And though remaining corruption makes such blots in the writing that often times the man himself cannot read it; yet he that wrote it, can read it at all times: it is never quite blotted out nor can be. What he has written he has written; and it shall stand. Boston.

For a sinner who has broke the law, to expect to be saved by the law he has broke, i. e. by works of his own, is just as if a capital malefactor, under sentence of death, shall endeavour to sue out his pardon upon the footing of that very act of parliament by virtue of which he stands condemned.

I would run away from the law (considered as a covenant of works), as fast as I would from my sins.

A frequent saying of Lady Huntingdon's.

LEGAL TERRORS.

Faith is the eye of the soul. This eye beholding the sin of the soul in having pierced Christ, and Christ pardoning its sin affects the heart: whence the heart sends forth affecting sighs. All this is done when there is no tempest of terror on the Spirit, but a sweet serenity of love and peace. See therefore, O believer, how Satan misinforms thee, when he would persuade thee that thou art not humbled enough, because thy sorrow is not attended with legal terrors.

Gurnall.

LIFE.

What is life, but a warfare? And what is the world but a thoroughfare? Dyer.

The slow motion of a living man (though so feeble perhaps that he cannot go a furlong in a day), yet coming from life, imports more strength than is in a ship, which (though it sails swiftly) hath its motion from without. Thus possibly a hypocrite may exceed a true Christian in the bulk and outside of a duty; yet because his strength is not from spiritual life, but from some wind and tide abroad that carries him on, while the Christian is from a divine principle within: therefore the Christian's weakness is stronger than the hypocrite in his greatest enlargements. Gurnall.

LITTLE GRACES

I have rather smoke than fire; and guessings rather than assurances of Christ's love. I have little or nothing to say, but that I am as one who hath found favour in his eyes. Rutherford.

When a peal or a diamond is defiled with dust or mire, its lustre cannot be discerned until it is washed. When corruptions are great and experiences small, a little grace can hardly be discerned: as a needle is more difficult to be discovered than a staff.

Manton.

LITTLE TRUTHS.

Omitting little truths against light may breed hell in the conscience, as well as committing the greatest sins against light.

Wilcox.

LOVE.

The Spirit of Christ sweetly calms the soul of a suffering believer, not by taking away all sense of pain, but by overcoming it with the sense of his love. Gurnall.

Do Christ this one favour, for all his love to thee: love all his saints; even the poorest, the meanest, and the weakest, notwithstanding some slight differences in judgment. As the names of the children of Israel were graven on Aaron's breast-plate; so are the names of all God's saints engraven on the heart of Christ. Let them be likewise so on thine. Wilcox.

Every man can love his friend; but only a godly man can love his enemy. Parr.

It was a notable saying of a holy man, "Quench hell and burn heaven, yet will I love and fear my God." Dodd.

Other lovers, beside Christ, are in suit of you, and your soul hath many wooers: but let your soul be a chaste virgin, and love but one. Most worthy is Christ alone of all your love, were your love higher than heaven and broader than the whole world.

Proportionable to the renovation of the image of God, and the likeness of God upon our souls, is our love to Jesus Christ.

Owen.

When we love God most, our duties run on the most freely and sweetly: and when our thoughts are most steeped in the love of God to us, we are then most likely to love him abundantly in return. Manton

LUKEWARMNESS.

It is sad, when after spiritual enlargements, and the performance of spiritual duties, believers are off their guard and negligent in honouring God by good works in the sight of all men: when, like Moses, they no sooner come down from the mount than they turn, and break the tables of the law. Oh Christians, either vindicate the name of Christ (whose banner you would seem to march after), by the holiness of your conversations, or honestly throw away your profession of godliness and your seeming zeal for Christ, by which you have drawn the eyes of the world upon you.

Gurnall.

LUSTS.

Our lusts are cords. Fiery trials are sent to burn and consume them.

MAGNANIMITY.

Happy are they who dare venture out into the open streets with the name of Christ upon their foreheads; at a time when so many are ashamed of him, and hide him (as it were) under their cloaks, as if he were a stolen Saviour.

Rutherford.

MALICE.

Such as rake up the old sins of saints (sins which God hath forgiven and forgotten), merely to grieve their spirits and to spatter their names, shew their malice indeed; who can take such pains to travel many years back, that they may find a handful of dirt to throw in a saint's face. Thus Shimei twitted David, 1 Sam. i. 6, 7. Come out, thou bloody man.

When you, who fear God, meet with such reproaches, answer them, as Beza did the Papists, when, for want of other matter, they upbraided him for some wanton poems, penned by him in his youth: "Hi homunciones invident mihi gratiam Dei," said he; "These men grudge me the pardoning mercy of God."

Gurnall.

MAN UNRENEWED.

Easy, good-natured, affable men, whose hearts are nevertheless unrenewed by divine grace; may be compared to ripe plums and apricots, which, however soft and smooth on the outside, yet have a hard stone within.

Anon.

The natural man is a spiritual monster. His heart is where his feet should be, fixed upon the earth: his heels are lifted up against heaven, which his heart should be set on. His face is towards hell; his back towards heaven. He loves what he should hate, and hates what he should love; joys in what he ought to mourn for, and mourns for what he ought to rejoice in; glories in his shame, and is ashamed of his glory; abhors what he should desire, and desires what he should abhor.

Boston.

None of Adam's children naturally incline to receive the blessings in borrowed robes; but would always, according to the spider's motto, owe all to themselves: and so climb up to heaven on a thread spun out of their own bowels. For they desire to be under the law, Gal. iv. 21. and go about to establish their own righteousness, Rom. x. 3.

Boston.

The affections of the unrenewed man are as an unruly horse, that either will not receive, or violently runs away with, the rider.

ibid.

MANIFESTATIONS.

After great manifestations of God's love, it is usual for the tempter to be unusually busy.—So weak is the constitution of grace below, that we cannot, of ourselves, bear either the smiles or the frowns of God, without some degree of danger.—If God smile, and open himself familiarly to us, then we are prone to grow high and wanton: if he frown, then faith sinks and hope sickens. Thus exalted manifestations, like bright weather and warm air, are followed by the weeds of corruption; and the other, like a sharp, intense frost, nips and almost kills the flowers of joy, peace, and comfort.

Anon.

That the blessed God can impress on the mind so strong a sense of pardon as to leave a repenting sinner beyond all question satisfied of its coming from him, none can doubt but those who are for limiting the power of the Almighty, and for prescribing to the wisdom of the All-wise. And that, in many instances, God is most graciously pleased, in this manner to manifest himself and his love, none can dispute, who have been happily acquainted with the lives and deaths of the excellent of the earth.

Venn.

MANNERS.

Is the faith of Christ fatal to refined manners, as the rod of Moses was to the counterfeit miracles of the magicians? No. It is rather like the influence of the sanctuary on the rod of Aaron: which, while it remained at a distance from the tabernacle, was a dry, sapless, and barren stick: but when deposited before the ark, was quickened into vegetable life, was adorned with a milk-white bloom, and enriched with full-grown fruit: or, as the sacred historian expresses this surprising fact, it "brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds." Numb. xviii. 8.

Hervey.

MAN'S LIFE

Man lives by death. His natural life is maintained by the death of the creatures; and his spiritual and eternal life are owing to the death of his Saviour.

Dyer.

MAN'S OBEDIENCE.

Ye that go to the Father, and think to set yourselves in his presence, and stand as the objects of his delight, on the footing of your own righteousness; shame and confusion of face will cover you before you are aware. Paul durst not be found in it, but looked upon it as dung; and dung you know is both offensive in itself and unable to support the man that stands upon it.—Let a man venture upon Christ, as the way to the Father, and he shall not sink. Crisp.

All the righteousness of man is not able to uphold him; nay, there is that in man's righteousness which will sink him; [if rested upon and trusted to] for he that hath broken the law but in one point is guilty of all. Christ therefore is the only rock on which sinners can build their hope. ibid.

I know some places that are as green and fair to the eye as the best way man ever set foot into: yet if you venture upon them, you sink up to the neck.—Whilst men make their own righteousness and obedience their way to God's favour, they seem to be in a fair and green path, which promiseth safety and firmness: yet he that dares trust himself in the way of his own righteousness, as his way to God and heaven, will find himself sink so fast that, if Christ come not and pluck him out, he will sink over head and ears. ibid.

In the way of works a man loses himself presently. There is not one work he does but he commits sin in it: and God will never let the soul come near to him that comes with any sin whatever. I speak this of the righteousness of man, while he makes that his way to God. ibid.

MARRIAGE.

I think it a greater sin to marry on the Lord's day than to yoke a plough: inasmuch as the work and concern is greater. The sinful continuance of this I judge to be a provoking profanation of the Sabbath: and I seldom see those marriages blest which were celebrated on that day.

MEANS.

When God discovers himself by means, we know no more of him than can be represented by those means. If a pipe should be put to a great ocean or river, the cistern or conduit can receive no more than the pipe can convey. Manton.

It is a greater mercy to have a spiritual appetite for the means of grace, and to be providentially debarred from enjoying them, than to have opportunities of attending them without an appetite for them.

MEEKNESS.

Passionate reproofs are like medicines given scalding hot; the patient cannot take them. If we wish to do good to those we rebuke, we should labour for meekness of wisdom, and use soft words and hard arguments. Dodd.

MERCY.

To exercise mercy is God's great prerogative; an act not of debt but of royal bounty; which he exercises when and to whom it seemeth good in his sight. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, is his high and holy resolve. Hervey.

Dr. Bates has an observation to the same effect:

"As at the deluge the waters covered the highest mountains as well as the lowest hills; so pardoning mercy cancels the greatest sins as well as the least."

Arrowsmith.

The sun is glorious and beautiful; but if the moon and every star had as much brightness, it would not be so peculiarly admired. Thus the mercy of God towards his elect is so much the more admirable by being contrasted with his wrath against the reprobate. Parr.

Let us learn to run up all the mercies we are partakers of to the proper spring—"Who loved me, and gave himself for me."

Dr. Owen.

Special mercies call for special duties; as they that hold the largest farms must pay the largest rent. Dyer.

To bless God for mercies is the way to increase them; to bless him for miseries is the way to remove them. No good lives so long as that which is thankfully improved; no evil dies so soon as that which is patiently endured. ibid.

MERIT.

Free-will establishes merit; free-grace checks it. The sun is not beholden to us because we borrow light from it; or the fountain, because we draw water. Manton.

MINISTERS.

If one workman should tell you that "your house must be pulled down, that the beams are all rotten, and new materials must be prepared;" and another should say, "No; the house will stand firm enough with a little repair, such a beam is good, such a spar may continue, and a trifling cost will serve the turn:" you would probably listen to him who is for putting you to the least expense and trouble.

An honest and faithful minister of Christ comes and tells sinners from the Scriptures that man is, by nature, in a dangerous condition; that his house is tumbling about his ears; that his natural state is corrupt and rotten; that nothing of the original frame will serve; that old things must be done away, and all things become new.—Next, in steps an Arminian and blows up the sinner's pride, by telling him that he is neither so weak, nor so wicked, as the other represents him; that a little patching and whitewashing will set all to rights, without taking any part of the building down. "If thou wilt," says he, "thou mayest repent, believe, be good, and endure to the end: or, at least, by exerting thy natural abilities, thou wilt oblige God to lend a helping hand to thy endeavours, and superadd what thou hast not." This is the workman that will please proud men best. Gurnall.

If a minister be erroneous, how should the flock be sound? No readier way to destroy a whole town than by poisoning the cistern at which they draw their water. ibid.

How shall the prophane be hardened in their sins? Let the preacher but sow pillows under their elbows, and cry peace, peace; and all is done. How may the worship of God come to be neglected? Let Hophni and Phineas be scandalous in their lives, and men will soon come to abhor the offering of the Lord. ibid.

The Devil hath his ministers as well as Christ. Dyer.

Too many modern preachers resemble auctioneers, who put up heaven to the highest bidder.

Mr. Serle, at London, June 3, 1774.

Under the law, the priest had part of the sacrifices assigned to himself and his own peculiar use.—Under the gospel, Christ's ministers, when they are made instruments of spiritual comfort to others, generally come in for a share of the consolation themselves. God often waters the preacher while the preacher is watering the people. Mr. Ryland.

The shoulder (which is the working part of the ox) was the priest's portion; to shew that God's ministers should labour for what they receive, and not eat the bread of idleness. ibid.

That minister is worth nothing who cannot make the Devil roar. ibid.

A judicious minister will accommodate his labours to the apprehensions and peculiar cases of his people; as the prophet Elijah adapted his own size to that of the child he raised to life. ibid.

A good man was observing to me, to-day, that "many ministers speak so sparingly and so coldly of the gospel privileges of the saints, that one would imagine they thought themselves no more than scarecrows, set up on purpose to frighten God's people from the corn." May 7, 1770.

What recompense did the prophets receive (from the world) for all their labours and expense of spirits (in preaching), but saws, and swords, and dungeons? It is almost as much the character of a minister to be much in afflictions; as to be much in spirit, and much in labours. "To preach," said Luther, "is only another name for deriving and entailing the world's hatred upon ourselves." But we may justly suspect that we are not true to our master when we are dandled on the world's knees.

Dr. Manton.

Some people are apt to blame Christian ministers for dealing too faithfully with their hearers. But was I to see a blind man walking towards a gravel-pit two or three hundred feet deep, and I was to beg him for his own sake not to go on; would it not be very absurd in him to be angry, and to answer, What is my danger to you? Pray, mind your own business!

Mr. Wallis, in conversation, at London, May 10, 1776.

Ministers are in general apt to make too wide a distinction between seekers and believers; a man must have some degree of saving grace, and of true faith, before ever he can seek Christ in earnest.

Mr. Madan, in conversation, July 18, 1769.

We [ministers] should not [only] be like dials on a wall, or like watches in our pockets, to teach the eye; but like clocks and alarms, to ring to the ear. Aaron must wear bells as well as pomegranates. The prophet's voice must be a trumpet, whose sound may be heard afar off.—A sleeping centinel may be the loss of a whole city.

Bishop Hall, in a Sermon before King James.—See the Bishop's Remains, p. 2, 3.

An architect cannot say to his rule, his line, or other instruments, "Go, build a house." He must first take them into his own hand ere the wished-for effect will follow. What are ministers of God but mere instruments? And if ever they are useful in building up the Church of Christ, it is his own hand must make them so.

Mr. Hitchen, in conversation, July 18.

Herod was a wonderful gospeller for a while, until John told of him of his incest. So a minister is a mighty good man with his people, until he lay the axe of his ministry to their favourite sins and errors.

Parr

Men are bunglers who are taught by any other but God. We that are ministers of the gospel leave you but dunces in Christian experience and Christian practice, till the Lord Jesus Christ breathes with our ministry, and by his Spirit teaches your spirits. Gurnall.

One capital error in men's preparing themselves for the sacred function is that they read divinity more in other books than in the Scriptures. Bishop Burnet.

Ask yourselves often [says the bishop, addressing himself to the clergy of our church] would you follow that course of life if there were no settled establishment belonging to it, and if you were to preach under the cross, and in danger of persecution? For, till you arrive at that, you are yet carnal, and come into the priesthood for a piece of bread. ibid.

I have lamented during my whole life that I saw so little true zeal among our clergy. The main body of our clergy has always appeared dead and lifeless to me. Instead of animating one another, they seem to lay one another asleep. Without a visible alteration in this, you will fall under a universal contempt, and lose both the credit and the fruits of your ministry. ibid.

I say it with regret; I have observed the clergy in all the places through which I have travelled, Papists, Lutherans, Calvinists, and Dissenters: but of them all, our clergy are much the most remiss in their labours, and the least severe in their lives. ibid.

MYSTERIES.

The doctrinal mysteries of Christianity are bones to philosophy, but milk to faith.

Howell's Letters.

MEMENTO.

Remember thy sins and Christ's pardonings; thy hell-deservings and Christ's merits; thy weakness and Christ's strength; thy pride and Christ's humility; thy many infirmities and Christ's restorings; thy guilts and Christ's new applications of his blood; thy fallings and Christ's raisings-up; thy wants and Christ's fulness; thy temptations and Christ's tenderness; thy vileness and Christ's righteousness. Wilcox.

NAME OF GOD.

The name of God is the believer's harbour; where he may betake himself as boldly as a man steps into his own house when overtaken by a shower. Gurnall.

Almighty power, made lovely by an essential union with perfect wisdom, justice, and mercy, makes up the name of God, and demands the heart-felt adoration of his creatures. Anon.

NATURE

We are for bringing to Christ; and that must not be. Not a penny of nature's highest improvements will pass in heaven. Wilcox.

When nature is hard put to it by guilt or wrath, it will fly to its old haunts of self-righteousness, self-goodness, &c. Only God's infinite power can cast down these strong holds. Wilcox.

Nature would do any thing to be saved rather than go to Christ alone, and close with him. Christ will have nothing; and yet the soul will force something of its own on Christ. ibid.

Nature cannot endure to think that the gospel is only for sinners. It would, if left to itself, rather choose to despair than go to Christ upon such terms. ibid.

It is a terrible stroke to nature to think of being stripped of all, and not to have a rag of duty or self-righteousness left to look at. ibid.

Such is the natural propensity of man's heart to the way of the law in opposition to Christ, that, as the tainted vessel turns the taste of the purest liquor put into it, so the natural man turns the very gospel into law, and would transform the covenant of grace into a covenant of works. Boston.

NEARNESS TO CHRIST.

It is but a small thing to see Christ in a book, as men see the world in a map: but to come near unto Christ, to love him and embrace him, is quite another thing.

Rutherford.

Let Diotrephes say, it is good for me to have the pre-eminence. Let Judas say, it is good for me to bear the bag. Let Demas say, it is good for me to embrace the present world.—But do thou, O my soul, say with David, it is good for me to draw near to God!

Arrowsmith.

NEED.

It is now twenty-three years since I was awakened to know the work of God upon my heart: and I feel my need of Christ more deeply at the end of these three and twenty years, than I even did when I was first drawn to him.

Good Mr. Joss, in conversation, at Bristol, this day, August 23, 1775.

Was it not for needy, helpless, thirsting sinners, Christ would have no customers. The blessings of grace and glory would, as it were, lie upon his hands. Arrowsmith.

NEGLIGENCE.

Christians are too negligent, and do not live like those that are born of God. As it was said of Hannibal, when he was melting himself away in the pleasures of Capua, that "there was fire in him, but it needed blowing;" so, in true believers, there is grace at the bottom, but it needs a little stirring and quickening. Manton.

NEW BIRTH.

If thou art not born again, all thy [outward] reformation is naught. Thou hast shut the door, but the thief is still in the house. Boston.

NEW COVENANT.

There is no condition in the new covenant. It is the freeness of God's love, and the greatness of his compassion, that undertakes (and accomplishes) all. Mrs. Wright.

OBEDIENCE.

Obedience is necessary to our comfort and assurance, though not to pardon.

Richardson.

OPPOSITION.

A believer hath so much opposition in his way to glory, that he had need be well locked into the saddle of his profession, or he will be soon dismounted. Gurnall.

Whence is it that the doctrines of special election, of efficacious grace in regeneration and conversion, of justification by the imputed righteousness of Christ, and of the infallible perseverance of the saints, though so clearly revealed and so strongly proved in the word of God, are, notwithstanding, so generally denied, opposed, and ridiculed? Because they give all the glory to God, and will not allow man so much as to boast a little. Anon.

OBSERVATIONS.

Some observations of the excellent Mr. Thomas Cole (g) in an account of his own experience.

"I liken the word of God to a seal, and the heart of man to wax; and I must say I have often seen what has been engraven on the seal, when, to my sorrow, I have not found full and suitable impressions upon my own heart. But yet, as in some old coin, some worn groats, there appears here and there a little, here and there a stroke that discovers the value of the piece, and makes it current money; so, when I have said the best I can of my case, though I cannot present you with grace in as desirable characters as I could wish, yet, what I am, I am by grace: and if God should never do more for me in this world, I have reason to bless his name to all eternity for what he hath already done.

"Before I had considered the grace of God, I was afraid of my own convictions. I durst not scrape too deep in that dunghill which lay before my door: there was enough already apparent that I knew not well what to do with. But the general consideration of the grace and mercy of God encouraged me to look farther. I thought thus: there is a remedy to be had, let things be as bad as bad can be; there is a Physician, and many promises of pardon and assistance. Whence I concluded that I might safely venture to know the worst of myself.

"I was convinced I could be saved no other way but by grace, if I could but find grace enough; but at that time I saw more in my own sin than in God's mercy. But this put me on a farther inquiry after the grace of God, because my life lay upon it; and thus I was brought to the gospel.

"When I came to the gospel I met with the law in it: i. e. I was for turning the gospel into law. I began to settle myself upon gospel duties, as repentance, humiliation, believing, praying, &c. And, I know not how, I forgot the promise of grace which first brought me to the gospel. But as I had before found that I could not answer the strictness of the law because my duties fell short of the rule; so I came to discover that I could not answer the [spirituality] of the gospel, for I pressed after acts of grace upon a legal footing, making works of them all. I found I could neither believe nor pray as the gospel required.

"While I was in this plunge, it pleased the Lord to direct me to study the person of Christ, whom I looked on as the great undertaker in the work of man's salvation. And truly here I may say, according to my measure, as Paul did, "It pleased God to reveal his son in me." God overcame my heart with this. I saw so much mercy in his mercy, so much love in his love, so much grace in his grace, that I knew not what to liken it to. And here my heart broke, I knew not how.

"Belief of salvation must be grounded on some inward transaction between Christ and the soul. I began to consider whether any such thing had passed between Christ and me; and while I was looking this way, the Lord Jesus drew me; and took hold of me, in raising me up to a sensible reliance on him.

"I never had a more lively sense of my acceptance with God through Christ, than when I was sensible of the greatest recumbency on him; when I laid most stress upon him, I always found most strength in him.

"Before this faith came I knew not how to secure myself against past, present, and future sins: but there was that largeness of grace, that all-sufficiency of mercy, that infinity of righteousness, discovered to me in Christ, that I found sufficient for all the days of my life. I closed with Christ for acceptance throughout the whole course of my life. I dealt with him for all at once.

"Though new guilt puts me under a necessity of making fresh application to

(g) Author of that valuable Treatise on Regeneration.

Christ, yet still it is upon the old footing. I cannot put Christ upon doing that for me which he hath not already done. I daily apply to Christ for cleansing; which I call living by faith: and I never was under the power of this faith, but I found a greater disposition in my spirit to practical holiness than at any other time."

Some things said by the same Mr. Thomas Cole on his death bed. (Obit Sept. 16, 1667.)

"Many plead for those opinions and notions upon which they would be loth to venture their souls in a dying hour. I value more the judgment of a dying saint about justification than all the wrangling disputes of learned men.

"It would be miserable dying if we had not something every way adequate to the demands of the law to ground our hopes of eternal life upon. We have an abundant entrance into the kingdom of God, by the way of Christ's righteousness. The devil and the law may meet us; yet cannot hinder us from entering into heaven by that righteousness.

"Christ can defend his own truths when his poor creatures and ministers, who contended for them as well as they could, are laid in the silent dust.

"I wait for a peaceable dismissal. I long to see his salvation. The Spirit saith, come; and the bride saith, come. Come, O come, Lord Jesus; come quickly!

"My desire is, that God would do his own will, and glorify his own name, by my life or death; which is the best disposal of me that God himself can make."

[When rising, he said] to rise for a little time is but a sorry rising: but to rise so as never to go to bed more, is a glorious resurrection. Then we shall be for ever with the Lord.

"It is well for us that our souls do not stand upon the same terms with God as our bodies do; for they must die; but eternal life possesseth the soul, and will never leave it."

[To one who said, "Sir, your death will be a great stroke; I know not any likely to stand up in your room:"

He answered,]

"God can make the want of ordinances the greatest ordinance to you.

"If God keeps his truths alive in the hearts of some few serious Christians, they will preach one to another.

"I bless God for what he hath done for my soul. I give up my body to him; let him do with it what he pleases.

"How soon is nature overset by the God of nature, if the God of grace doth not stand by to support it! A finite creature could not endure, if the everlasting arms were not underneath.

"Though they would not suffer me to preach the gospel of free grace quietly, yet God suffers me to die in the comfort of it.

"As for my going, God can make it no loss to you. God can take off and set on his own workmen when he pleases.

"I have done with all other satisfaction but what God in Christ can give.

"We live but dying lives in the body. They are but short recoveries which we have at any time, until mortality is swallowed up of life."

[When he was removed to the other side of the bed he said], "This is but turning from one side to another: but I would fain turn from the dark side to the light side. One turn more, and then I shall be at rest."

ORDINANCES.

Men often go to God in duties with their faces towards the world; and when their bodies are on the mount of ordinances, their hearts will be found at the foot of the hill, going after their covetousness. Boston.

Attend diligently on ordinances; yet beware of putting ordinances in God's stead. Hath not thy heart said, "I will go and hear such a man, and get comfort, and get strength?" No wonder that you find yourself weak, barren, and unfruitful. How should means and ministers help thy soul, except the Lord help? Christ himself keeps the key of his wine-cellar. His ministering servants cannot so much as make you drink when you come to his house, and therefore, poor soul, stop not short of Christ; but press through all the crowd of ordinances, and ask to see Jesus, to speak with Jesus, and to touch him: so will virtue come out from him to thee. Gurnall.

ORIGINAL DEPRAVITY.

Evil tempers are but the symptoms of our spiritual disease; and evil works are but the scales of the leper. Hateful as they are, they only indicate that inward, moral leprosy of original depravation which hath vitiated and corrupted the whole mass of our fallen nature.

Mr. Haweis, Sept. 6, 1769.

The power of original sin is not always very discernible in children and young persons; but sometimes lies hid under the cover of decent civility, and seeming innocence. But, alas! all the offspring of Adam are deeply infected. They are like young lions, which do not discover much of their native fierceness at first. But if they live long enough for time to let their teeth and claws grow, they will quickly give proof of the savage nature they brought into the world with them. ibid.

Adam's sin corrupted man's nature, and leavened the whole lump of mankind. We putrified in Adam as our root. The root was poisoned, and so the branches were envenomed. Boston.

As a whole nest of venomous creatures must needs be more dreadful than any few of them that come creeping forth, so the sin of thy nature, that mother of abominations, must be worse than any particular lusts that appear stirring in thy heart and life. ibid.

OMNISCIENCE.

If conscience be as a thousand witnesses, the all-seeing God is as a thousand consciences. Arrowsmith.

OMNIPOTENCE.

My hopes from appearances are cold. My faith has no bed to sleep upon but God's omnipotency. Rutherford.

ONE WAY

You must be going either to heaven or hell. You cannot go two ways at once.

In point of acceptance with God, there is but one and the same way for the saint and the sinner, the oyster-woman and the philosopher; even the blood and obedience of God's co-equal Son.

Mr. Ryland, July 4, 1769.

PARDON.

You may have heard of some persons condemned to execution, who at the scaffold have been so obdurate and stiff-necked that not a cry nor a tear came from them; yet, just as they have been going to lay their necks upon the block, when a pardon has come, and they were at once discharged from guilt, imprisonment and death; they that could not weep a tear before, no sooner see the pardon sealed, and themselves acquitted, than they dissolve into tears of joy, thankfulness, and surprise. So it is with believers. The more they see Christ in the pardon of sin, and the love of God in Christ to receive and embrace them, the more they melt. Crisp.

First, souls look to Christ, by faith, for pardon through his blood; and then they mourn for sins pardoned: and never do they mourn better and more kindly, or are more ashamed and confounded because of their sins, than when they are most satisfied that God is pacified towards them for all that they have done. Dr. Gill.

PARSIMONIOUS.

To be over-thrifty in our expenses upon God [whether of time, money, or labour] is the worst piece of husbandry in the world. Arrowsmith.

PASTURE.

The grass and pasture are so sweet that Christ hath put a believer into, that though there were no bounds to keep in such a soul, yet it would never go out of this fat pasture to feed in a barren common. Dr. Crisp.

PAUL.

We have lately repaired or rather erected anew the church dedicated to St. Paul's name: but some of us have pulled down and demolished his doctrines. Our church celebrates that apostle's conversion; but many of us seem to renounce what he hath delivered concerning grace, conversion, and regeneration.

Dr. Edwards against Whitby.

Paul was Nero's prisoner, but Nero was much more God's: and while God had work for Paul, he found him friends both in court and prison. Gurnall.

PEACE.

When peace is concluded between nations that were before at war, trading is revived. So will it be between God and you: commerce will be revived, and you will be trading into heaven [by prayer and repeated acts of faith], and bring away rich treasures of grace and comfort. Manton.

A man that is at peace with God will be often in God's company. ibid.

PERFECTION.

Some do in this life conceit that they are already perfect. The way by which God cures this phrensy of pride, we have in these days seen to be somewhat like that in Nebuchadnezzar, namely, to give them the heart of a beast; I mean, by suffering them for a time to fall into gross, beastly practices; herein shewing them how far they are from that perfection they dreamed of so vainly. Gurnall.

PERMISSION.

What need a child fear though the whole house be full of rods, seeing not one of them can move without the father's hand? Dodd.

If evil had never been permitted, the wisdom of God could not have appeared in over-ruling it, nor his justice in punishing it, nor his mercy in forgiving it, nor his power in subduing it.

Dr. Gifford, in conversation at London, Oct. 27, 1775.

PERSECUTION.

The cold water of persecution is often thrown on the Church's face to fetch her to herself when she is in a swoon.

PHARISEE.

Humanly speaking it is harder to work savingly on a pharisee than on a libertine.

The former hath more to forego than the latter. The profane person hath but his lust to deny; the other hath his duties to renounce, and a long train of seeming graces. Oh how difficult is it to persuade such an one to alight and hold Christ's stirrup whilst he and all his patched up performances are made as dust under Christ's footstool!

Gurnall.

If a pharisee can but get a few husks of outward duties to feed upon, and muster up a few rags of self-righteousness to throw over his back, he is presently as proud as Lucifer. Dr. Gill, in a sermon I heard him preach, Dec. 11, 1768.

PHILANTHROPY.

We should despise none, but honour all; and be as ready to do them good as the hand is ready to sooth the eye when it smarts, or ease the head when it aches.

POLLUTION.

I live upon forgiveness, and stand in need of washing every moment. Anon.

PORTION.

God lets the wicked have their portion beforehand, i. e. in the present life: Psalm xvii. Luke vi. 24. and xvi. 25. A wicked man may give God an acquittance, and write upon it "Received in full." But the saint's reward is in reversion; the robe and the ring are yet to come.

POVERTY OF RICHES.

The richest are oftentimes the poorest, and the poorest are oftentimes the richest. Oh how many thread-bare souls are there to be found under silken coats and purple robes! Dyer.

POWER OF GOD.

I have sometimes thought that that change which passes upon the hearts of God's people at the instant of death, or will pass upon living saints at the time I speak of (i. e. the time of Christ's second coming), when hearts so full of sinful lust, pollution, and all wickedness will be at once cleared of all, is a greater evidence and display of the power of God than the change that passes upon their bodies, either at their resurrection or at this time. Dr. Gill.

PRAYER.

The longer a believer hath neglected prayer the harder he finds it to pray, partly through shame; for the soul having played the truant knows not how to look God in the face; and partly through the difficulty of the work, which is doubly hard to what another finds who walks in the exercise of his graces. It requires more time and pains for him to tune his instrument when all is out of order than for another to play the lesson. Gurnall.

Prayer, like Jonathan's bow, returns not empty. Never was faithful prayer lost at sea. No merchant trades with such certainty as the praying saint. Some prayers, indeed, have a longer voyage than others, but then return with the richer lading at last. ibid.

Who can express the powerful oratory of a believer's prayer? This little word (father) lisped forth in prayer by a child of God, exceeds the eloquence of Demosthenes, Cicero, and all the most famous orators in the world: we knock at heaven, and the heart of God flies open. ibid.

The Christian is compared to a tree, Psalm i; and those trees flourish most and bear the sweetest fruit which stand most in the sun. The praying Christian is (as they say of Rhodians) in sole positus: he stands nigh unto God, and hath God nigh unto him in all that he calls upon him for: you may therefore expect his fruit to be sweet and ripe. When another that stands, as it were, in the shade, and at a distance from God, through neglect of prayer, will have little fruit found on his branches, and that but green and sour. ibid.

In trading, he gets most by his commodity that can forbear his money the longest; so does the Christian that can with most patience stay for a return to his prayer. Such a soul shall never be ashamed of its waiting. ibid.

The gift of prayer may have praise from men, but it is the grace of prayer that has power with God. Dyer.

Pray for them thou lovest. Thou wilt never have any comfort of his friendship for whom thou dost not pray. Parr.

Prayer is a key which, being turned by the hand of faith, unlocks all God's treasures. Cripplegate Lect.

In prayer it is better to have a heart without words than words without a heart.

Bunyan.

To say, in compliment, "I am a sinner," is easy; but to cry with the publican indeed; "God be merciful to me a sinner," is the hardest prayer in the world. Wilcox.

"God be merciful, in Christ, to me a sinner," are fit to be the last dying words of the greatest saint that lives.

Col. Gallatin, Oct. 19, 1769.

A good woman used to say that "A family without prayer is like a house without a roof, exposed to all the injuries of weather, and to every storm that blows."

Told me by her son, Mr. Lyon, at London, Nov. 29, 1776.

Prayer is the breath of a regenerate man.

Gill.

What we win by prayer we shall wear with comfort. Dodd.

Either praying will make a man leave off sinning, or sinning will make him leave off praying
Dodd.

PREACHING.

Sometimes, when I have thought I did no good [by the sermons I have preached], then I did the most of all; and at other times, when I thought I should catch people, I have fished for nothing.
John Bunyan.

The word preached is like Samson's riddle; we cannot unfold it without God's heifer.
Gurnall.

My preaching is not like sending an arrow from a bow (to which some strength of arm is requisite), but like pulling the trigger of a gun ready charged, which the feeblest finger can do.

A saying of the late Rev. Mr. Hervey.

Mr. Owen, on being lately told that he had not talents for preaching, made answer, "I preach the good gospel if I am not a good gospel-preacher."

Told me by Miss Russel, at Brightelmstone, Sept. 26, 1775.

PREDESTINATION.

The Book of Life, like the tree of life in the garden of Eden, hath a tree of knowledge growing hard by, which cannot with safety be tasted of. There are some nice and needless questions started concerning election, which questions ought to be forborne. But these lofty walls and aspiring sons of Anak should by no means prevail with us to act as the unworthy spies sent by Israel to explore the land of Canaan. We ought not to bring up a bad report, or give credit to any brought up by others, on a land that flows with so much milk and honey as the doctrine of predestination doth. Not to insist on this doctrine were to stop up those walls which the prophets, the apostles, and our Lord Jesus himself have digged in their writings (and ministrations) for the refreshment of thirsty souls; yea, it would be endeavouring to cancel the first great charter of our salvation.

Arrowsmith.

PRESERVATION.

The very hairs of your head, says Christ, are all numbered: fear ye not. On which Austin hath this sweet and pertinent remark: "Thou that cannot lose a single hair, how comes it to pass that thou art afraid of losing thy soul?"
Arrowsmith.

It is not with God as with carpenters and shipwrights, who build houses for others to dwell in, and vessels for others to sail in, and afterwards take little or no thought about them. God, who made all things for himself looks to the preservation of all.

ibid.

PRESUMPTION.

The Deity and the sun are in this respect similar; they cheer and refresh humble, cautious beholders, but put out the eyes of such as are too daring, prying, and inquisitive.
Arrowsmith.

PRIDE.

A proud heart and a lofty mountain are never fruitful.
Gurnall.

If once (like Hezekiah) we call in spectators to see our treasure, and grow proud of our gifts and comforts, then it is high time for God, if he loves us indeed, to send some messengers to carry those away from us which carry our hearts away from him.

ibid.

Pride stops up the conduit of divine communications. If the heart begin to swell, it is time for God to hold his hand and turn the cock; for all that is poured on such a soul runs over into self-applauding, and so becomes as water spilt in regard of any good it doth the creature, or any glory it brings to God.

ibid.

Luther well observes that "proud men require God to act jure humano, i. e. according to their conceptions of what is right and just. Haughty flesh cannot vouchsafe the God of heaven so much honour as to believe any thing to be good and right which is spoken or acted above what the Codex of Justinian, or the fifth book of Aristotle's Ethics defineth to be just."—Luth. de Serv. Arb. cap. 173.

Dr. Arrowsmith

PROPOSAL.

"If God," says Mr. Hooker, "should make us an offer thus large: 'Search all the generations of men since the fall of our first father Adam; find one man that hath done one action which hath past from him pure, without any stain or blemish at all; and for that one man's only action neither man nor angel shall feel the torments which are prepared for both.' Do you think that this ransom to deliver men and angels could be found to be among the sons of men?"

PROWESS.

It requires more prowess and greatness of spirit to obey God faithfully than to command an army of men; to be a Christian than to be a captain.
Gurnall.

PROFESSOR.

O loose professor! be not angry if we at least question whether we ought to style thee a Christian. The name of Christ is too holy and sacred to be written on a rotten post.
ibid.

None will have such a dreadful parting from Christ in the last day as they who by profession went half way with him and then left him. Gurnall.

PROMISES.

God is wise to conceal the succours he intends thee in the several changes of thy life, that so he may draw thy heart into an entire dependance on his faithful promise. Therefore, though thou perhaps might not see thy God in the way, thou shalt surely find him in the end. ibid.

Judge not of God's love by providences but by promises. Wilcox.

When a believer is in darkness and endeavours to reason away his unbelief, he will find all his reasonings but lost labour. There is only one thing he can do to purpose, and that is, simply to cast anchor on God's naked promise. Mr. Madan, Aug. 11, 1769.

Looking to the promises quickens us in our religious course. It is like the rod of myrtle in the traveller's hand, which (as some tell us) revives his spirits and makes him walk without weariness. Anon.

God's promises shall as surely receive their accomplishment in due season as that of Christ's incarnation did when the fullness of time was come, Gal. iv. 4. And that of bringing the people of Israel out of Egypt at the end of four hundred and thirty years, which was most exactly performed on the self-same day in which that number of years was expired, Exod. xii. 41. Arrowsmith.

PROTECTION.

The pillar by which the Israelites were conducted through the wilderness may be looked upon as an emblem of that safe conduct which the Church in all ages may expect from Jesus Christ. As in that pillar there were two different substances, the fire and the cloud, yet but one pillar, so there are two different natures in Christ: his divinity shining as fire; his humanity darkening as a cloud, yet but one person. As that pillar departed not from them by day or by night all the while they travelled in the desert, so, whilst the Church's pilgrimage lasts in this world, the safe conduct of Christ, by his Spirit and ordinances, shall be continued. But as at their entrance into Canaan, a type of heaven, the pillar is thought to have been removed (because not mentioned in the sequel of the history; and because, when Israel passed over Jordan, we read not of the pillar, but of the ark going before them); so when the Church shall arrive at heaven, her resting-place, the mediatorial guidance of Christ is to cease, and the ordinances, which are here of use, shall disappear. ibid.

PROVIDENCE

What we term the course of nature is the incessant administration of Providence. Hervey.

He that eyes a providence shall always have a providence to eye.

A saying of the late venerable Mr. Thos. Hall.

God, who feeds the ravens, will not starve his doves. Charnock on Providence.

A Christian hath two things to relieve him against all his distrustful fears and cares; adoption and particular providence. God is his father; and such a father as is not ignorant of his condition, nor mindless of it. And therefore though a believer may have little or nothing in hand, it is enough that his father keepeth the purse for him; whose care extendeth to all things and persons: who hath the hearts of all men in his hand; and who worketh all things according to his own will. Manton.

If God be your father, you can want nothing that is good: but the determination of what is good must be left to his wisdom; for we are not so fit to judge of it nor to discern our own good. We should therefore commit all to his fatherly care and wise providence. Indeed, he chuseth rather to profit us than to please us, in his dispensations; and it is our duty to refer all to his wisdom and faithfulness. ibid.

If we trust God for our heavenly inheritance, we may well trust him for our daily maintenance, which he vouchsafeth to the birds of the air, to the beast of the field, and even to his enemies. He that feedeth a kite, will he not feed a child? He that supplies his enemies, will he not take care of his family? You would think that person monstrously cruel who would feed his dogs and starve his children. This cannot, without blasphemy, be imagined of our gracious and heavenly Father. ibid.

The divine providence which is sufficient to deliver us in our utmost extremity, is equally necessary to our preservation in the most peaceful situation. Mr. Newton.

The providence of God is one straight line drawn from the point of his decree. A straight line it is in itself; however crooked it may appear through a false medium. God will do whatsoever he pleases; and what pleases him ought to please us. It is above nature, it is contrary to nature; to make a full surrender of ourselves to his sovereign and absolute will. Grace alone can enable us to say from the heart, "Thy will be done."

Rev. Mr. Winter, in a letter to me, Dec. 22, 1769.

In a musical instrument, when we observe a number of strings set to harmony, we conclude that some skilful musician hath tuned them.

When we see thousands of men in a field marshalled under their respective colours, all yielding exact obedience; we infer that there is a general to whose orders they are subject.

In a watch, when we observe springs and wheels, great and small, each so fitted as to concur to an orderly motion, we acknowledge the skill of an artificer.

When we come into a printing-house, and see a vast variety of different letters, so regulated and disposed as to make a book, we are at once convinced that there is some composer by whose art they were brought into such a frame.

When we behold a fair building we conclude it had an architect; and,

When we see a stately ship completely fitted out, and safely conducted to the port, we know that it had builders and a pilot.

The visible world is such an instrument, army, watch, building, book, and ship, as undeniably proves that God was and is the tuner, general, and artificer, the composer, architect, and pilot of it. Arrowsmith.

Zachary Ursinus was wont to say, "I had often lain in the streets had not the providence of God been my hostess and provided me with a lodging." ibid.

PROVOCATION.

Saints, when provoked, are too often so like sinners that it is hard to discern any difference. Anon.

PUSILLANIMITY.

A cool and cowardly defence of Christian principles will always embolden the enemies of the gospel and discourage its friends. Be resolute for God, or give up his cause.

Mr. Ryland, June 22, 1770.

It is no wisdom to shuffle with God, by denying his truths, or shifting off our duty to keep correspondence with men. He is a poor fencer that lays his soul at open guard to be stabbed and wounded with guilt, while he is lifting up his hands to save a broken head. Gurnall.

REASON.

A million of torches cannot shew us the sun. It can only be seen by its own light. Nor can all the natural reason in the world discover, either what God is or what worship he expects, without divine and supernatural revelation from himself. Arrowsmith.

Though faith may look upon God, and that with much comfort; yet for reason to stare too much upon him is the way to lose her sight. ibid.

When reason hath tired and wildered herself in searching after God, the result must be, "non est inventus;" he is not to be found, at least not by me. ibid.

RECONCILIATION.

The gospel is a doctrine according to godliness; and true holiness is the health, is the happiness of the soul. These duties issuing from faith, and recommended by the intercession of Christ, are acceptable to the divine majesty. But these are not your Saviour. God hath not reconciled the world to himself by their own pious practices, but by his Son Jesus Christ.

REFORMATION OF MANNERS.

If ever a [true and lasting] reformation [of manners] is produced; it must, under the influences of the eternal Spirit, be produced by the doctrines of free grace and justification through the Redeemer's righteousness. Until these doctrines are generally inculcated, the most elegant harangues from the pulpit, or the most correct dissertations from the press, will be no better than a pointless arrow and a broken bow.

Mr. Hervey.

REFUGE.

A heathen could say, when a bird (scared by a hawk) flew into his bosom for refuge, "I will not kill thee, nor betray thee to thy enemy, seeing thou fliest to me for sanctuary." Much less will God either slay or give up the soul that takes sanctuary in his name!

REGENERATION.

There are two principles in a man that is born again; a principle of corrupt nature and a principle of grace; the one is called the old man, and the other the new. The old man continues unregenerate to the last. No part in him is regenerated. He remains untouched, and is just the same he was, only deprived of his power and dominion. The new man is wholly regenerate. There is no unregenerate part in him. There is no sin in him, nor done by him: "he cannot sin because he is born of God." "The king's daughter is all glorious within." [See Rom. vii 17.] Dr. Gill.

Regeneration does not come by the will of man, John i. 13. As gracious persons did not regenerate themselves, so neither can they convey regenerating grace to others. If they could, a good master would regenerate every servant in his family; a good parent would regenerate every child of his; and a minister of the gospel would regenerate all that sit under his ministry. But they can do no more than pray, and use the means. God only can do the work. ibid.

A child as soon as born, having all its limbs, is a perfect man, as to parts, though they are not yet at their full growth and size. So the new man, or gracious principle infused in regeneration, is a perfect man at once as to parts ; though as yet not arrived to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Dr. Gill.

As Christ's resurrection was a declaration of his being the Son of God, so regeneration is an evidence of interest in the adoption of children. Likewise as the resurrection of Christ was by the almighty power of God, so is the regeneration and quickening of a dead sinner. And as Christ's resurrection was the first step to his glorification, so is regeneration, to seeing and entering into the kingdom of God. ibid.

Regeneration is an irresistible act of God's grace : no more resistance can be made to it than there could be in the first matter to its creation ; or in a dead man to his resurrection ; or in an infant to its generation. Whatever aversion, contrariety, or opposition there may be to it, in the corrupt nature of man, it is all speedily and easily overcome by the power of divine grace, when the stony heart is taken away, and a heart of flesh given. ibid.

RELIANCE.

Adhering to, and glorying in the cross of Christ, you shall enter the harbour of eternal rest ; not like a ship-wrecked mariner, cleaving to some broken plank, and hardly escaping the raging waves ; but like some stately vessel, with all her sails expanded and riding before a prosperous gale. Mr. Hervey.

As in a pair of compasses one foot is fixed in the centre while the other wanders about in the circumference ; so must the soul stay on Christ while we search after evidences and additional comforts. Dr. Manton.

(May not the same thought be accommodated to the contrary propensities of the old man and the new ?) Thou sayest, perhaps, that thou canst not believe, that thou canst not repent. Go to Christ with thy impiteny and unbelief, to get faith and repentance from him. Tell Christ, " Lord ! I have brought no righteousness, no grace, to be accepted for or justified by. I am come for thy righteousness, and I must have it." Wilcox.

RELIGION.

The word religion is derived à religando, signifying to tie or bind : because by true religion men's souls are tied and fastened to the Supreme being. Arrowsmith.

To maintain, as most unconverted men do, that any person may be saved in an ordinary course (for I meddle not with extraordinary dispensations, but leave the secrets of God to himself) by any religion whatever, provided he live up to the principles of it, is to turn the whole world into an Eden, and to find a tree of life in every garden as well as in the paradise of God. Arrowsmith.

RENUNCIATION.

Had I all the faith of the patriarchs, all the zeal of the prophets, all the good works of the apostles, all the holy sufferings of the martyrs, and all the glowing devotion of the seraphs ; I would disclaim the whole in point of dependance, and count all but dross and dung, when set in competition with the infinitely precious death and infinitely meritorious righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. A saying of Mr. Hervey.

As blind Bartimæus threw away his cloak when he came to Christ ; so must we throw off, i. e. disclaim, renounce, and withdraw every degree of confidence from our own righteousness, if we would be justified in the sight of God. Mr. Parr.

REPENTANCE.

The difference between true and false repentance is as great as that between the running of water in the paths after a violent shower, and the streams which flow from a living fountain. A false repentance has grief of mind and humiliation only for great and glaring offences, or until it supposes pardon for them obtained : true repentance is a continued war against sin, a permanent inward shame for its defilements, until death sounds the retreat. Venn.

There is no coming at the fair haven of eternal glory without sailing through the narrow strait of repentance. Dyer.

It is Christ that grants repentance unto life, Acts v. 31. And if ever you will repent with a kind repentance, you must either have it from Christ or go without it. Crisp.

Repentance includes self-abhorrence : as a man not only loaths poison, but the very dish or vessel that smells of it, Ezek. xxix. 43. Brookes.

REPROACH.

The reproaches of Christ are precious. It is better to be preserved in brine than rot in honey. Dyer.

Reproach is the soil and dung whereby God makes his heritage fruitful. Manton.

REPROBATE.

As the sun freezes and congeals the water, not by infusing coldness into it, but by not imparting heat, and by forbearing to shine upon it ; so God hardens the reprobate, not by imparting malice, but by not imparting grace. (from St. Austin)

RESOLUTION.

There are two C's which I will never sacrifice to any man ; my conscience and my constitution.
2 Q 2

Dr. Baker, Sarum, July 13, 1770.
know that he who sent me to the west and south, sends me also to the north. I will charge my soul to believe and to wait for him. I will follow his providence ; and neither go before it nor stay behind it.

Rutherford.

Good resolutions (as some call them), without grace, are like breath upon steel ; which quickly flies off and vanishes away.

Cripple-gate Lectures.

RETALIATION.

The best way to be even with Satan and his instruments, for all their spite against us, is by doing as much good as we can, wherever we come.

Gurnall.

REJOICING.

When the fens in a man's garden die, yet he can delight in his lands and money. Thus a gracious soul, when the creature fades, can rejoice in the unsearchable, the inalienable and the inexhaustible riches of Christ.

Anon.

REMEDY.

There is no part of our dreadful disease and misery as sinners for which there is not an all-sufficient remedy, in the perfections which Jesus possesses, and the offices he sustains for the salvation of his church.

Venn.

REVELATION.

I am no more surprised that some revealed truths should amaze my understanding, than that the blazing sun should dazzle my eyes.

Hervey.

REVILERS.

If a man strike his hand upon the point of a spear, he hurts not the spear, but his hand : or if he spurn at a stone, he hurts not the stone, but his foot. So is it with the despisers of Christ, and the revilers of his gospel.

Parr.

REVIVAL OF RELIGION.

The revival of evangelical religion in a nation is often like a summer-shower ; which does not fall equally, but waters and refreshes one place, and leaves another dry.

Rev. Mr. Sloss (of Nottingham) in conversation, Dec. 18, 1769.

RICHES.

If riches have been your idol, hoarded up in your coffers, or lavished out upon yourselves, they will, when the day of reckoning comes, be like the garment of pitch and brimstone which is put on the criminal condemned to the flames.

Hervey.

"I cannot be poor," saith Bernard, "so long as God is rich ; for all his riches are mine.

Cripple-gate Lectures.

RICHES AND POVERTY.

Are you rich ? If you die unconverted you will be damned.—Are you poor ? If you are converted you are truly rich.—A poor man without grace is twice poor, and completely miserable : a rich man who is a believer hath a double portion.

Anon.

RIGHTEOUS OVERMUCH.

This is properly to be righteous overmuch, when we pretend to correct God's law, and add supplements of our own to his rule.

Gurnall.

SABBATH.

Make the Sabbath the market-day for thy soul.

Sunday is not a day to feast our bodies, but our souls.

SAINTS IMPERFECT.

Learn to distinguish between pride in a duty, and a proud duty ; between hypocrisy or formality in a person, and a hypocrite or a formalist ; between wine in a man and a man in wine. The best of saints have the stirrings of such corruptions in them, and a mixture of them in their services : these foul birds will light upon an Abraham's sacrifice. God beholds them as the weaknesses of thy sickly state here below : and pities thee, O believer, as thou wouldst pity thy lame child.

Gurnall.

SALVATION.

The grand controversy between corrupt nature and Almighty God, is not whether any or all of the human race shall be saved ; but who shall have the glory of salvation ascribed to him ? God or the creature ? The pride of man prompts him to say, "the glory of salvation is due to me ; for I save myself." But the great Jehovah justly challenges the glory of salvation to himself and says, "I will have all the glory thereof ; for it is by my sovereign and efficacious grace that men are saved."

Mr. Sladen.

Is it possible for us to imagine that Christ came into the world at random, that he died at sixes and sevens, and that the efficacy of what he did and suffered depends on a peradventure ? No, he died for elect persons ; and all shall be saved for whom he died. Was the business [of salvation] suspended on the will of man or of the devil, not a single soul would ever get to heaven.

Mr. Madan, in conversation, July 18, 1769.

You may as well think of adding whiteness to snow, or brightness to the sun, as of adding any thing to the merit of Christ's perfect atonement, consummate righteousness and finished salvation.

Rev. Mr. Townshend, Nov. 8, 1769.

The souls of the elect were saved upon trust for four thousand years. The Father gave credit to Christ, and glorified his saints, on the footing of a sacrifice not then offered up, and of a righteousness not then wrought. Christ also, in the days of his flesh, went on credit with his Father every time he said to a sinner, "Thy sins are forgiven thee," previous to his offering himself on the cross. Mr. Ryland, July 11.

SATAN.

Against whom doth Satan multiply his malicious assaults? Against those in whom God hath multiplied his graces. Satan is too crafty a pirate to attack an empty vessel: he seeks to rob those vessels only which are richly laden. Bp. Cooper.

If Satan cannot please a sinner with his naked state of profaneness; he will endeavour to put him off with something like grace, with a pharisaical profession, and a pharisaical round of duties; such as shall neither benefit the sinner, nor do Satan any hurt. Too many are persuaded to sit down content with this; like children that cry for a knife or a dagger; and are as well pleased with a bone knife, or a wooden dagger, as with the best of all. Gurnall.

Many have yielded to go a mile with Satan, who never intended to go with him twain; but, when once on the way with him, have been inveigled further and further, until they know not how to leave him. Thus he leads poor creatures down into the depths of sin by winding stairs, so that they see not the bottom and end of that to which they are going. ibid.

Satan's temptations on Christ were like the motions of a serpent on a rock (Prov. xxx. 19.); which make no impression, and leave no dent nor trace behind them. But on us they are as the motions of a serpent on sand or dust: they make a print and leave a stain on the imagination at least, if not on the heart. ibid.

There were two remarkable periods in Christ's life, his intrat, and his exit; his entrance into his public ministry, upon his baptism, and his departure out of life by crucifixion. At both seasons we find the devil most fiercely encountering him. The more public thy place, O Christian! and the more eminent thy services for God, the more thou mayest expect the grand adversary will plot against thee. ibid.

When a Christian is about some notable enterprise for God's glory, then will Satan lie like a serpent in the way, or as an adder in the path, to bite the horse's heels, that the rider may fall backward. ibid.

If thou wouldest be guarded from Satan as a troubler, take heed of him as a seducer. The haft of Satan's hatchet (with which he chops at the Christian's comfort), is made of the Christian's wood. First he tempts to sin, and then for it. ibid.

When the coat of a saint is cleanest, the devil is most desirous to roll him in the mire. Gurnall.

Beware of yielding to Satan's motions. A saint's flesh heals not so easily as others. ibid.

Satan is never likely to do more mischief than when he puts on Samuel's mantle. ibid.

There are three kinds of straits wherein Satan aims to entrap the believer; nice questions, obscure Scriptures, and dark providences. ibid.

Many saints are troubled with blasphemous and atheistical suggestions, so sily conveyed into their bosom that they begin to fear such motions could never have risen there, if they were not natives of the heart; whereas, indeed, the cup was of Satan's own putting into the sack. The Christian thinks that these are his sin, as well as his burden; but I can tell him of a greater sin than all Satan's suggestions put together, and that is, when they make the believer doubt whether he is a child of God, because harassed by Satan. ibid.

Satan knows that an arrow out of God's quiver wounds the believer deep; and, therefore, when he accuses, he comes sometimes in God's name. He forges a letter; he, as it were, counterfeits God's hand; and then gives the writing to a poor disconsolate child of God, threatening him with banishment from his father's house, and loss of his inheritance. The Christian, conscious of his unworthiness, weakness, and many miscarriages, takes it all for gospel; sets himself down for an alien and an outcast; and builds to himself a prison of real distress, on false imaginary ground. ibid.

Endeavour to deal with Satan's base suggestions as you used to serve those vagrants and rogues that come about the country; though you cannot keep them from passing through the town, yet you take care not to let them settle there, but whip them and send them to their own home. ibid.

When you find your sins so represented and aggravated to you as exceeding either the mercy of God's nature, or the grace of his covenant, or the merit of Christ's blood, or the power of his Spirit; hic se aperit diabolus, you may be assured that this comes from hell and not from heaven; you may know where it was minted. It is one of the devil's lies. ibid.

So also as to the willingness of God to save you. If you think that the Lord is indeed good and gracious, but not for so great a sinner as you; that he is strong and powerful, but not to save you; know most assuredly, that this is one of Satan's false whispers. Answer them with "Get thee hence, thy speech betrayeth thee." ibid.

Satan is very busy with all good men; especially with ministers; he desired to have Peter in his hands; he buffeted the apostle Paul; he levels his arrows at those that are the most fruitful, flourishing, and useful; as the archers that shot at Joseph, that fruitful bough, by a well, and grieved him; though his bow abode in strength, the arms of his hands being made strong by the mighty God of Jacob. Dr. Gill.

The sinner is the devil's miller, always grinding; and the devil is always filling the hopper, that the mill may not stand still.

SANCTIFICATION.

We were abominably filthy in the eye of God. He entered into covenant with his powerful and gracious Spirit, concerning our sanctification; a spirit who meets us in all our forms of misery, with all possible ways and modes of mercy. Mr. Ryland.

There is an internal dignity in sanctification which is attended with a satisfaction, fortitude, and greatness of mind which the wicked know nothing of. Anon.

A sanctified heart is better than a silver tongue. Dyer.

The greater our satisfaction is, the more advanced we are in holiness, the more we shall feel our need of free justification.

Mr. Hitchen, in conversation, July 18.

This is sound religion; to bottom all only upon the everlasting mountains of God's love and grace in Christ, and to live continually in the sight of Christ's infinite righteousness and merits. They are sanctifying; without them the heart is carnal. Wilcox.

Labour after sanctification to thy utmost: but make not a Christ of it to save thee. Christ's infinite satisfaction, not thy sanctification, must be thy justification before God. ibid.

SEAT OF GRACE.

The heart of a true Christian is always the seat of grace, though he may not always be actually able to discern it. A sun-dial is a sun-dial; and the characters are strongly marked upon it; though we cannot see which way it points, but when the sun shines upon it. Ascribed to Mr. Gwennap.

SECOND CAUSES.

God hides himself and his providence behind second causes.

Ascribed to Mr. Rollin.

SELF

All temptations, all Satan's advantages, and most of our own complainings, are laid in self-righteousness and self-excellency.—God pursueth these by setting Satan upon thee as Laban pursued Jacob for his images. These must be torn from thee, how unwill-ling soever thou art. These hinder Christ from coming in; and until Christ come in guilt will not go out. Wilcox.

Self is the principle, motive, or end, of every action done by a natural man.

Dr. Gifford, in conversation, July 14, 1769.

If I could but be master of that household, myself, my own, mine; my own wit, will, credit, and ease; how blessed were I! Alas, we have more need to be redeemed from ourselves than from the devil and the world. Rutherford.

The honey that you suck from your own righteousness will turn into gall; and the light which you take from this to walk by will darken into black night upon the soul. Wilcox.

Many who have escaped the rocks of gross sin have been cast away on the sands of self-righteousness. Dyer.

God taught our first parents to make coats to cover their naked bodies: but it was the devil that taught their posterity to weave false coverings of their own, to hide the nakedness of their souls. Gurnall.

When thou believest and comest to Christ, thou must leave thy own righteousness behind thee, and bring nothing with thee but thy sins. You must leave behind all your holiness, duties, humblings, &c., and bring nothing but your wants and miseries; else Christ is not fit for thee, nor thou for Christ. Anon.

A disposition to establish our own righteousness [as a ground, cause or condition of our acceptance with God], is a weed that naturally grows in every man's heart. Anon.

Some people, it is to be feared, follow the gospel, as a shark follows a ship;—for a dinner. Dr. Madan, Dec. 25, 1769.

SENSE OF SIN.

The sense of your own sin, manifested by the law, will excite in you an intense desire to live to God who took pity on your deformity; who loved you when not one single feature of comeliness was about you; and loves you still, though much depravity is remaining in you. Venn.

SERVANT OF GOD.

The greatest and truest nobility is to be a servant of the great God. He is nobly descended who is born from above. Dyer.

SERVICE.

In all the duties which God requires of a believer, the strength of Christ is made perfect in the weakness of him that is to do them. Christ does not call off believers from doing, but takes away the heaviness and task. The service of Christ is a yoke and a burden to any person who attempts to perform it without Christ, and to carry all by himself; but the yoke and burden are both light and easy when Christ bears the weight of them. Crisp.

SHAME.

Many stop short of heaven because they are ashamed to go thither in a fool's coat; for believers are always fools in the world's account. Gurnall.

SIGHT OF CHRIST.

Our senses have their happiness as well as our souls; and in heaven, after the resurrection, we shall have a glorified eye as well as glorified minds. Many out of curiosity desired to see Christ, in the days of his flesh; and some choice apostles were admitted to see him at his transfiguration. But, hereafter, it shall be the common privilege of all the faithful. They shall then see him, of whom they have heard so much, and of whose goodness they have tasted, and whose laws they have obeyed, and on whose merits they have depended. Manton.

SIN

If our sins lie heavy at our hearts God will not lay them to our charge. Case.

Nothing can hurt us but sin; and that shall not hurt us if we can repent of it. Dodd.

The word, sacraments, and prayer, do indeed weaken sin, but only death kills it. ibid.

Every sin is an imitation of the devil, and creates a kind of hell in the heart. Hervey.

No sin can be little; because there is no little God to sin against. Brookes.

No sin can be little, because it is committed against the great God of heaven and earth. To commit little sins the sinner must find out a little God. Bunyan.

I cannot commit sin, but I must set my foot on the law of my Maker. I cannot gratify my lusts, but I must go over my bleeding Saviour. Therefore away, foul tempter: I hate both thee and thy motions. Gurnall.

My friend, Mr. William Mason, lately told me that, on seeing a tree which had been lately felled, he observed a number of young shoots springing up from the root; which reminded him of the body of sin in a believer being cut down and destroyed by grace; yet while the root remains within, corruptions will be continually sprouting, until we get home to glory.

While we are under the law, and have no better help, sin reigns in us: the law cannot bridle it in. But when we come under grace by Christ, the dominion of sin, which the law cannot restrain, is captivated and subjected by Christ. I will subdue your iniquities, as it is spoken by the prophet Micah. Crisp.

If God's people fall at any time into sin, it is not while they are eying the perfection of Christ's righteousness, but when they lose sight of it. Mr. Miller, in conversation with me, June 20, 1769.

When Satan charges sin upon the conscience, then for the soul to charge it upon Christ, this is gospel-like. Christ serves for this very end. Wilcox.

Those sins shall never make a hell for us which have been a hell to us. Dyer.

Sin has brought many a believer into suffering; and suffering has kept many a believer from sinning. ibid.

Though it is impossible for a true believer so to sin as to fall into hell, yet wilful sin will bring a hell into his heart.

Mr. Madan, June 21, 1769.

It is not possible that any Antinomian can be a truly converted person; for a man cannot be truly converted without having been first divinely awakened, and no man can be divinely awakened without feeling the evil and bitterness of sin. ibid.

As a thorn in the hedge is a fence, but an offence in the midst of a garden, so sin in the memory may do well to (humble us and) keep us from relapsing; but is a grievance in the conscience. Hence Austiu, after he had received assurance of his forgiveness, blessed God that he could now call his sins to mind, without being affrighted at them. Arrowsmith.

The old ashes of the sins of my youth are now fire of sorrow to me. I have seen the devil, as it were, dead and buried, and yet rise again and be a worse devil than ever he was. Rutherford.

SINNER.

If you have to do with a stupid, hardened, unawakened sinner, set the terrors of the law before him without mercy; endeavour by corrosives to eat down the proud flesh of his heart. But when you meet with a sinner whose soul is pierced, humbled, and touched to the quick with a pungent sense of sin, set before him the love and tenderness, the blood and righteousness, of the compassionate and almighty Jesus. Nothing but the balm of Gilead and the lenitives of the gospel belong to such a person.

Madan, in conversation, July 18, 1769.

Whom did Christ die for? For sinners. For the greatest sinners. For the chiefest of sinners. A dying Christ for a denying Peter! A crucified Christ for a crucified thief! Mrs. Sarah Weight.

SINCERITY.

If a person was to attend the levee of an earthly prince every court day, and pay his obeisance punctually and respectfully, but at other times speak and act in opposition to his sovereign, the king would justly deem such a one a hypocrite and an enemy. Nor will a solemn and stated attendance on the means of grace in the house of God prove us to be God's children and friends if we confine our religion to the church walls, and do not devote our lips and lives to the glory of that Saviour we profess to love.

Rowland Hill, Aug. 30, 1775.

Sincerity in a man's professing that which is agreeable to the real sentiments of his mind is certainly a very laudable thing, but it can never take away the guilt of a man's not conforming the sentiments of his mind to the objective, revealed truth.

Dr. Gill.

Our fear commonly meets us at that door by which we think to run from it. He that will save his life shall lose it. As you love your peace, Christians, be plain-hearted with God and man: keep the king's highway, the plain, honest way of God's commands and Christ's doctrines.

Gurnall.

Either take Christ into your lives or cast him out of your lips.

Dyer.

SIMILARITY.

As the Holy Ghost is first a sanctifier and then a comforter, so, on the other hand, Satan is first a tempter and then a troubler: when he has seduced he falls to accusing.

SIMPLICITY.

It is one thing to be child-like, another to be childish.

A Saying of the late Rev. Mr. Thomas Jones.

SYMPATHY.

As in two strings of an instrument rightly tuned, if one string be touched the other trembles, so if one believer suffer the rest suffer with him.

Mr. Jenkins.

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE.

I am particularly delighted with such social interviews as serve to enlarge our knowledge and refine our affections; such as have an apparent tendency to render us more useful in our present stations, and to ripen us for future happiness. This is a feast of reason, a feast of truth, and, I must own, has charms for me infinitely superior to all the impertinent amusements of modish chat, or the mean gratifications of the bottle.

SOCINIAN.

Let the judgment of charity enjoy its true latitude; but, for my part, I would not for a thousand worlds have a Socinian's account to give at the end of this.

Arrowsmith.

SOUL.

If your bones were broken, or you were brought to death's door by the force of some violent disease, you would seek out for the best advice. If your wives were in hard labour; if the children were come to the birth, and there was not strength to bring forth, you would not spare to ride for the most experienced midwife. O be as prudent and careful for the salvation of your souls, which endure for ever, as you are for the life of your bodies, which is but as a vapour!

Mr. Hervey.

When nobility stoops to the office of teaching, nothing of less dignity than the heir of a kingdom must be the scholar. How, then, shall we fully conceive the excellency of the soul, which has the Spirit of God for its appointed teacher and continual guide!

Venn.

Whatever it be, except the soul, that you are careful about, it has still this most degrading circumstance attending it: it has the condition only of an annuity for life; each successive year makes a considerable decrease in its value; and at death the whole is at an end for ever.

ibid.

Sick persons are often sent by physicians to their native soil that they may again breathe their original air they drew when born at first. The spirit of man was first breathed into him by the Father of spirits, and heaven is the believer's native place; nor can sick souls be cured until God is enjoyed and heaven in him.

Arrowsmith.

Our souls were at first fashioned after the image of God, and nothing short of him who is styled The brightness of his Father's glory and the express image of his person can replenish them. Just as when there is a curious impression left upon wax, nothing can adequately fill the dimensions and lineaments of it but the very seal that stamped it.

ibid.

God would not rest from his works of creation until man was framed; nor can man rest from his longing desires of indigence until God is possessed.

ibid.

None can render our souls happy but God who made them, nor can give satisfaction to them but Christ who gave satisfaction for them.

ibid.

As soon may a trunk be filled with wisdom as a soul with wealth; and as soon might bodily substances be nourished with shadows as rational spirits be fed with bodies.

ibid.

Other things may cumber the mind; only the knowledge and love of God in Christ can content it.

ibid.

The motion of immortal souls is, like that of the celestial bodies, purely circular they rest not without returning back to the same point whence they issued, which is the bosom of God himself.

ibid.

SORROW.

Sorrow, and all the extravagant forms of it, are forbidden. Even Seneca, the heathen, may shame us out of such a conduct, who, having some notion of the immortality of the soul, though not of the body's resurrection, expresses himself thus in a consolatory letter to Lucilius, occasioned by the death of his friend Flaccus: "The thought of deceased friends is sweet and pleasant to me; for I have enjoyed them as one that was about to lose them, and I have lost them as one that may have them again."

Dr. Gill.

Horrible dread is sometimes preparatory to evangelical sorrow, as austere John went before meek Jesus; but yet, the more and greater the terrors are, the less is the genuine sorrow for sin while they remain. As John went down when Christ went up; as his increase was John's decrease; so, as truly godly sorrow goes up, their terrors go down. As the wind gathers the clouds, but those clouds seldom melt into a set rain till the wind falls that gathered them; so these terrors raise the clouds of our sins in our consciences, but when we melt into godly sorrow the storm begins to be laid. And, indeed, as boisterous winds blow away the rain, so these legal terrors keep off the soul from this gospel sorrow. While the soul is making an outcry, "I am damned, I am damned," it is so much taken up with the fear of hell that sin, as sin (which is the proper object of godly mourning), is little looked on or mourned for. A murderer, condemned to die, is so possessed with dread of death and the gallows that it may be the slain body dies before him unlamented; but when his pardon is brought, then he can bestow tears freely on his murdered friend. They shall look on him whom they have pierced, and mourn.

Gurnall.

A true Christian by his godly sorrow shews himself a conqueror of that sin by which he was overcome; while the hypocrite by his pride shews himself a slave to a worse lust than that he exclaims against. While a Christian commits a sin he hates it, whereas a hypocrite loves it while he forbears it.

Anon.

SPIRIT OF GOD.

A man must have the Spirit of God before he can have true faith; for the Spirit does not first find faith in us and then come himself to us, but he first cometh himself to us and then worketh faith in us. So that he that believes must needs have the Spirit; for unless he had the Spirit he could not believe.

Bp. Beveridge.

Where the Spirit of God is, there is the spring of goodness, whence the streams of goodness must needs flow. So that he who sayeth a man may believe and yet not have the Spirit, or that a man may have the Spirit in him, and yet good works not be performed by him, [says what] cannot be; for in that he (the Holy Ghost) is a Spirit, he is an active principle, always doing; and in that he is the Spirit of God, he is a holy principle, and therefore must always be doing good.

Bp. Beveridge.

Observe some beautiful and copious river. How it exhilarates the country and fructifies the soil through which it passes. Bestows a thousand conveniences, and gives birth to a thousand delights. So the Comforter, dwelling in the heart, gives such charming views of Christ and his unsearchable riches as gladden the conscience and make us truly happy. Hence, as from an inexhaustible source, true holiness flows and every spiritual good. This will raise our desires far above earthly, sensual, transitory things, even as David's thoughts were raised far above the shepherd's scrip when he sat exalted on the throne of Israel.

Hervey.

Was it possible for an unregenerate sinner to die, go to hell for a time, and return to the world again, he would continue after his return as great a sinner and as great a lover of sin as he was before. And why so? Because affliction, death, and hell itself cannot work a saving change on the soul of man. Nothing can renew us till God takes our hearts into his own hand, and converts us by the efficacious grace of his invincible Spirit.

Mr. Ryland, of Northampton, in conversation, June 22, 1769.

The Spirit of God can convert men without the Bible; but the Bible cannot convert without the Spirit.

Mr. Shirley, in conversation, at Trevecka, this day, Aug. 29, 1776.

Whence must fire descend to thaw the iciness of the heart but from heaven? The Holy Spirit must breathe upon the soul (as the prophet stretched himself upon the dead child), and then the soul will come to some kindly warmth and heavenly heat in its affections. He helps us to those sighs and groans which fill the sails of prayer.

Anon.

While the opening of the prison to them that are bound is proclaimed in the gospel, the Spirit of God comes to the prison-door, opens it, goes to the prisoner, and by the power of his grace makes his chains fall off.

Boston.

Let men tear and tire themselves night and day with a multitude of prayers, yet if a work of the Spirit of God, in teaching the nature and guilt of unbelief, the nature, efficacy, and use of faith in Christ Jesus, go not with it, all will be lost and come to nothing.

Dr. Owen.

The Spirit will not take a believer and lead him by the hand and set him into the way (as a friend doth to lead one a mile out of town), and then leave him alone to go the rest of the way by himself; no: but the Spirit will be the companion of the soul to secure it; a conductor to the very harbour and haven itself. Crisp.

It is a privilege of this nation that merchants may have a convoy, a navy royal it may be, to go out with them; but it will hardly come in with them: therefore there is not absolute security in this convoy. But whoever takes Christ hath the Spirit to go in and out before him and with him; to go forth, to come back, to go all the way with him, for he hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. ibid.

SPIRITUAL LIFE.

Sometimes the breathings and desires of the soul are only expressed by sighs and groans. Yet these are signs of spiritual life. If a man groans it is plain he is alive.

SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS.

Abraham might give Ishmael a bottle of milk, but Isaac had the inheritance. Dyer.

STABILITY.

Though you get strokes and frowns from your Lord, yet believe his love more than your own feeling. The world can take nothing from you that is truly your's; and death itself can do you no hurt. It is not your rock that ebbs and flows, but your sea. Rutherford.

SUBMISSION.

In vain ye bow your knees at the name of Jesus, unless your souls bow [and submit] to his righteousness. Mr. Jenks.

SUFFERINGS.

Oh how sweet are sufferings for Christ! God forgive them that raise an ill report on the sweet cross of Christ. Our weak and dim eyes look only to the black side of the cross; and this occasions our mistakes concerning it. They that can take it cheerfully on their backs shall find it just such a burden as wings to a bird or sails to a ship. Rutherford.

Christ is strong, even when lying in the dust, in prison and in banishment. Losses and disgraces are the wheels of Christ's triumphant chariot. In the sufferings of his saints he intends his own glory and their good; this is the two-fold mark he aims at, and he does not shoot at random, but always touches the point he purposeth to hit. ibid.

Sufferings are comfortable when they overtake us in the way of duty. Manton.

There is as much difference between the sufferings of the saints and those of the ungodly as there is between the cords with which an executioner pinions a condemned malefactor and the bandages wherewith a tender surgeon binds his patient. The design of the one is to kill; of the other to cure. Believers undergo many crosses, but no curses. Arrowsmith.

SUPPLIES.

Every son and daughter of God shall be provided for. Anon.

Whither should we go for water, but to the spring? Whither should we go for strength, but to the fountain of strength? Is it not a derogation from Christ that, when all fulness is in him alone, we should forsake the fountain of fulness, to go unto broken cisterns that will hold no water? Mark it well: as often as ever you run to any creature, in any necessity of exigence, either before you go to Christ, or instead of going to Christ; so often you rob Christ of that pre-eminence which God hath given him, and we should pay him. Crisp.

SUPPORT.

A child of God may be cast down, but he cannot be cast off.

Dr. Gifford, in preaching, London, Dec. 24, 1775.

God's people are never in a more thriving state of soul than when they are carrying the cross. It is the delight of the Holy Spirit to pull down the pride of self, and to build up the glory of free grace. The lightest feather of affliction that can be laid on the back of our patience will break us down, if God's Spirit is not by to support us. Christ's righteousness is the only worthiness of a sinner. Go to him every moment, as a poor sinner to a rich Saviour. I hope it will be my prayer, when I come to die (and I am sure it will, if I am then in my senses), God be merciful to me a sinner.

Mr. Romaine in his Sermon (on 2 Thess. i. 11, 12.) this Evening, January 7, 1776, at St. Dunstan's.

TEMPTATIONS.

Temptations should send a saint to his castle, as the sight of a dog frightens the rabbit to her burrow. Gurnall.

If you would not fall into sin, do not walk or sit by the door of temptation. Naomi sent her daughter to lie at Boaz's feet; well knowing that, if he endured her there, there would be hope of his taking her to his bed at last. If a Christian permits a sinful object to come too near him, Satan is in a fair way of gaining all he wants. ibid.

No sooner is the new creature born, no sooner is a sinner converted, than the old dragon throws out a flood of temptation after him. ibid.

Well may God suffer thee to lose thy locks, when thou darest wilfully to lay thy head in the lap of temptation. Gurnall.

When a founder has cast his bell, he does not presently fix it up in the steeple; but first tries it with his hammer, and beats it on every side, to see if there be any flaw in it.

Christ doth not, presently after he has converted a man, convey him to heaven; but suffers him first to be beaten upon by many temptations, and then exalts him to his crown. Arrowsmith.

Temptation is the fire that brings up the scum of the heart. Boston.

Put a low value on the world's clay, and put a high value on Christ. Temptations will come; but if you do not make them welcome, they will turn to your advantage. Rutherford.

TEMPERS.

Saints are not always so meek as they ought: "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall," said the apostle to the high priest. But, as they draw nearer to heaven, their tempers are generally more heavenly: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," said dying Stephen.

Mr. S. Wilkes, Dec. 23, 1769

TEMPORAL MERCIES.

Bread, and all other outward mercies a man may receive from an angry God: whereas pardon of sin never cometh but from favour and special love. Arrowsmith.

TEMPORIZING.

He is a bad Christian who cuts the coat of his profession according to the fashion of the times, or the humour of the company he falls into. Gurnall.

TERRORS.

Many persons have been overwhelmed with hurtful terrors, and led to pass sentence on themselves, as though they were concluded in unbelief, and without Christ in the world, at the very time they were seeking his help and grace, and consequently, in the Scripture sense of the word, were true and sincere believers. Anon.

THOUGHT.

One thought of Jesus Christ, reaching the heart, is more to be valued than all creature-contentments whatsoever, though they should be enjoyed in their fullness for a thousand years, without interruption.

Mr. Thomas Ball, in Clarke's Lives.

TIME.

O, how little is your hand-breadth and span-length of days here! your inch of time is less than when you and I parted.

Eternity is coming, posting on with wings: then shall every man's blacks and whites be brought to light. Rutherford.

TITLE TO HEAVEN

From justification arises our title to heaven; from sanctification arises our meetness for it. A king's son is heir apparent to his father's crown. We will suppose the young prince to be educated with all the advantages, and to be possessor of all the attainments, that are necessary to constitute a complete monarch. His accomplishments, however great, do not entitle him to the kingdom; they only qualify him for it: so the holiness and obedience of the saints are no part of that right on which their claim to glory is founded, or for which it is given; but a part of that spiritual education, whereby they are fitted and made meet to inherit the kingdom prepared for them before the foundation of the world. Madan.

TRANSPLANTATION.

None are transplanted into the paradise above but from the nursery of grace below.

TRANSGRESSIONS.

God blotteth out transgressions, aggravated and innumerable, as easily and as completely as the wind sweeps away a floating cloud from the face of the sky, Isa. xlv. 22. Hérvéy.

TRIALS.

Suppose, Christian, the furnace be seven times hotter; it is but to make you seven times better.—Fiery trials make golden Christians. Dyer.

I never had in all my life so great an inlet into the word of God as now [viz. as during his twelve years imprisonment]: insomuch that I have often said, "Were it lawful, I could pray for greater trouble, for the greater comfort's sake." Bunyan.

When Abraham's knife was at Isaac's throat, God provided a ram for a burnt offering. And in all trouble, the Lord will either provide deliverance for his people, or provide strength for them to bear it.

Dr. Gifford, in conversation with me, June 20, 1769.

TRUE GAIN.

We may be losers for God, but we shall never be losers by him. Cripplegate Lect.

TRUST.

I never trusted God, but I found him faithful; nor my own heart, but I found it false. Dyer.

TRUTH.

Truth is the bond of union among saints.

Mr. David Fernice, in conversation.

Sometimes, by the force of truth, the outer door of the understanding is broken up; while the inner door of the will remains fast bolted.

Boston.

Truth does not depend on the power, wisdom, or faithfulness of men: but remains constantly the same, though Peter deny and Judas betray.

Mr. Hitchin, in conversation, Feb. 6. 1770

TRUTH AND ERROR.

Christ compares the errors of the Pharisees to leaven. Why so? Because of its secret mixture with the wholesome bread. You do not make your bread all of leaven; for then none would eat it: but you mingle it skilfully, and by that means both go down together. Thus our Lord intimates that the Pharisees mixt their errors with many truths; and therefore directed them to beware, lest, with the truths, they swallowed the errors also.

UNBELIEF

Unbelief gives a dash to the glory of Christ, but not to our salvation.

Rutherford.

UNCONVERTED.

Whilst thou art unconverted, thy body is but the living coffin of a dead soul. Anon.

UNION TO CHRIST.

Union to Christ may be considered either as secret or open. God's elect had a secret union to Christ, from all eternity: for they were chosen in him before the foundation of the world; and were as early blessed in him with all spiritual blessings; grace was given to them in him, before the world began. On account of this union they were preserved in him, in time, notwithstanding the fall of Adam [for, though they fell from the image of God, they did not fall out of his favour]: they were represented in him and by him, when he was crucified and slain, buried and rose again; whence they are said to be raised up together [with him], and made to sit together, in heavenly places, in Christ Jesus.

Now this secret union to Christ becomes open and manifest in conversion. "I knew a man in Christ," says the apostle, "above fourteen years ago:" meaning himself, who was converted so many years before the time of his then writing. In the same sense are we to understand those words of the same apostle, where he says, that "Andronicus and Junia were in Christ before him: which cannot be said of their election in Christ, and fœderal relation to him; which commenced together. With respect to these things, one person cannot be said to be in Christ before another: but one man may be converted before another, and so appear to be in Christ before the other does; which is what the apostle means. Dr. Gill.

UNIVERSAL REDEMPTION.

Dr. Owen's argument against universal redemption.

"I propose to the universalists this dilemma.

The Father proposed his wrath, due unto, and Christ underwent punishment for, either

All the sins of all men;

Or, all the sins of some men;

Or, some sins of all men.

If the last, then all men have some sins to answer for: and so no man shall be saved.

If the second (which is the proposition we lay down as truth), then Christ, in their stead, suffered for all the sins of all the elect in the whole world. If the first, why are not all freed from the punishment due unto their sins?" You answer, "Because of their unbelief."—I ask, is this unbelief a sin, or not? If not, why should they be punished for it? If it be, then Christ suffered the punishment due unto it, or he did not. If he did, why must that hinder them more than their other sins for which he died? If he did not, then he did not die for all their sins.

Let them [i. e. the Arminians] take which part they please.

From Mr. Sheppard's Abridgment of Dr. Owen's "Death of Death in the Death of Christ."

UNPARDONABLE SIN.

He that fears he has committed the sin against the Holy Ghost may be certain that he has not committed it. Dodd.

UNREGENERATE.

Our hearts, by nature, are like the loadstone, which refuseth gold and pearls, and only attracts rust and iron. Unregenerate people fly from God as if they were afraid of salvation. Cripplegate Lectures.

What wise man would bring fishes out of the water to feed in his meadows? or send his oxen to feed in the sea? As little are the unregenerate meet for heaven, or heaven meet for them. Boston.

An unregenerate man is equally dead to God, whether he be buried in a sink of vice, or under a fair monument of natural virtue.

Count Dohman, in conversation, this day, at Clifton, August 11, 1775.

An unrenewed person, while you please him, resembles the sea-coast at high water: all the filth that lies beneath is concealed by the incumbent tide. But when that same person is tempted, or provoked, he is like the beach at low water: and the rubbish and stones, and dead dogs and cats, become visible presently.

A Remark of my worthy Friend, the late William Lunell, Esq.

UNSETTLEDNESS.

Many are soon engaged in holy duties, and easily persuaded to take up a profession of religion; and as easily persuaded to lay it down: like the new moon, which shines a little in the first part of the night; but is down before half the night is over.

Gurnall.

Seek for an established judgment in the doctrinal truths of God. Some persons are so unsettled that every wind blows them down, like loose tiles from the house-top. Blind zeal is soon put to a shameful retreat; while holy resolution, built on fast principles, lifts up its head like a rock in the midst of the waves.

ibid.

VICISSITUDE.

Christ's children must not expect always to lean upon his bosom. He sometimes sets them down on the cold, frosty side of the hill, and makes them walk, barefooted, upon thorns. Yet does he keep his eye of love upon them all the while.—Our pride must have winter-weather to rot it.

Rutherford.

VOLUNTEERS.

Other sinners serve the Devil for pay; but cursers and swearers are volunteers [who get nothing for their pains]. Boston.

WAITING.

Wait for Christ's appearing. He shall come as certainly as the morning; as refreshing as the rain.

Wilcox.

Wait patiently on God, it is becoming of a dutiful child, when he hath not presently what he writes for to his father, to say, "My father is wiser than I; his own wisdom will tell him what and when to send to me." Oh, Christian! thy heavenly Father hath gracious reasons which hold his hands for the present; or else thou hadst heard from him ere now.

Gurnall.

WATCHFULNESS

A believer's watchfulness is somewhat like that of a soldier on guard. A centinel posted on the walls, when he discovers a hostile party advancing, does not attempt to make head against them himself; but informs his commanding officer of the enemy's approach, and leaves him to take the proper measures to repel the foe. So the Christian does not attempt to fight temptation in his own strength: his watchfulness lies in observing its approach, and in telling God of it by prayer.

Mr. Tozer, in conversation, Dec. 1, 1769.

WALKING.

He that would walk aright must have one eye upward to Jesus Christ and another inward to the corruption of his own nature.

Boston.

WEAKNESS.

It is an advantage, not a discouragement, to be weak in ourselves. When a bucket is empty it can be the better filled out of the ocean.

Manton.

WEAK FAITH.

It may be thou art a poor trembling soul: thy faith is weak, and thy assaults from Satan strong; thy corruptions great, and thy strength little; so that in thy opinion they rather gain ground on thy grace than give ground to it: yea, every now and then thou art apt to dread that thou shalt one day be cast as a wreck on the Devil's shore. And yet to this day thy grace lives. [Thou art still longing, panting, desiring, wishing, and groaning for God.] Is it not worth while to turn and see this strange sight? A broken ship with masts and hull rent and torn, full of leaks, yet towed along by almighty power, through a tempestuous sea (nor tempestuous only, but thick set with armadas of sins, afflictions, doubts, and temptations), safely into God's harbour! To see a poor rush candle in the face of the boisterous winds, and liable to the frequent dashes of quenching waves, yet not blown out! In a word, to see a weak stripling in grace held up in God's arms until all enemies are under his feet! This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.

Gurnall.

It is from the devil that weak Christians make a rack to themselves of the attainments of the strong; and to yield to this temptation is as unreasonable as for a child to dispute away his relation to his father because he is not of the same stature with his elder brethren.

Boston.

A soul may truly go to Christ, though with a trembling heart; and may truly receive Christ, though with a trembling hand.

Pike's and Hayward's cases of conscience.

God may sometimes communicate less of his assisting strength, that he may shew the more of his supporting strength in upholding weak grace.

Gurnall.

WEALTH.

Oh, that ever so rich an heiress as the soul of man should run away with so servile a thing as money is, or give the least consent to a match so far below her birth and breeding!

Arrowsmith.

Wealth is an accessory good, but no necessary blessing. A Christian may be completely happy without it

ibid.

Wealth and worldly possessions are often a hurt and sore pull-back to Christian professors: like some soldiers who, when they once meet with a rich booty at the sacking of some town, are spoiled for fighting ever after.

Gurnall.

WEEPING.

Christ suffers his loving and beloved people to weep; because there is nothing better in this life than a heart afflicted for the sake of Christ: nor does any thing prepare us more for the visitations and graces of our blessed Saviour, than those tears which flow from our grief at the heavenly bridegroom's absence, and from our ardent desire to possess him.

Mons. Quesnel.

WICKED MEN.

The wicked dwell more on the faults of God's children than on their graces: as the flies settle on a sore place; and as vultures fly over the gardens of delight, to pitch on a carrion.

Dr. Manton.

We should not be with wicked men as their companions, but physicians.

WISDOM

Take God into thy counsel. Heaven overlooks hell.

Gurnall.

Among men, a little science will make a great shew: but he only is wise in God's esteem who is wise unto salvation.

Arrowsmith.

WISH.

Seeing the saints must have a Devil to keep them waking, I wish for a troublesome Devil, rather than for a secure and sleepy one.

Rutherford.

WORKS IN PART.

What grosser contradiction can you conceive than to confess yourself guilty, and to implore pardon, while at the same time, you cherish a hope of being favourably regarded on your own account? For to implore pardon implies that you lie at the feet of mercy without any plea, but what is entirely drawn from God himself: whereas to trust in your own obedience or virtue, as a co-adjutor with Christ, certainly implies a very high degree of worth in what proceeds from yourself.

Venn.

According to this scheme [viz. of acceptance with God on the footing of works in part], you make the glorious Redeemer undertake our ransom only to render our deficient duties meritorious, and our sins inoffensive. You make his sinless life, his meritorious death, and his mediatorial undertakings, serve no other purpose than that of a mere pedestal, on which human worth may stand exalted, and appear what it is not. According to this scheme, the pardon of rebels against the Most High, and the reception of leprous sinners into the bosom of heaven, are owing to the works of our own hands, and to the virtues of our own character, in conjunction with Christ. Now what greater affront can be offered to that divine goodness which interposed to save us when we were lost, than thus to divide the cause [of our justification and salvation] between Christ and ourselves.

ibid.

WORKS BEFORE GRACE.

We are apt to suppose that God is such a one as ourselves. If we wish to enjoy the patronage of a great man, we very naturally think we must say or do something that may acquire his esteem and recommend us to his notice. Thus would we also treat with God: when alas! the plain truth is, we can have, and say, and do nothing that he approves, until he himself gives it of his free grace and works it in us by his Spirit.

Col. Gallatin, Oct. 19, 1769.

WORLD.

I could not help being affected with that noble passage in a Christian writer; "If all the enjoyments in the world were to be sold together in one lot, they would not be worth even the labour of a man's opening his mouth to say, I will not buy them."

Arrowsmith.

Time was when Satan shewed our Saviour all the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them. Oh, Christian! if ever the world appear to thee temptingly glorious, suspect it for one of Satan's discoveries.

ibid.

As for those saints whose wings are still somewhat clogged with the bird-lime of the world, let them consider how ill it becomes the offspring of heaven to go licking up the dust of this earth; the woman's seed to content itself with the food of the serpent.

ibid.

The creatures, like deceitful streams, frustrate the thirsty traveller's expectation. They delude us (like the monument of Semiramis) with many a promising motto, as if they would give us peace and ease of heart: but when we come to look within, instead of contentment, they afford us nothing but conviction of our folly in expecting satisfaction from them or from any thing short of God.

ibid.

As Jonah's gourd withered in the morning, when he hoped for most benefit by it against the ensuing heat of the day; so the blessings of this world frequently wither, when we expect to find most freshness in them, and to receive most refreshment from them. Arrowsmith.

We must not expect more from any thing than God hath put into it. He never intended to put the virtue of soul-satisfying into any mere creature: but hath reserved to himself, Son and Spirit, the power of satisfying the souls of men, of contenting and making them happy, as a principal branch of his own divine prerogative. To such as expect it elsewhere, that person or thing they rely upon, may say to them as Jacob to Rachel, Am I in God's stead. ibid.

When the worldly-wise have dived into the bottom of nature's sea, instead of coming up laden with pearls of price, they return with nothing but handfulls of shells and gravel. ibid.

The two sons of the first man carried in their names a memorandum of what they and their posterity were to expect. Cain signifies possession, and Abel signifies vanity or emptiness. All worldly possessions are at once empty and vanishing; unsatisfactory while they continue, and liable to a speedy decay. ibid.

As when an army of men come to drink at some mighty river, there is no want, but all go satisfied away; whereas, had they come to a paltry brook, they would not have found water enough to quench the thirst of each: so created things are narrow brooks, or rather broken cisterns; from which immortal souls cannot but return empty, dissatisfied and disappointed. But Christ hath a river of love and joy and peace, whereof he gives his followers to drink; and drinking whereof they are easy, safe and happy. ibid.

See the vanity of the world, and the consumption that is upon all things; and love nothing but Christ. Wilcox.

The world will be burnt up in the day of Christ's appearance. And why should night-dreams, and day-shadows, and water-froth, and May-flowers, run away with your heart in the mean while? When we come to the water side, and set our foot in the boat, and enter on the river of death, we shall wonder at our past folly. Rutherford.

Earth, earth is what worldly men never think they have enough of, until death comes and stops their mouth with a shovelful of earth digged out of their own grave. Gurnall.

YOUNG CONVERTS.

Glowings of affection are usually wrought in young converts, who are ordinarily made to sing in the day of their youth, Hos. ii. 14. While the fire-edge is upon the young convert, he looks upon others reputed to be godly; and not finding in them such a [lively] temper and disposition as in himself, he is ready to censure them, and to think that there is far less religion in the world than indeed there is. But when his own cup comes to settle below the brim, and he finds that in himself which made him question the state of others, he is more humbled, and feels more and more the necessity of daily recourse to the blood of Christ for pardon, and to the Spirit of Christ for sanctification: and thus grows downwards in humiliation, self-loathing and self-denial. Boston.

ZEAL.

Young zeal, and old knowledge, make that Christian both happy and useful in whom they meet.

Mr. Russell, July 19, 1769.

CHRISTIANITY REVERSED.

OR,

A New Office of Initiation for all Youths of the Superior Class. Being a Summary of LORD CHESTERFIELD'S Creed.

I BELIEVE that this world is the object of my hopes and morals; and that the little prettinesses of life will answer all the ends of human existence.

I believe that we are to succeed in all things, by the graces of civility and attention; that there is no sin but against good manners; and that all religion and virtue consist in outward appearance.

I believe that all women are children, and all men fools; except a few cunning people, who see through the rest, and make their use of them.

I believe that hypocrisy, fornication, and adultery, are within the lines of morality; that a woman may be honourable when she has lost her honour, and virtuous when she has lost her virtue.

This, and whatever else is necessary to obtain my own ends, and bring me into repute, I resolve to follow; and to avoid all moral offences; such as scratching my head before company, spitting upon the floor, and omitting to pick up a lady's fan. And in this persuasion I will persevere, without any regard to the resurrection of the body or the life everlasting. Amen.

Ques. Wilt thou be initiated into these principles?

Ans. That is my inclination.

Ques. Wilt thou keep up to the rules of the Chesterfield morality?

Ans. I will, Lord Chesterfield being my admonisher.

Then the Officiator shall say,
Name this child.

Ans. A fine gentleman.

Then he shall say,

I introduce thee to the world, the flesh, and the devil, that thou mayest triumph over all awkwardness, and grow up in all politeness; that thou mayest be acceptable to the ladies, celebrated for refined breeding, able to speak French and read Italian, invested with some public supernumerary character in a foreign court, get into parliament (perhaps into the privy council), and that, when thou art dead, the letters written to thy bastards may be published in seven editions, for the instruction of all sober families.

"Ye are to take care that this child, when he is of a proper age, be brought to court to be confirmed."

A SKETCH OF MODERN FEMALE EDUCATION

FROM the present mode of female education, one would really imagine that the people of England were Turks, and did not believe that their daughters have souls.

A lady of fashion, if she knows not God, usually brings up a daughter in the following style. Little miss, almost as soon as born, is (it may be) so straightened and pinched up in her dress (under pretence of giving her a fine shape), that her health, and, perhaps, her shape itself, are materially the worse for it during life.

As succeeding weeks and months roll on, her constitution receives still farther detriment by the pernicious kindness of a too delicate and tender method of treatment. The nursery must always be over-heated in order to be well aired. Miss must never be drest nor undrest but before a large fire. Nor have her hands and face washed but in warm milk and water, corrected with elder flowers or with a decoction of tansey. Nor on any pretence be carried, except when the sun shines, out of the house.

At four or five years old she is taught to entertain false ideas of her own importance. Her mamma will not let her be contradicted. If she fall into a passion she must be soothed and humoured; not to say applauded as a child of spirit. If she invents a falsehood, the dear little creature, instead of being punished as she deserves, is kissed and commended for her wit.

By degrees she begins to consider herself as formed of more refined materials, and cast in a more elegant mould, than the generality of other people. She is struck with the love of pomp and equipage. Grows haughty and insolent to the servants. Values herself upon dress, and admires the reflection of her own face in the looking-glass.

At six or seven years of age she looks over her papa and mamma when they play at cards; and miss has some idea of gaming, before she is thoroughly versed in her A. B. C.

In due season the care of her head is committed to a friseur; a Monsieur le Puff, from Paris. Her head-piece is also carefully cultivated by the milliner and the jeweller; who decorate with festoons the pyramid which the friseur has raised.—Perhaps the little pullet (shall I call her, or chicken) suddenly erects herself into a gigantic pea-hen, by tufting the pyramid with plumes half a yard high.

But what is a superb roof without a well furnished front? swayed by this consideration, she begins to pencil her eyebrows, and to assume an artificial complexion. But let her not enamel. Let her also abstain from colouring her neck, her breast, and arms, lest she fall a martyr to white lead, and kill herself in a few months, as some ladies of fashion have done before her. That miss may be thoroughly accomplished from head to foot, the aid of a foreign dancing-master is called in. A French governess teaches her the language of that country, ere she is well mistress of her own, and perhaps poisons her mind with popery into the bargain. An Italian instructs her in the guitar. And a singing-master at least teaches her to squeak, if she cannot sing. She has also to attend her a monster unheard of till now, called a card-tutor, that she may know how to cheat with a genteel grace, when she goes into polite company.

By this time I take for granted she is a perfect adept in several smaller, but not unnecessary embellishments, which the late Lord Chesterfield would have called female graces. Such as to lisp, to mince some words, and to be utterly unable to pronounce some letters, to be extremely near-sighted, to toss the fan with elegance, to manage the snuff-box according to art, to kiss a lap dog with delicacy, to languish with propriety, and be just ready on some occasions to faint away judiciously.

And now for routes, balls, operas, public gardens, masquerades, card-parties, riddos, and theatres. In a word, for every dissipation that can exhaust money, stifle reflection, kill time, gratify the lust of the eye, and feed the pride of life.

Amidst all this profusion, if miss does not inherit what is called a great fortune, she may possibly lie upon hands, and die at last without changing her name. But if she be entitled to an opulent estate, it may sell her to some rake of distinction; and they may live together without quarrelling about three days; and prove faithful to each other for near a week. I mean she may marry a rake of distinction, if she do not previously steal a flying march to Scotland with her father's butler, or valet de chambre, or the friseur above-mentioned. In which case, the disappointed rake of distinction must hunt for a wife elsewhere.

When the young lady becomes a mother, she gives her children an education similar to what she received from her own mamma. And thus the world goes round! Thus do unconverted people tread the same circle one after another! This is their foolishness, and their posterity praise their saying, and walk in the same steps until they drop into hell one by one. Dismal prelude to their meeting each other at Christ's left hand, in the day of judgment!

I should have observed, in its due place, that miss would have been carried within the walls of the church a few weeks after she was born if the clergyman had not been sent for to christen her at home. She would also have gone to church on her wedding-day, but for one or other of the following circumstances. Supposing she takes a trip to Scotland, going to church on the occasion is out of the question.—And if she marry with her parents' consent, it is ten to one but that the ceremony is performed in her mamma's drawing-room, by special license. I must add that she would certainly see the inside of a church once a year (to wit, after every lying-in), if it were not the fashion among people of quality to be chambered instead of churched, by having the thanksgiving-service read in their own respective apartments. And thus perhaps, miss never enters the house of God until, at her interment, she is carried in feet foremost.

IMPORTANT REMARKS.

Is it not strange that many talk of keeping God's commandments, and never remember that this is the commandment of God, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another.

How many think of rearing up a building whose top shall reach heaven itself; and quite forget to lay their foundation upon the rock, Christ Jesus!

What numbers talk of repentance, and never repent of the greatest of all sins, unbelief!

Though it is asserted in Scripture that, by the deeds of the law no flesh shall be justified; yet how many professing Christianity expect to be justified no other way!

Though the intent of the law is to be as a schoolmaster to lead us unto Christ, yet many make no other use of it than to substitute it in the room of Christ.

Though God has given us the righteousness of his Son to be the garment of salvation; yet what multitudes think their own righteousness is much safer to wrap themselves in, and trample the true wedding-robe under their feet!

Though remission of sins is preached through the alone blood of Jesus; yet too many believe their sins shall be remitted by some other means, and thus turn a deaf ear to the gospel sound

Thousands cry Peace, peace, to their own souls, who never obtained peace by Jesus Christ; and think no more of peace through his death than through that of Julius Cæsar. But will such self-assumed peace stand at the bar of God?

Though the scripture saith, That without faith it is impossible to please God; yet many think they shall please him very well without troubling their heads about faith at all, unless it be to speak evil of it.

Though Christ is the wisdom and the power of God, and the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth; yet to many he is nothing but a stumbling-block, and mere foolishness.

Nevertheless, to you that believe, he is precious

THE
CHURCH OF ENGLAND VINDICATED

FROM
THE CHARGE OF ARMINIANISM;

AND
THE CASE OF ARMINIAN SUBSCRIPTION PARTICULARLY CONSIDERED;

IN A LETTER TO THE REV. DR NOWELL,

OCCASIONED BY
SOME PASSAGES IN THAT GENTLEMAN'S ANSWER TO THE AUTHOR OF PIETAS OXONIENSIS.

‘Ita veritati litabo, ne pacem turbem: ita pacem colam, ut nullo tamen eam veritatis dispendio redemptam velim.’
WITSIUS, in Orat. de vero Theol.
 “To be impugned from without, and betrayed from within, is certainly the worst condition a Church can fall into.”
DR. SOUTH.

REVEREND SIR,

HAPPENING to call on a friend of mine, in Westminster, yesterday evening, December 28th, I found him reading your late letter to the author of Pietas Oxoniensis. Curiosity naturally induced me to look into your pamphlet: and grieved I was to find that a person in your eminent station, and of your distinguished abilities, should so far lose sight of the duty you owe to that excellent Church which you would seem to defend, as to brand, for methodistical tenets, some of those capital truths which were the avowed doctrines of our reformers; and which, at this very day, make so distinguished a figure in the unrepealed standards of our national faith.

To vindicate the best of visible Churches from the false charge of Arminianism fastened on her by you, and to prove that the principles commonly (although, perhaps, not so properly) termed Calvinistic, are plainly and repeatedly delivered in the authentic declarations of her belief, were the reasons that chiefly induced me to resolve on the present undertaking. In consequence of which resolution, I took home your pamphlet with me, and have it now before me.

I would premise that the two grand questions on which I shall join issue with you are, 1st, Not so much whether the Calvinistic doctrines are right or wrong in themselves; as whether they are, or are not, the doctrines of the Church of England: and, 2nd, Whether on proof of their actually being the doctrines of our Church, Arminians can, with a safe conscience, and bonâ fide, subscribe to those doctrines ex animo.

As to the affair of the expulsion, I shall enter very little into the merits of that, as not directly falling in with my main design. The injustice, whether real or supposed, shewn to those young men is of very little consequence, when set in competition with the open attack which you, sir, under the habit of a friend, have ventured to make on the Church herself. If it be true that the persons expelled were so treated merely for incapacity, and for holding what either the law or the university statutes deem illicit conventicles; it would indeed follow that the hardship, so generally complained of, was not so great as it might seem at first view. Every society, as such, have, no doubt, an intrinsic right to agree upon such reasonable and lawful rules as they may deem necessary for their own interior government and regulation. And, by virtue of that same right, they may expel such of their members as refuse to adjust their conduct by the rules so enacted. Yet as excommunication (a) is the dernier resource of a Church, and takes place not until all milder expedients for the reformation of the offending party have been tried without effect; so should expulsion from any other society. How far this equitable rule was observed lately at Oxford is a circumstance not yet cleared up by the assessors: and, until it is, the public are certainly at liberty to form what judgment they can from appearances.

It has been affirmed, by some who ought to know, that the pretence of illiteracy and irregularity in the parties expelled was

(a) By our law, sentence of excommunication is not to be pronounced until after public admonition thrice given, with the interval of at least two days between each admonition.

only adopted by way of casting a mist before the eyes of the world: while, in fact, the true reason of their expulsion was their attachment to the doctrines of predestination unto life, regeneration by the Spirit of God, and justification by faith alone. If this was the real cause of that transaction, the young men were persecuted to all intents and purposes; and are to be equally pitied and respected: pitied, for the oppressive treatment they met with; respected, for their firmness in adhering to doctrines which they believe to be true, and which, whether true or not, are the undoubted doctrines of the Church established.—Add to this, that if some persons, equally or more illiterate, and irregular in a much worse sense, continue still unmolested members of this very university, all unprejudiced spectators will cry out,

Dat veniam corvis, vexat censura columbas.

I am not certain, much less dare I to affirm, that the public have hit upon the true cause of this remarkable expulsion. If they have (and even the account given by yourself seems to justify the general belief), we may now, with the utmost truth, adopt the old cry of “the Church is in danger.” (b) Since, for a considerable number of the most eminent persons belonging to one of the most respectable universities in Europe, to sit in judgment on six of their own body, and pass sentence of condemnation upon them, for believing and asserting the leading truths of that very Church with which the expellers, no less than the expelled, profess to agree; is, mutatis mutandis, as if a Romish council should anathematize six Papists for holding transubstantiation; or a Scotch synod should excommunicate six Presbyterians, for maintaining a parity among the clergy to be more apostolical than episcopacy. For gratuitous predestination, justification by faith only, and the efficacy of divine grace in regeneration, are as palpably asserted by the Church of England, as transubstantiation is by the Church of Rome, or parity of ministers by the Church of Scotland.

Before I enter on the proof of this, I must clear my way, by first considering what you, sir, allege on the other side. In doing which, I shall endeavour to preserve, not only the decency, but the respect to which your merits, both as a scholar and as a writer, justly entitle you. Though fame is mistaken, if you have not condescended to act as a secretary on this, as well as a preceding, occasion. However this be, I cannot help wishing that so worthy and considerable a person had drawn his pen rather in attempting to heal than widen the unhappy breaches among us; and had undertaken to vindicate, instead of seeking to confute, the doctrines of the Church he professes to revere. But, alas! every day's experience proves the truth of the old adage; “All is not wise that wise men say; nor all good that good men do.”

“Now sir, to the point. With regard to the doctrines in debate between Calvinists and Arminians, you ingenuously confess that they are matters which “wise and good men have always differed about,” page 69. I applaud your justice, in granting that Calvinists, no less than Arminians, may be “wise and good men:” but I cannot say I admire the want of precision with which you express yourself. Wise and good men did not always differ about those points. There is, on the contrary, the utmost reason to believe that the main body of the Christian Church (in which I do not include the Arians of those times) were unanimous believers of the doctrines now termed Calvinistic, for the four first centuries: until, at the opening of the fifth, a Welsh monk, known by the assumed name of Pelagius, struck out a new path of his own, and laid out the foundations of that mystery of iniquity which has, more or less, been working ever since.

I am aware that some Arminian writers, both English and foreign, have had the assurance (somewhat like the Papists on another occasion) to ask, “Where was the doctrine of predestination before St. Austin?” To which I answer in my turn, where was not the doctrine of predestination before Pelagius? That his opinions, concerning the slight effects of original sin, the power of man's free will, and the possibility of human merit, were novel and unheard of until then, appears, among other circumstances, from the surprise and horror with which they were received by the universal Church. A valuable historian of our own tells us truly, that “To recount the learned works of fathers written; their pious sermons preached; passionate [i. e. pathetic] epistles sent; private conferences entertained; public disputations held; provincial synods summoned; general councils called; wholesome canons made, to confute and condemn these opinions, under the name of Pelagius, or his scholar Celestius; would amount to a volume fitter for a porter's back to bear, than a scholar's brains to peruse.” [Fuller, Church Hist. Cent. v. p. 28.]

The learned Dr. Cave, whom no one will suspect of being a factor for Calvinism, tells us plainly, that Pelagius “Hæresin novam condidit," was the founder of a new heresy, [Hist. Lit. tom. i. ann. 405.] which is as good as to say that the Christian Church were, until that time, in undisturbed possession of the doctrines of grace. The same great man lets us know what the substance of this new heresy was. "Peccatum originale funditus sustulit; docens, Adami peccatum soboli ejus non imputari. Homines, plerosque saltem, non gratiæ divinæ benefici, sed propter operum suorum merita, justificari, et ad vitam æternam prædestinari contendit." He [i. e. Pelagius] took away original sin from its very foundations, by asserting that Adam's transgression is not imputed to his posterity: and insisted that men, or however the greater part of them, are justified and predestinated to eternal life, not by the favour of divine grace, but for the worthiness of their own works. Now if the non-imputation of Adam's offence, and the doctrines of justification and predestination as founded on, and resulting from human worthiness, were parts of the new heresy, it follows that the opposite doctrines of Adam's transgression imputed to his offspring, and justification and predestination by grace alone, must have been branches of the old faith universally held by the Church, for the first 400 years after Christ.

That consummate scholar and historian, Spanheimus the son, treating of Pelagius and his tenets, observes, that this arch-heretic asserted, "Causam predestinationis ad gratiam et gloriam esse prævisionem bonorum operum, et perseverantiam in illis, ex recto liberi arbitrii usu, exceptâ tamen gratiâ apostolatûs. Prædestinationem ad mortem nullam dari; solam dari præscientiam peccatorum." [Intro. ad Hist. et Antiq. Sacr. pag. 454.] i. e. that "The cause of predestination to grace and glory was the foresight of good works, and of perseverance therein, resulting from a right use of our free-will: and that there is no such thing as predestination unto death; but only a fore-knowledge of what sins men would commit." (c) That these are the doctrines of the Arminians now, as they were of Pelagius then, needs no proof. An Arminian laughs at the imputation of Adam's offence, in order to elude the necessity of the Messiah's imputed righteousness: he affirms that we are not justified without works of our own; and that if there be any such thing as predestination at all, it is founded on the divine foresight of certain conditions and qualifications in the persons predestinated: that man's will has the casting vote in the affair of regeneration: and that as he may to-day consent to be a child of God, so, to-morrow he may, by virtue of the same omnipotent free-will, undo all, and commence a child of the devil again. Who sees not that Arminianism is the old Pelagian trump turned up anew? and that the doctrines of conditional grace and precarious salvation which now go down so glib with many, are the very things which at their first appearance frightened the primitive Churches more than a general persecution would have done? It may further be asked; would an Arminian have drawn up the XVIIth Article?

You yourself, sir, seem to have been aware of your mistake, in asserting so pre-emptorily that predestination and its concomitant doctrines are points concerning which "wise and good men have always differed:" since you presently add that they "have been disputed in almost all ages of the Christian church." During the four first ages of it they were undisputed, for aught appears to the contrary; but from the time Pelagius first broke the ice, quite down to the reformation, they certainly were frequent subjects of controversy. The reformers and reformed churches, both here and abroad, were universally on the side of absolute grace, in contradiction both to the pretended merits, and the boasted free agency of man. Witness the authentic and valuable collection of articles and confessions of faith published by Gasper Laurentius, in 1612. With regard to our own reformers in particular, bishop Burnet, though far enough from warping to Calvinism, is yet so honest as to allow that, "In England the first reformers were generally in the Sublapsarian way;" (d) plainly enough intimating that all our first reformers were doctrinal Calvinists, though with some slight variation; the major part of them being Sublapsarians, or holding that God, in the decree of predestination, considered mankind as fallen: the rest of the first reformers having been Supralapsarians, who suppose that men were, in that decree, considered neither as fallen nor as unfallen, but simply as men, in puris naturalibus. A metaphysical disquisition, which still obtains among the

(c) If the reader has a mind to see a compendious, but very satisfactory account of the first rise and progress of Arminianism in Holland (whence the contagion spread into England) about the year 1600, he may consult a very valuable treatise written by the same learned foreigner, entitled, Controversiarum cum Dissidentibus Hodie Christianis, prolixè et cum Judeis, Elenchus Historicus Theologicus. Which, in the compass of a moderate 12mo, traces back all the controversies, which now divide the religious world, to their original sources; gives the quintessence of the arguments urged on either side: and, by a judicious mixture of history with divinity, is, perhaps, the most instructive and entertaining piece of general Polemics hitherto extant. There is brevity, without obscurity, and fulness, without redundancy: nor could that excellent performance be either enlarged, or, retrenched, without detracting from its worth.

anti-Arminians; but which affects not the main question, and concerning which they ever did and do still agree.

I shall at present, sir, trouble you with but one more citation from Burnet: a short one, indeed, it is, but full to the point. You will find it in that learned and worthy prelate's abridgment of his History of the Reformation, sub ann. 1549. His words are these: "Another sort of people was much complained of, who built so much on the received opinion of predestination, that they thought they might live as they pleased." Whether or no these people really drew this consequence from the doctrine (as there is nothing so holy as to be exempt from all possibility of abuse), or whether, as is most probable, it was a slander fastened on them by the disguised Papists of that time, affects not the present argument. The passage proves what I quote for: namely, that at the settlement of the reformation, and when the Church of England was in her primitive purity, predestination was the received opinion. Nor, indeed, need the bishop have told us so. The articles of religion, published about a year and a half after the time he speaks of, put the point beyond all doubt. Thus stood this matter in the reign of king Edward. We shall come to that of queen Elizabeth by and by. In the meanwhile,

From England, sir, I follow you to the continent. You are pleased to tell us, p. 69, 70, that these doctrines have been disputed "among the Papists, between the Thomists and the Scotists; the Dominicans and the Franciscans:" to which you might also have added, "and between the Jansenists and Jesuits." I grant it all. And these points not only have been, but are disputed among them with abundance of acrimony to this very day. A most pregnant proof, by the by, of the infallibility and Catholic unity, which that most depraved and most impudent of all churches affects to value herself upon. Had you stopped here, you had done well; but you add, that the doctrines in debate between yourself and the author of Pietas Oxoniensis were likewise disputed "among the Protestants, from the first beginning of the reformation, between the Lutherans and the Calvinists." Here, I apprehend, you have shot beyond the mark. The era, or first beginning of the reformation, is universally and very justly assigned to the year 1517, when Luther first publicly opposed the sale of the pope's indulgences at Wittenberg. At this time Calvin could have had no followers; for he himself was then a boy of but eight years old; being (c) born July 10, 1509. Neither was he settled to purpose at Geneva, until the year 1541, i. e. five years before the death of Luther; by which time the reformation had spread wide and taken deep root on the continent.— Hence it is evident that there were and could have been no disputes concerning the decrees of God, "between the Lutherans and Calvinists, from the first beginning of the reformation;" for the reformation was begun in Calvin's childhood, long enough before he was brought on the stage of public observation.

The plain truth is, Luther himself was an absolute predestinarian; and was as able and as resolute a defender of God's eternal, irrespective decrees, as Calvin or any other. So that even had these two great men been as strictly co-ætanci, as they were contemporaries, there would have been no room for dissension between them on that subject. Bishop Burnet, with all his bias to Arminianism, was too well read not to know, and too honest not to acknowledge, the Calvinism (if it must be called by that name) of Luther: though the bishop's aversion to these doctrines made him very disingenuously insinuate as if that eminent reformer adopted them, partly to serve a turn, and partly without due examination. "When Luther," says he, "began to form his opinions into a body, he clearly saw that nothing did so plainly destroy the doctrine of merit and justification by works, as St. Austin's opinions. He found also in his works very express authorities against most of the corruptions of the Roman church; and being of an order that carried his name, and, by consequence, accustomed to read and reverence his works, it was no wonder if he, without a strict examining of the matter, espoused all his [Austin's] opinions." [On Art. 17, p. 194.] However, not to rest on mere testimony, which at best is but evidence at second hand; as a solid and indisputable proof that I go on sure grounds in averring Luther to have held absolute predestination, I appeal to the memorable controversy between him and Erasmus. The latter had, at the importunate and repeated requests of king Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolsey, published a treatise in favour of free will, wherein Luther was severely reflected on for holding the opposite doctrine. To this Luther published a copious answer; drawn up in a very nervous manner, and with a vast compass of argument; entitling it, De Servo Arbitrio, or, The Human Will a Slave. If any person, after having read a single chapter in that masterly performance, has the assurance to pronounce Luther an enemy to what is now known by the name of Doctrinal Calvinism; (f) he may, when his hand is in, call Baronius a Protestant, or affirm Calvin himself to have been an Arminian. It was chiefly from this book of Luther's on the Servitude of the Will, that those six positions against free agency were picked out, which twenty years afterwards made such a bustle in the council of Trent, and were agitated with so much heat and division by the infallible church; some siding with Luther, and declaring that he had asserted no more than Austin had done before him; others anathematizing the positions, as the very quintessence of heresy, and of most dangerous consequence to the Catholic faith. The latter party carried their point: and accordingly the fourth, fifth, and sixth canons, passed in the sixth session of that infamous council, are directly pointed against the decisions of Luther respecting the inability of man's will. (g)

The followers of Luther and Calvin, since (h) the deaths of those great reformers (for I cannot find that that they did it before) have, if you please, not only differed, but fallen out with relation to some (and only some) of the points you speak of: but not those reformers themselves. Had they agreed as well about the nature of the Lord's Supper as they did about predestination, justification, and perseverance; the two denominations of Lutherans and Calvinists had been in fact one and the same; so far at least as matters of doctrine are concerned.

Page 70, you put this question to the author of Pietas: "What pretence have you to call your own notions the principles of the reformation?" Because they are so. Open the liturgy where you will, Calvinism stares you in the face. And can the doctrines of grace enter into the very basis of a reformed church, yet not be principles of the reformation? You ask likewise, why he calls the "contrary opinions the avowed tenets of the church of Rome?" Because the very letter of scripture bids us render to all their dues. The Arminian tenets belong to the church of Rome. Her's, they are, and to her they should be returned. From her they came, and to her they lead. It matters not that there were a few such persons as Marinier, De Vega, and Catanea, in the council of Trent; nor that there are still some individuals within the Romish pale (the Jansenists for instance), who believed the doctrines of predestination and invincible grace, as taught by St. Paul and St. Austin; and from these, by Calvin and the reformed churches.

Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una!

The point is, how goes the stream? quite in the contrary channel. Witness the Tridentine decisions, and the more recent constitution Unigenitus. Let a man peruse these, and then doubt, if he can, whether Arminianism does not cordially coincide with popery.

But you urge that the Arminian doctrines "have been maintained by many of the brightest ornaments of our church; such as Laud, Hammond, Bull, &c." I except against Laud. I cannot allow him upon the whole, to have been any ornament to us at all; much less can I put him at the head of our brightest ornaments. If he had any brightness belonging to him, it was the brightness of a fire-brand, which at the long run set both church and state in a flame. Learned as he was (or rather, an encourager of learning in others, so they were not Calvinists), he was at best but a mongrel Protestant; and would have but acted consistently with himself had he accepted the cardinal's hat, which was offered him from Rome. So declared an enemy was your bright ornament to all liberty both civil and religious, that I make no scruple to call him a disgrace to his order, to his country, and to human nature. Illegal and unwarrantable in itself as his execution was, yet his life, written by his creature Heylin, on purpose to exculpate this Cyprianus Anglicanus, proves, to a demonstration, that this hot headed prelate was not slandered in being charged with a design to carry over the Church of England to that of Rome; or as Heylin himself expresses it, "to make an atonement between the two churches," i. e. to set them at one again; atonement being a word used at that time to signify a reconciliation and re-union. For which reason, among a thousand others, I must beg leave to strike out Laud from the list of our brightest ecclesiastical ornaments; and dismiss him with that just observation of bishop Burnet, who remarks that while Laud's enemies "did really magnify him by their inhuman prosecution, his friends, Heylin and Wharton, have as much lessened him; the one by writing his life, and the other by publishing his vindication of himself." [Summary of Aff. before the Restor. p. 68. 8vo edit.]

As for Hammond, Bull, Tillotson, Sharp, and Stillingfleet, they are names not to be mentioned without honour. Yet it does not follow that Arminianism is either right in itself, or the doctrine of our church, because adopted by these otherwise eminent and worthy persons. Nor do the greatness of their names and the brightness of their talents sanctify the errors they might happen to patronize, or one jot mitigate the crime of subscribing to articles they did not believe. Let them have been ever so great ornaments to our church in other respects, this, surely, is no ornamental part of their characters. Dross does not cease to be dross because some gold may chance to be blended with it: nor error cease to be such because adopted by men of merit. However, I think when your hand had been in, you might have reminded us of some more persons who were in every respect ornamental to our church, and true consistent sons of it, by believing and maintaining her fundamental doctrines; such as Abbot, Grindal, Usher, Williams, Davenant, Downham, Carlton, Hall, Barlow (of Lincoln), Beveridge, Hopkins, &c. &c., all of whom were bishops, and (for which reason you threw them into shades) Predestinarians. After all, truth does not depend on names. The doctrines of the church are to be learned from the articles and homilies of the Church herself; not from the private opinions of some individuals who lay hold on the skirt of her garment, call themselves by her name, and live by her revenues.

You proceed. "Our articles have been vindicated from the charge of Calvinism by Bishop Bull, Dr. Waterland, and several other religious and learned men." You should rather have said, "They have laboured hard to do it, but were not able." Like some disciples of old, they toiled all the day, but could take nothing. When Dr. Bull was strongly pressed with his subscription by the famous Dr. Tully (who was then principal of that very hall whence the six religious students were lately expelled; and afterwards dean and chancellor of Carlisle); Bull, in his answer, only huddles the matter up, and slides over it as well as he can, in this slight equivocating manner: "Quæ deinceps, in hoc capite, sequuntur, à D. Tullio, declamatorio more effusa, de regid declaratione articulis nostris præfixâ; de canone ecclesiæ; de subscriptionibus et juramentis nostris toties repetitis; ea tum demùm ad nos pertinere fatebimur, cum evicerit ille, quicquam nos docuisse unquam, quod clarè alicui ecclesiæ nostræ definitioni adversetur:" (i) i. e. "I shall then acknowledge myself to be affected by what Dr. Tully subjoins in his declamatory way, concerning the king's declaration prefixed to our articles; the canon he refers to; and my so often repeated oaths and subscriptions; when he shall have demonstrated that I ever affirmed any thing contrary to any clear determination of our church." But the misfortune was, this had actually been demonstrated before; whence Dr. Tully took occasion to press the matter home to Bull's conscience; justly upbraiding him, not for espousing those doctrines which he took for true, but for swearing and setting his hand to articles which, if his own system was right, were and must be erroneous and false. This home thrust the Arminian doctor endeavoured to parry off, by insinuating that the determinations of the church, in behalf of the Calvinistic principles, are not sufficiently clear, but dark and ambiguous. As if she had not clearly determined that "predestination is the everlasting purpose of God," and that we are "justified by faith only!" After this rate, any unbelieving subscriber whatever, when taxed with dishonesty and prevarication, need only cry out with bishop Bull, "the determinations of our church are not clear;" and he slips his neck out of the collar very cleverly. But a determination which is not clear, is in reality no determination at all; and either the church has absolutely determined nothing, and is a church without any fixed principles; or her determinations are clear and peremptory; and, of course, the integrity of such persons as subscribe to those determinations, without believing them, is not very conspicuous.

One of the most furious Arminians now living (the John Goodwin of the present age) seems to have refined upon Bishop Bull in this particular. This Arminian is Mr. John Wesley, who, like many others, endeavouring to leap over the 17th article of the Church of England, very gravely tells us that that article, which treats of predestination, "only defines the term," but does not affirm the doctrine. By this new rule all our positive articles are only so many definitions of terms: the 1st, for instance, defines the meaning of the word Trinity; the 9th defines original sin; the 27th is a definition of baptism; and the 39th defines an oath. So the Church is founded, not upon doctrines, but on bare definitions; and is not a teacher but a definer! Is there a Jew, a Turk, or a Papist, who would scruple to subscribe our articles, considered simply as definitions of certain terms and phrases? or is there a Protestant in the world but might safely set his hand to pope Pius's creed upon a similar supposition? I leave to the consideration of Dr. Nowell and of the public, who are to be deemed Methodists and Secularians. They who believe the doctrines of the Church as they stand in her articles, without sophistication and disguise? or they who, with Mr. Wesley and some others, subscribe the articles not as articles of faith, but either as ecclesiastical definitions of terms, or at most as determinations which are not clear? By this loose, shagging way of evading the force of Church decisions, and weakening the sacred ties of solemn and repeated subscriptions, the spiritual fence of our establishment is broken down and trod under foot; and the Church, like a city without walls, or a house stript of its doors, lies open to the entrance of every comer, whether friend or foe, who has opportunity of getting in. Such, I fear, is in great measure the present condition of our once admirable Church. I can only, for my own part, be faithful to her myself, pour out my soul for her in secret at the throne of grace, and, until God pours down a Spirit of reformation on many of her pretended sons, cry over her, saying, Alas! my mother! Her gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars; the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the Lord. What thing shall I liken to thee, O daughter of Jerusalem? what shall I equal to thee that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion? for thy breach is great like the sea; who can heal thee? Lam. iii.

(i) Apol. pro aram. inter. Opera, p. 660. Sect. 12.

As to Dr. Waterland, on whose attempts to weed out Calvinism from our articles you lay so great stress, I grant that, like the prelate last mentioned, he fought through thick and thin and strained every nerve in order, if possible, to Arminianize the Church. But his success was very far from being equal to his toil. This learned and excellent person never lost himself more visibly, nor was never pinched more sensibly, than when his own artillery was turned upon him by Sykes. The inference, urged by the latter, is too glaring to be denied, viz.—That if Arian subscription to Trinitarian articles is palpably dishonest, then, by all the rules of argument in the world, Arminian subscription to articles that are Calvinistic must and can be no less criminal. This was the Gordian knot which Dr. Waterland, with all his straining, could never untie. Therefore this great man, finding himself wedged fast between the horns of this unavoidable dilemma, namely, either to give up the point, and own subscribing Arminians to be as inexcusable as subscribing Arians; or that, if those might subscribe, salvâ conscientiâ, so might these, since what is lawful for the raven is as lawful for the crow;—the doctor, to free himself as well as he could from this embarrassment, resolved to cut the knot at once, by roundly denying that our articles are Calvinistical. But every struggle he made, and every argument he brought in support of his palpable falsehood (which he adopted à pro re natâ, and to help himself out at a dead lift), only plunged him in deeper difficulties, by giving his Arian adversaries this advantage against him, that, upon the doctor's own principles, and by virtue of his own example, they were as much at liberty, mutatis mutandis, to put their own sense upon the 1st, 2d, 5th, and 8th articles, as Waterland was to put his sense upon the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 17th; since the very letter of these articles is no less determinate in favour of original sin, the utter impotence of free-will in spirituals, gratuitous justification without works, and eternal, absolute predestination, than those are in favour of the Trinity, the godhead of Christ, the godhead of the Holy Ghost, and the orthodoxy of the three creeds.

And, indeed, the case speaks for itself. For if one sort of men may fairly claim the privilege of clipping, mincing, and wire-drawing some articles, as a salvo for subscription, why may not another sort of men be allowed to take the same liberty with the rest? Let not, then, the subscribing Arminian (though he may happen to be a Trinitarian) exclaim against the subscribing Arian, the subscribing Socinian, or even the subscribing Deist. Only grant it lawful to wrench the articles one way, and it is as lawful to wrench them any way or every way. If an Arminian may stretch the 17th article into conditional predestination and universal redemption, an Arian has just as much right to lop short the 2d article, so far as it stands in his way. By the same rule that our articles are drawn aside from any one part of their plain grammatical import, they may be frothed into no meaning whatever, and bandied about towards every point of the compass. If a subscriber is really at liberty to pick and chuse which of them, and which part of them he will believe, and which he shall reject; which to subscribe sincerely, and which with secret provisos of his own; subscription is no longer a fence against error, but becomes a mere stalking horse, and the articles themselves a nose of wax. St. Paul's words, with a slight variation, may be accommodated to the case in hand. Thou art inexcusable [O subscribing Arminian], whoever thou art, that judgest [the subscribing Arian]; for wherein thou judgest [him], thou condemnest thyself: for thou that judgest doest the same thing [in another way]. Rom. ii. 1.

Thus the gap of prevaricating subscription being once opened, "we may," to use Dr. Waterland's own words, "bid adieu to principles;" and between one subscriber and another the Church of England will have no settled doctrines left, or, at most, they will exist no where but in ink and paper, between the leaves of her liturgy and homilies, and in the forgotten writings of her old divines.

Foreign comedians, a spruce band, arrive,
And push her from the scene, or hiss her there.

Should matters go on for half a century longer as they have done for many years back, the most respectable Church in the world will be reduced, by some of those who call themselves her children, to the same condition that the man in the fable was by his two wives :

*Ambæ videri dum volunt illi pares,
Capillos homini legere cœpère invicem.
Quum se putârat pingi curâ mulierum,
Calvus repente factus est: nem funditis
Canos puella, nigros anus, evellerat.*

I pray God that the Delilahs, who make it their business to shear the Church of its locks, by robbing it gradually of its doctrines, may not, at the long run, deliver it quite up into the hands of the Philistines.

Bishop Burnet went to work in a much more plausible manner than either Bishop Bull or Dr. Waterland. He contributed as much, in fact, towards opening a door to prevaricating subscription as they; but did it with more decency, and with a better regard to appearances. He does not drive so furiously as those Jehu writers, nor insult the common reason of mankind by fiercely insisting that our articles are not Calvinistic, but hit on a more trimming expedient, and would gently insinuate that they are worded with what he calls such moderation and latitude that Calvinists and Arminians too may mutually testify their assent by subscription. I mean not to depreciate that truly great and good prelate's Exposition of the Articles, which is, in general, a very masterly and valuable performance. (h) I am not entirely of Dr. South's mind, who, you know, sir, being asked, soon after its publication, what he thought of it? replied, in his smart way, "Think of it? I think that, in his Exposition of our Thirty-nine Articles, his lordship has given the Church forty stripes save one." That the bishop has given the Church three or four stripes I think can hardly be denied; and unhappy is the mother who receives such usage at the hands of the sons she has nourished and brought up. Thus much is certain: that Burnet plays fast and loose whenever Calvinism and subscription fall in his way. Hence those two contradictory positions of his: "Subscription does import an assent to the article: and—an article being conceived in such general words, that it can admit of different literal and grammatical senses, even when the senses given are plainly contrary one to another, yet both may subscribe the article with a good conscience, and without any equivocation." (Intro. to Exp. Art. p. 10.) As if there could be more literal senses of a proposition than one! and those numerous senses could be plainly contrary one to another, and yet be all literally and grammatically the sense of that proposition! An Arian, a Papist, or a Deist may, with a good conscience, and without any equivocation, subscribe those very articles which, literally and grammatically, conclude point blank against Arianism, Popery, and Deism!

That learned and able divine, Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge, published, in the lifetime of Bishop Burnet, some strictures on that prelate's way of treating the articles. "I can by no means," says he, "approve of this learned prelate's extravagant attempt when he takes a great deal of pains to persuade his readers that these thirty-nine articles, or most of them, are so dark and ambiguous that the true sense of them is not to be found out; and therefore that we may make what construction of them we please. Surely his lordship's memory is none of the best: any man must needs think that he had forgot what he had asserted and given as his judgment, namely, That these are articles of downright belief, and therefore must not be dallied and played with. It is such a strange perverting of the articles as cannot but raise admiration in indifferent persons, and such as are not led by prejudice. For, 1st, This new-found exposition fosters dissimulation. It seems to teach our clergymen to equivocate. For though the learned and reverend author acknowledges, once and again, that the compilers of those articles were Calvinistically disposed, and accordingly formed some of the articles so as they are to be understood in favour of Calvin's opinions, yet he proposes them to the clergy, to be taken in an ambiguous sense. They are taught, in the whole, to trim; to turn about as they please; to dissemble with God and man; to subscribe to that which they know most assuredly is, in the plain meaning of it, against their persuasion. Therefore I say that this new-coined explication of the articles is inconsistent with the integrity of our Church and the sincerity of its ministers who are to subscribe to them. It will be hard to reconcile this with the doing it with a good conscience, as is required in the 5th canon, and ex animo, and avoiding all ambiguities, as the 36th canon enjoins. 2. After this rate it can never be known, from our professions and subscriptions, what our mind is, what our belief and sentiments are. Though we openly acknowledge under our hands such doctrines to be agreeable to God's word, yet we may think one article of them to be true; yea, we may think and severely censured Burnet's Exposition of the Articles. See Tindal, 15, 310.

profess the quite contrary. And of this our author (Barnet) gives us an instance in himself, telling us (in his Preface to the Expos. of the Art.) that in the point of predestination he follows the Greek Church, from which St. Austin departed and formed a new system; and yet he publicly declares that our Church's article of predestination may be interpreted and understood in favour of the Calvinists who follow St. Augustin. I remember this learned writer, in the account he gives us of his travels, makes this reflection on Geneva that there is want of sincerity there. May we not, from what has been represented under this particular, fear that there is the same want somewhere else?" (Veritas Red. p. 521, 522.)

But I return to Dr. Nowell. Another part of your address to the author of Pietas Oxoniensis runs thus: "Supposing that they and we," namely, the Arminians of past and present times, "are mistaken in the sense we put upon our articles; yet, surely, unless you can see our hearts, you cannot censure us for subscribing to what we believe not a word of." You do well, Sir, to suppose yourself and your Arminian friends mistaken. I hope your next step will be to retract your mistakes. And you have fallen into not a few in the very paragraph last cited. 1st, You seem to take for granted that you have a right to put your own sense on the articles to which you subscribe. But this is by no means the case. Our articles, like the prophecies, are not of private interpretation. You and I, and every subscriber are, by express declaration of authority, pinned down to the plain, literal, and grammatical meaning of each article. The legislature, duly weighing the importance and solemn nature of ecclesiastical subscription, have taken almost every precaution human wisdom could suggest or the energy of language furnish to preclude evasion and preserve the doctrines of the Church inviolate. Let part of the royal declaration usually prefixed to the articles themselves, and which, having never been revoked, still stands in full force, serve by the way of specimen: "We have, upon mature deliberation, and with the advice of so many of our bishops as might conveniently be called together, thought fit to make this declaration following: That the Articles of the Church of England do contain the true doctrine of the Church of England agreeable to God's word, which we do therefore ratify and confirm, prohibiting the least difference from the said articles, from which we will not endure any varying or departing in the least degree;— And that no man hereafter shall either print or preach to draw the article aside any way, but shall submit to it in the plain and full meaning thereof; and shall not put his own sense or comment to be the meaning of the article, but shall take it in the literal and grammatical sense." Hence it is as evident as demonstration can make it that Calvinists are the only fair subscribers; and that Arminians, as such, are virtually excluded from subscription; because the articles are to be subscribed, not with qualifying glosses, diluting comments, tacit limitations, and mental exceptions (for this would defeat the very end for which subscription is required), but we are to subscribe, as every subscriber professes to do, ex animo, with unfeigned assent and consent, without drawing aside the articles any way, or varying or departing from them in the least degree; moreover without putting the subscriber's own sense on what he subscribes unto, but honestly and bond fide taking the articles in their literal and grammatical meaning simply as they stand.

2dly, You would insinuate that we cannot charge the Arminians with subscribing to what they do not believe, "except we could look into their hearts." But there is no occasion for our looking quite so deep as that, since, out of the abundance of their hearts, their hands write and their mouths speak. I think that I myself, without pretending to dive into hearts, may form a judgment, for instance, of Dr. Nowell and his subscriptions. You, Sir, have subscribed to our articles and homilies over and over again. These articles and homilies are (1) Calvinistic; and you are a professed Arminian. Either, therefore, you were not an Arminian when you subscribed, or you subscribed to what you disbelieved. And by the same rule that we form an estimate of you, we are qualified to judge of others of your sect.

3dly, I discern not a little chicanery in the latter clause of your paragraph; "you cannot censure us for subscribing to what we believe not a word of." This is brought in by way of a trap-door to escape at, in case you should happen to be hard pressed. You may believe a word, and many words, even in the 17th article itself; without

(1) The Calvinism of these has been acknowledged by very many of the Arminians themselves. One, in particular, recalls this moment to my remembrance. A late dignitary (Dr. H.) of considerable figure, both in the Church and in the world, and celebrated, among other things, for a learned and sensible work, published under the title of Theological Lectures, being one day in company with another dignitary (now living, and from whom I had it), the conversation happened to turn on the Thirty-Nine Articles, against several of which Dr. H. exclaimed with great warmth. My friend asked him, "But have you not subscribed to these, and that ex animo?" I have. "And do not you hold all your preferences by virtue of that subscription?" I do; and our reformers, who drew up such articles, deserved to be hanged for their pains.

believing the substance of the article, or assenting to the doctrine it asserts. There are not a few detached words, even in the decrees of Trent, to which any Protestant in the world might safely testify his assent: and yet no truly conscientious Protestant would look upon that as a sufficient warrant for setting his hand to those execrable decisions. And, by parity of argument, I greatly question whether any truly honest and conscientious Arminian would venture to rest upon this as a plea for subscription, "though I abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and Calvinistical, the doctrines contained in the 10th, 11th, and 17th, articles of the Church of England; yet as a subscriber to those articles, I make myself easy, because I cannot say that I believe not a word in them; for there are some words here and there interspersed which are of innocent tendency: and for the sake of these I have swallowed the whole." Instead of shifting, and mincing, and trimming, in this despicable manner, would it not be more to the credit of such clergymen as are Arminians, to make a push for an alteration, and boldly cry out, with the monthly reviewers, "Our established doctrines are not such as might be wished, and ought to be re-modelled?" Let them act like men of courage and principle; and instead of doubling and winding and putting our articles on the rack, "to find out meanings never meant," say of them, and of the 17th in particular (as archbishop Tillotson did of the Athanasian Creed), "I heartily wish we were well rid of it." This would be treading in the steps of their elder brethren, the Dutch Arminians; and would make them remonstrants in act, as well as in principles. It would not, indeed, vindicate them from the glaring dishonesty of solemnly subscribing to articles thus professedly disbelieved: but it would save them the ridiculous and fruitless trouble of endeavouring to twist and torture Calvinistic articles into a sense they are incapable of bearing. The reverend and dignified author of the Confessional, is a saint, when set in competition with such divines as would put out our eyes, by daring to tell us that the 10th articles does not overturn free-will;

that the 11th does not assert justification by faith only; and that the 17th does not teach everlasting, absolute, gratuitous predestination.

How am I grieved to hear such gentlemen as the writers of the Independent Whig triumph over us in such strains as these! "At one time, predestination is of high consequence, and made an article of faith, and all free-willers should be banished the land, or locked up in dungeons, like wild beasts; which were the judgments of the bishops in the days of James I., (m) concerning the Arminians. At a different season, when preferments ran high on the other side, as in the reign of Charles I., and ever since, Arminianism not only recovers credit but grows modish, and, consequently, orthodox: whilst predestination becomes an old fashioned piece of faith, and a sure sign of fanaticism, and yet it continues one of the XXXIX Articles; and yet it must not be believed; and yet it must be signed and assented to with a sincere assent." [Ind. Wh. vol. ii. p. 9.] I am perfectly shocked, that the same writers should have any shadow of ground for addressing some of our body in the following style: "Is there one of you that conforms to the genuine sense, or even to the words of the articles? Are not those articles Calvinistical? Were they not composed by Calvinists? And are you not now and have been long Arminians? And do you not write and preach against [those] who defend predestination, which is one of your own articles? Will you say that articles, will you say that oaths, are to be taken in a sense different from the words, different from the meaning of those who composed them? If you do, then you maintain that Papists, nay, Mahometans may subscribe our Protestant articles, and be still Mahometans and Papists: and that Jacobites may take the state oaths and be still Jacobites. What subscriptions or declarations, or indeed, what other ties can bind men who subscribe the direct contrary to what they believe? Subscribe the doctrines of Calvin, yet remain antagonists to Calvin? Is this practice, this solemn assertion of a falsehood, for the honour of

(m) The fact asserted is undoubtedly true; but there seems to be an anachronism in assigning the date. I cannot find, that the bishops in James the First's time advised the government to treat Arminians in this manner. It was in the reign of queen Elizabeth, that this counsel was offered by the bishops. The part of their advice referred to did, according to Strype, run verbatim as follows: Item, That incorrigible Arians, Pelagians or Free-will-men, be sent into some one castle in North Wales, or Wallingford; and there to live of their own labour and exercise; and none other be suffered to resort unto them but their keepers: until they be found to repent their errors." Strype's Annals of the Reformation, &c. during the first twelve years of Queen Elizabeth, chap. 17. p. 207. I do not quote this mortifying paragraph from any approbation I enertain of the expedient recommended: for I abhor every thing that even looks like persecution for principles merely religious. But I cannot help deducing two conclusions from this curious portion of our ecclesiastical history: 1st. That free-will-men were considered by the Church of England, when in her purity, as some of the most dangerous recusants she had to grapple with; else she never would have advised the confining them in a remote prison, and prohibiting them from the access of all persons, their keepers only excepted. 2nd. That free-will-men, at that time, were very few in number: otherwise, one castle, however spacious, would not have been thought large enough to contain them. I heartily congratulate our present free-willers, on their living in an age of liberty.

religion or of Churchmen? or is it not the direct method to harden men against truth and conscience, and to turn holy things into contempt? yet you still go on to subscribe those articles; still to disbelieve and contradict them." [Ibid. vol. iii. p. 403, 404.]

Object not that these quotations are brought from men whose attachment to our Church, and indeed to Christianity in general, was liable to suspicion. I grant it was. Yet,

Fas est et ab hoste doceri.

And truth is truth, let it come from what quarter it will. The question ought not to be, "Were these men our enemies?" but "Are these things so?" If they be, such writers as Dr. Nowell ought to turn their eyes inward, and recollect that themselves are the persons who give the friends of our excellent Church reason to lament, and open the mouths of her enemies to blaspheme.

But if the expostulations of the Independent Whig be repudiated, as coming from a suspected quarter, permit me to remind you, sir, of three very remarkable passages, the same in substance with the preceding, though written by persons of your own principles: I mean Dr. Heylin, Bishop Burnet, and Dr. Waterland. The introducing them here, is, indeed, an anticipation, which reverses in some measure the plan I proposed at first setting out: but as I am on the subject of Arminian subscription, I will dispatch it once for all. Dr. Peter Heylin who was chaplain to archbishop Laud and king Charles I., and was both a Laudæan and a Carolite in grain; an author whom you closely follow, and whose Quinquarticular History seems to have furnished you with a considerable part of that book you lately offered to the public; does, in that very history, Arminian as he was, express himself thus: "The composers of the articles of the Church of England had not so little in them of the dove, or so much of the serpent, as to make the articles of the Church like an upright shoe, which may be worn on either foot; or like to Theramenes' shoe, as the adage hath it, fit for the foot of every man that was pleased to wear it. And therefore we may say of our first reformers in reference to the present book of articles, that those reverend and learned men intended not to deceive any by ambiguous terms. The first reformers did not so compose the articles as to leave any liberty to dissenting judgments; but did bind men to the literal and grammatical sense: they had not otherwise attained to the end they aimed at, which was "ad tollendam opinionum dissentionem, et consensum in verâ religione firmandum." i. e. To take away diversity of opinions, and to establish an agreement in the true religion. Which end could never be effected if men were left unto the liberty of dissenting, or might have leave to put their own sense upon the articles, as they list themselves. For where there is a purpose of permitting men to their own opinions, there is no need of definitions and determinations in a national Church: no more than there is of making laws to bind the subjects in an unsettled commonwealth, with an intent to leave them in their former liberty, either of keeping or not keeping them, as themselves best pleased." [Hist. Quinquart. part ii. chap. 8. sect. 12.]

Bishop Burnet's testimony is as follows: "I come, in the next place, to consider what the clergy are bound to by their subscriptions. The meaning of every subscription is to be taken from the design of the imposer, and from the words of the subscription itself. The title of the articles bears that they were 'agreed upon in convocation, for the avoiding of diversities of opinions, and for the stablishing consent touching true religion.' Where it is evident that a consent in opinion is designed. If we, in the next place, consider the declaration that the Church has made in the canons, that though, by the fifth canon, which relates to the whole body of the people, such only are declared to be excommunicated ipso facto who shall affirm any of the articles to be erroneous, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe to; yet the thirty-sixth canon is express for the clergy, requiring them to subscribe willingly and ex animo, and acknowledge all and every article to be agreeable to the word of God: upon which canon it is that the form of the subscription runs in those words, which seem expressly to declare a man's own opinion, and not a bare consent to an article of peace, or an engagement to silence and submission. The statute of the 13th of Queen Elizabeth, cap. 12, which gives the legal authority to our requiring subscriptions in order to a man's being capable of a benefice, requires that every clergyman should read the articles in the Church, and that with a declaration of his unfeigned assent to them. These things make it appear very plain that the subscriptions of the clergy must be considered as a declaration of their own opinion, and not as a bare obligation to silence." [Introduct. to Exp. of the Art. p. 9.]

Dr. Waterland shall close the rear. In his Preface to his First Defence of some Queries, page 4th, he informs his readers that Dr. Clarke had lately published a second edition of his Scripture-doctrine of the Trinity; on which Waterland has this remark: "One thing I must observe for the Doctor [Clarke's] honour, that in his new edition he has left out these words of his former introduction. 'It is plain that every person may reasonably agree to such forms, whenever he can in any sense at all reconcile them with scripture.' I hope none hereafter will pretend to make use of the Doctor's authority for subscribing to forms which they believe not according to the true and proper sense of the words, and the known intent of the imposers and compilers. Such prevarication is in itself a bad thing, and would in time have a very ill influence on the morals of a nation. (n) If either state oaths on one hand, or Church subscriptions on the other, once come to be made light of, and subtillies be invented to defend or palliate such gross insincerity, we may bid farewell to principles, and religion will be little else but disguised Atheism."—Awful, pertinent, striking words! Happy would it have been, had Heylin, Burnet, and Waterland but stood throughout to their own principles! Instead of which, each of the learned triumvirate openly disavowed, in his own practice, upon some certain occasions, what he had so solidly established with his pen. But though these great men, whenever the Calvinistic doctrines of the Church came in their way, turned themselves back, like Ephraim, and were as frightened at Calvin's positions (though subscribed to by themselves) as they could have been at his apparition; thus, Penelope like, unravelling the very web they had taken such pains to weave; yet their remarks themselves are not the less true. The plain case was this: when these persons had to deal with an antagonist who happened to espouse any particular opinion that did not tally with their own, they presently knocked him down with the authority of the Church Articles: but when this same authority was in other particulars urged against themselves, they paid no more regard to articles and subscriptions than other people. Like some tyrants of whom it is recorded that they would allow none but themselves to trample on the laws with impunity; or, like the man who could upon occasion drub his wife soundly, but would suffer nobody else to lift a finger against her. (o)—Only admit the three preceding citations to be just, reasonable, and true, and the consequence is undeniable: namely, That Arminian subscription is absolutely unjustifiable, Arminians themselves being judges. Were the same insincerity and prevarications allowed of in the secular affairs of common life, which too often obtain in religious transactions, all social connections would quickly be at an end, and every band by which mankind are tied to each other must vanish as a wreath of smoke.

It is impossible on this occasion not to recollect the stigma of infamy universally and deservedly fastened on Eusebius of Nicomede, for subscribing the Nicene Creed whilst he disbelieved it in his heart; and on Arius himself, for presenting a sham confession of his faith to the emperor Constantine, and ratifying it with his oath, when, at the same time, he really meant no such thing, but endeavoured to patch up matters with conscience by mentally referring the oath he had taken, not to the declaration he had just made, but to a summary of his opinions previously written, and which he had then privately about him concealed in his clothes. I would not be misunderstood as if I meant to put all Arminians on a par with Arians: I only draw the parallel, or rather point out the similitude, so far as prevaricating subscriptions and false declarations of assent are concerned.

In the process of your answer to the author of Pietas Oxoniensis you would fain press those two venerable prelates and martyrs, Cranmer and Ridley, into the service of Arminius; and, to prove your point, very pompously refer us, page 71, to a motley, ungainly volume, published 1543, by order of Henry VIII., and entitled "The necessary erudition of a Christian Man." Since you think fit, sir, to lay such mighty stress on this mongrel production, I will enlarge a little in giving some account of it; only premising that it had been for the credit both of yourself and of your tenets had you let this Popish book wholly alone. You introduce it thus: "What their opinions were," i. e. the opinions of Cranmer and Ridley, "with regard to the doctrines of free-agency, &c., may be seen in the book called Pia et Catholica Institutio, or Erudition of a Christian Man, published 1543, by the king's authority, and authorized by the bishops, with archbishop Cranmer at the head of them." The exact title of your favourite book was this: "A necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, set forth by the Kynge's Majestie of England, &c. London. By Thomas Barthelet, 1543." (p) Henry was vehemently

(n) We have lived to see this prediction of Dr. Waterland's too well fulfilled.

(o) So the Popish princes of Europe cry up the authority of the Romish bishop, when that authority is to be made use of as an engine to promote their own designs: but when that end is answered, the authority of his holiness is enforced no longer; but treated with the contempt it deserves, and, like an old tool, thrown by until it is wanted.

(p) It was first written and published in 1540, a year very unfavourable to the interest of the reformation.

1. Cromwell's fall put the reformation to a stand. Burnet i. 278.

2. The mass-books were prevented to be altered, but stood much as they were, 281.

3. A severe persecution immediately followed: among them suffered the Rev. Mr. R. W., among bent on the publication of this work, and even took the pains to correct it throughout, while in manuscript, with his own hand. No wonder, therefore, that a prince of Henry's self-opinion and known attachment to the doctrinal parts of Popery (which continued with him to the last) should suffer little or nothing to stand in it but what comported with his own notions. These (his own notions), however crude, ridiculous, and irrational, he was ever resolved, by fair means or foul, to ram down the throats of all his subjects. Witness the unheard-of execution of Protestants and Papists in one and the same day: the former for not being Papists in matters of doctrine; the latter for being Papists in the article of the Pope's supremacy. The book which you so devotedly admire, and to which you so often appeal, very much resembles that promiscuous execution; being such a jumble of errors and contradictions as was, perhaps, never before obtruded on a nation. It should be remembered that the statute of the six articles (passed into a law four years before, and not repealed until the first year of the following reign) was in full force at the very time (q) of this publication; therefore it need not seem strange that this book, whose authority you so greatly magnify, and on whose contents (sorry am I for it) you set so high a value, should harmonize with those detestable and bloody articles in the doctrine of transubstantiation and other points relative to the mass. It also gives a paraphrase on the Ave Maria; admits of burning incense to images, and of kneeling before them; asserts the mediation of departed saints in behalf of the living, and that we may lawfully pray to them for an interest in their intercession; that the sacraments are seven in number; and that the fourth commandment, respecting the observation of the sabbath, was purely ceremonial; that it is charitable and commendable to pray for the dead; with much more of the same Popish trumpery. All these particulars shew how little hand Cranmer and Ridley had in composing this book. And if the book itself can be seriously thought by you or by any reasonable man really to contain the genuine sentiments of our reformers, it must be owned that such a reformation left Popery much as it found it, and that the reformers themselves wanted reforming. Good God! what shall we come to at last! A Protestant, a Protestant divine, a Protestant divine of the Church of England, dares, in the face of the sun, to rake into the sink of an antiquated Popish book, in order to throw up mud with which to spatter the doctrines of that reformed Church whose bread he eats and whose raiment he wears! Rather than not carry his point, he who lives on the banks of the Isis is not ashamed to dip his pen in the Tiber! But, at all events, Delenda est Carthago: down with Geneva, though Rome itself flourish on its ruins. Think not, sir, that I am too warn. I only, as a Protestant and as a Churchman, feel a becoming indignation at this part of your conduct; an indignation which candour warrants and justice demands.

"On such a theme it were impious to be calm."

Surely on a review, and at your cooler moments of recollection, you will blush that you should ever have attempted to subvert Protestant doctrines by arguments borrowed from Rome! You will, for decency's sake, forbear in future to call in such an ally to your assistance as the Pia et Catholica Institutio!

However, from this arsenal you have, at present, thought proper (I hope for the last time) to fetch some of your weapons, which you brandish in quotations, more than once, for whole pages together. Nor are your quotations altogether foreign to the purpose. But supposing them to be ever so preperatory against the Calvinistic doctrines of your Church and mine, whether it be for the honour of the Arminian notions to be propped up by citations taken from such a treatise, drawn up by such bishops as then generally filled the bench, revised by such a king as then occupied the throne, and published at such a period of Anti-Christian darkness, must be submitted to your consideration and that of my other Protestant readers.

Nevertheless, bad as the book is, there are some things in it, particularly under the head of free-will, which you prudently forbore to quote, conscious that they look a little like Calvinism. These, for my own part, I disdain to cite. The ark of Protestant truth needs no such leprous hands, no such rotten props for its support. The doctrinal articles of our own truly evangelical Church happily established since neither want assistance from so corrupt a quarter, nor can suffer the least detriment from the despicawhose heresies are ranked his denial of merit and free-will. Strype, vol. i. p. 369.

The Protestants were glad to see things were no worse; and the Papists to see them so bad. The former hoped that the ice being now broke Popery would gradually melt away; the latter, seeing the leading articles of their superstition ratified and confirmed afresh, hoped it was prelude to the re-erection of the whole frame.

(q) This year (1543) was a year of Popish triumphs. 1. This book was set forth afresh. 2. A dismal persecution of Protestants followed, especially at Windsor. 3. A conspiracy against Cranmer. 4. A league between the king and the emperor. 5. Enjoined by act of parliament that no women, artificers, &c., should read the Bible. 6. All spiritual persons that should teach any thing contrary to the "Erudition," &c. See Burnet's Ref. vol. i. p. 306-314.

ble, feeble, inconsistent cavils of a Popish medley, in which the print of Gardiner's cloven foot appears throughout. I will only observe, farther, that the then Pelagian, now (since the starting up of Pelagius the second, I mean James Van Harmin, about fifty years after the publishing of the book in question) Arminian, doctrines are most of them to be found in that wretched piece; such as these: that justifying faith includes obedience to all the law of God; that the scriptures say nothing in favour of personal assurance, or whence it may be gathered that men may in this life be certain of their election, much less of their perseverance in grace to the end; that the divine promises respecting grace and salvation are suspended on conditions of man's performing; that there is a double justification, primary and final; that, though we are justified by works, yet that very justification is, in some sense, by grace, because good works are done by God's assistance; that works, done by justified persons, are meritorious towards the attainment of life eternal; and such like. (r) With which I take my leave of this contemptible, un-protestant performance.

You have just been dabbling in muddy water; but now the stream

"Works itself clear, and, as it runs, refines;"

your next appeal (s) being to the Reformatio legum ecclesiasticarum, a Protestant codex drawn up in the Protestant reign of Edward VI. But hence, as if you liked neither the book nor the reign in which it was written, you bring only two short quotations, and those not very happily chosen; for neither of them clashes with the doctrines of election and final perseverance, but on the contrary, by evident implication, plainly suppose them to be true. The first passage you render thus: "Wherefore all are to be admonished by us, that, in their undertakings and actions, they are not to refer themselves to the decrees of predestination, since, in the Holy Scriptures, we see promises to good actions and threats to bad ones proposed in general terms." This visibly implies that there are, in fact, decrees of predestination; but that these decrees, being unknown to us, cannot, for that very reason, be the rule by which men are to square their actions and undertakings. What Calvinist ever denied this? I never knew one that did. We all hold that God's revealed, not his secret, will, is the rule of human action; and that we are not to descend from the decree to events; but, on the contrary, should ascend from events to the decree. (t) God's hidden will of determination is and can be the rule of his own conduct only, because he only is acquainted with his own purposes in their full extent; but the grand, unerring chart of direction to men, and on which they should constantly fix their eyes, is God's declared will of command, set forth in the written word. So our Church determines, article seventeenth,— "In our doings that will of God is to be followed which we have expressly declared unto us in the word of God."

It is equally true that "In the Holy Scriptures we see promises to good actions and threats to bad ones proposed in general terms;" i. e. it is declared in Scripture that such and such causes shall generally be productive of such and such effects. Which is a proposition not only granted, but insisted upon, by myself and by every Calvinist I ever yet read or met with. So much, sir, for your first citation. I go on to the other: "Etiam illi de justificatis perversè sentiunt, qui credunt illos, postquam juti simul facti sunt, in peccatum non posse incidere aut si forè quicquam eorum faciunt, quæ Dei legibus prohibentur, ea Deum pro peccatis non accipere." I have given the Latin that my readers may judge of your translation, which runs thus: "They form very perverse notions of the justified, who believe that after they are once made just they cannot fall into sin; or if by chance they should do any thing prohibited by the laws of God, that God does not impute it as sin." On reading this, I instantly turned to the table of errata at the end of your pamphlet, but found no correction. What, sir! Does accipio properly signify to impute and charge a thing home? Surely both the genius of the Latin tongue and the sense of the passage under consideration require us to render accipere in this place by regard, consider, or look upon. The whole paragraph stands thus: "They judge very mistakenly of justified persons who believe that such cannot fall into sin after they are once made just; or if they should happen to commit any of those things which are forbidden by God's law, that God does not look upon those things as sins." To talk (as you would fain make the passage do) of God's actually imputing sin to justified persons would be a contradiction in terms, since the negative part of justification itself lies essentially in the non-imputation of any sin whatever, Psalm xxxii. 1, 2. And the

(r) Burnet virtually proves that Cranmer had no hand in that part, at least, of this book which relates to justification. This book makes works a condition, not to say a cause of justification; but Cranmer utterly denied them to be so, as appears from the conclusion of some papers drawn up by him about this time on that important subject; for which see Burnet, Ref. vol. i. 275. See Heylin's Acknowledgment. Life of Laud, p. 3.

man to whom any one sin is imputed by God is and must be, ipso facto, an unjustified person. All, then, that can be inferred from the passage is, 1st. That justified men are not impeccable; the doctrine of sinless perfection in this life, even after grace received, being false, fanatical, and presumptuous. 2. That, consequently, even justified persons may, and too frequently do, fall into sin; and 3. That whenever they do so, God, whose judgment is necessarily according to truth, considers such falling as sinful; sin being sin as much when committed by a child of God as when committed by any other, the state of the offending person not being able to reverse the nature of things. Nay, sin is, if possible, more exceeding sinful in a regenerate man than if he was not so. But what has all this to do with your novel, Arminian, doctrine of totally and finally falling from grace? It rather makes for the opposite doctrine of final perseverance; since the "reformatio legum," by only declaring that the justified may fall into sin (which nobody denies but enthusiasts), and that sin is sin, let who will commit it (which every man in his senses allows), Cranmer and his brother commissioners, by going no farther, but letting the matter rest here, tacitly set their seal to the "perpetuity of a regenerate man's estate," according to the known axiom, that exceptio probat regulam in non exceptis.

With regard to what you advance from Latimer (page 75), from Hooper (page 76), and from Kidley (page 78), it helps not your cause a jot. I had, in my rough draught of these papers, prepared a vindication of these venerable prelates and reformers from the slander of Arminianism, which you have so unjustly laboured to fasten upon them; together with a refutation of the forced, unnatural inferences deduced by you from the few mangled citations you bring. I find, however, that the insertion of this would swell the present publication beyond the size I intend; and shall therefore postpone submitting that part of my work to the world until I see whether you still have the hardness to persist in charging those Protestant worthies with opinions they detested. If I might take the liberty of advising you, I would recommend to you at least silence upon that head in time to come. I am clear that you endeavoured to cull out the most unguarded passages you could from the writings of the above excellent men, in order, if possible, to set a grace upon your new doctrines by the sanction of their venerable names. In doing this you have no more than followed the precedent set you by Dr. Peter Heylin, (u) an absolute

(u) A man of fine natural talents and great acquired knowledge, but who unhappily prostituted both to the most execrable of all purposes, the advancement of civil and religious slavery. Long enough before he wrote the History of the Reformation and the History of the Prebysterians (which were more properly libels upon both), he gave an early specimen of what was to be expected from him in the year 1627, when he publicly maintained, in the Divinity School at Oxford, that the Church cannot err, and that the perpetual visibility of the true Church, à retrò, was to be proved. "Not from the persecuted Christians dispersed in several places, as the Berengarians in Italy, the Waldenses in France, the Wickliffists in England, and the Hussites in Bohemia, he rather chose to find out (says the writer of his life, p. 6,) a continual visible Church in Asia, Ethiopia, Greece, Italy, yea, and Rome itself." and concluded his disputation with passing some very high compliments on the Romish Church, and on Bellarmine in particular, for which the learned (a) Dr. Prideaux, who then presided in the divinity chair, had the honesty and courage to call Heylin, publicly and on the spot, Papicola et Bellarmianus. Heylin, who well knew what high designs were then carrying on at court, thought he had now laid the foundation of his fortune; and, flushed with hopes of preferment, posts up to London to (b) acquaint Laud, then bishop of Bath and Wells, with the meritorious services he had just done, by openly maintaining Popish positions in a Protestant University. "The good bishop (says the aforesaid biographer, p. 7,) commended and encouraged Mr. Heylin, saying that he himself had in his younger days maintained the same positions in a disputation in St. John's college (c)."<sup>2</sup> Presently after Heylin is made chaplain to Charles I. and prebendary of Westminster. On the coming out of Mr. Prynne's Histriomastix (written, as the title imports, against plays and stage-players), Heylin is sent for to the council-table, where he received the king's commands to read over that book, and to select such passages from it as the administration could lay hold of; for the queen being, it seems (like a true daughter of France), excessively fond of plays and masques, an attempt to prove those diversions unchristian must needs forsooth be traitorous and seditious, and an insult on the queen herself. A fortnight's space was allowed our Christian divine for the performance of this honourable task. But, says his life-writer, "He had learned that diligence in business would qualify him for the service of kings, and therefore he finished what was required of him in less than four days; for which he had his majesty's thanks, as also new commands to revise his papers, and to write down such logical inferences as might naturally arise from the premises of Mr. Prynne." ib. p. 10. The plain English of this is, that Mr. Prynne's own positions, as they stood in his book (though, no doubt, the most exceptionable of them had been industriously culled out by the worthy divine), did not amount to a foundation for prosecuting the author; therefore the same reverend hand was to draw out such logical inferences as might effectually do Prynne's business. With this also the court-chaplain complied. Nor did he stop here: for his historian adds—"About this time, and upon this occasion, he wrote a small tract, touching the punishments due by law and in point of practice," [a distinction well suited to the proceedings of that arbitrary reign, when law and practice were two very different things,] "unto such offenders as Mr. Prynne; and this was observable in the trial of that person, that nothing was urged by the council to aggravate his faults than what was contained in Mr. Heylin's collection." A circumstance, to be sure, much to the Rev. Mr. Heylin's credit; who yet, by the bye, had the modesty to fall foul on the memory of Calvin for the part that reformer is supposed to have borne in the prosecution of Servetus. (d)

About two years before all this bustle Mr. Prynne had published a learned and masterly performance, entitled Anti-Arminianism, proving that the Ar-creature of archbishop Laud, and an obsequious tool in the persecuting hand of arbitrary power. His Quinquarticular History is the most laboured effort ever yet made to father Arminianism on the Church of England; but all his attempts are like throwing straw against a fort, or playing water against a rock. The Calvinism, both of our reformers and of our Church, stands unimpeached for any thing that either you, sir, or your Heylin, have proved to the contrary. However, supposing (not granting) that you even had so far made good your point as to have evinced that some of our reformers were not altogether such consistent Calvinists as yet their works prove them to have been, still this argument would not have been decisive. Not the sermons and private writings even of our reformers themselves are to be taken for authentic tests of our established doctrines as a Church; but those stubborn things called Articles and Homilies, which have received the sanction of law and the stamp of public authority. These stubborn things (for such they are) still remain, blessed be God, to stare some certain folks in the face, and to demonstrate the glaring apostasy of such as say they are minian doctrines, then almost fresh imported from Holland, (e) were not the doctrines of the Church of England, but novel and exotic. This gravelled Laud, who, not being able to overthrow that vast chain of proofs brought by Prynne, and yet being resolved, by all the allurements of promotion, and (if these failed) by all the terrors of persecution, to new-model the Church, by lopping off Calvinism and grafting Arminianism in its room, greedily laid hold on the subsequent publication of the Histrio-mastix; by the help of logical inferences from which the bishop and his understrapper, Heylin, procured the prosecution of this incorrigible Protestant; who was sentenced in the Star-Chamber to have his book burnt by the hangman; to be himself expelled from Lincoln's Inn; disabled for ever to act as a lawyer, degraded from his university degree; set twice on the pillory; have his ears cut off; be imprisoned for life; and fined in £5000, a moiety whereof very probably went to Mr. Heylin, for his dexterity in drawing logical inferences, and for his activity in publishing a treatise (before the trial came on) setting forth the punishments which the court expected should be inflicted on such offenders as Mr. Prynne. But whether Heylin came in for any of the £5000 or not, the author of his life, immediately after the passage last quoted from him, adds: "For the reward of which and other good services that, with wonderful prudence as well as diligence, he faithfully performed, his majesty was graciously pleased to requite him by bestowing on him the parsonage of Houghton, in the bishopric of Durham, which afterwards he exchanged with Dr. Marshall, for the parsonage of Alesford in Hampshire, that was about the same value; to which exchange he was commanded by his majesty, that he might live nearer the court for readiness to do his majesty's service;" [and laudable service it was, if we may judge of the whole by the sample.] "Neither was he envied for this or his other preferences, because every one knew his merits the only cause of his promotion." ib. And so much for Heylin and his merits; some of which, I suppose, consisted in being a pandour for popery, several of his books, but especially his History of the Reformation, having been the means, it is believed (says the life-writer, p. 21, 25) of pervert-

Jews and are not, out are found liars. To these stubborn things we are to appeal; by these every subscriber is bound, and from these our doctrines must be learnt.

Before we quit the reign of King Edward, I must advert to what you deliver (page 89) concerning Bishop Ponet's catechism, which you find yourself under the necessity of confessing to have been "set forth by the command of King Edward VI." This Dr. Ponet, or rather Poynt, was in 1550 translated from the see of Rochester to Winchester, upon the deprivation of that ecclesiastical butcher, Stephen Gardiner. In the year 1553 came out, cum privilegio, two editions, one in Latin, the other in English, of this excellent prelate's catechism; in which form of sound words (clearly exhibiting the sense both of the Church and legislature) those doctrines, which you have presumed to brand for Calvinistic and Methodistical, are asserted, explained, and enforced. You, indeed, tell us that "the free-agency of man is not there denied." The word free-agency is not mentioned; but the thing is denied peremptorily, in the Arminian sense of it; for thus runs part of the catechism: "From the ing "some persons, and those of the most illustrious quality, from the Protestant faith to Popery;" after which is added the following passage from bishop Burnet, who observes that Dr. Heylin "delivers many things in such a manner and so strangely that one would think he had been secretly set on to it by those of the Church of Rome; though I doubt not (says the bishop) but he was a sincere Protestant, but violently carried away by some particular conceits." To which the biographer's answer is this, page 25: "If it be true that any have embraced the Roman faith by means of that book, (f) he (Burnet) may conclude them to be very incompetent judges in the matters of religion that will be prevailed upon to change it by the perusal of one single history." A very flimsy vindication from so heavy a charge! See Heylin's Life, prefixed to his Miscellaneous Tracts, in fol. 1681.

I thought the reader would not be displeased to see a sketch of that man's character, whose name and writings are still so precious in the estimation of high-flown Arminians and Tories. I shall only prolong this large note with one observation more: viz. What can we think of the Protestantism of that clergyman who has left it on record as a settled opinion that the death of king Edward VI. (though succeeded by the butcheries of a Popish reign) was rather a benefit than a detriment to the Church of England? Yet this says Heylin. His words are—"Scarce had they brought it to this pass when king Edward died; whose death I cannot reckon for an infelicity to the Church of England; for being ill-principled in himself, and easily inclined to embrace such counsels as were offered to him, it is not to be thought, &c." Hist. Ref. Pref. p. 4. This Protestant history was dedicated by the Protestant Doctor to his Protestant majesty king Charles the Second, to whom the above mentioned Protestant remark could not fail of being peculiarly pleasing.

Such was the man whom Dr. Nowell has ventured to commend and to quote. I fancy that by this time the reader will think, with me, that Dr. Nowell (like Charles the First, whom he is not ashamed to stite the best of Kings) is rather unhappy in the choice of his favourites.

(e) Heylin owns this: Life of Laud, p. 122. The Arminians afraid to trust the discussion of their doctrines to the Convoca-

same spirit also cometh our sanctification, the love of God and of our neighbour, justice and uprightness of life. Finally, to say all in summe, whatever is in us, or may be done of us, honest, true, pure, and good, that altogether springeth out of this most pleasant rock, from this most plenteous fountain, the goodness, love, choice and unchangeable purpose of God: he is the cause; the rest are the fruits and effects." You add, that in this catechism "universal redemption is not denied." Nor is the baptism of bells. Were we to go by your negative rule of interpretation, there would be no end to chicanery, absurdities, and mistakes. This I know, and this you know, if you ever cast your eye on the performance now under consideration, that in it eternal, personal, gratuitous, and irreversible election is asserted; whence a limited redemption necessarily follows; unless you will suppose that, in the judgment of the Church, the will of God the Father and the will of God the Redeemer were discordant, and that the latter exceeded his commission by dying for more than the former gave him in charge to save. But, on the contrary, the catechism before us evidently restrains redemption to the elect of God (whether rightly or wrongly is not the present question; I am only proving a fact) who are thus described: "Immortality and blessed life God hath provided for his chosen before the foundations of the world were laid." And again, that through the alone benefit of Christ's sacrifice and cross, "All the sins of all believers, from the beginning of the world, are pardoned by the sole mercy of God." The grace by which men are made true believers, and which is the very root of all real sanctification, is farther represented as the special gift and work of the Holy Ghost: "The Holy Ghost is called holy not only for his own holiness, but because the elect of God and the members of Christ are made holy by him." Now if they only who should believe were redeemed by Christ's sacrifice; and if their belief itself be a part of that sanctification which is wrought by the Holy Ghost; and if this sanctification is peculiar to the elect of God; then, according to this catechism, only the elect of God were redeemed by Christ. You tell us, moreover, referring to this valuable monument of good old church-doctrine, "Nor is the indefectibility of the elect asserted." Indeed but it is, in terms tantamount. The witnessing Spirit of Christ in the hearts of those who are there styled "The fore-chosen, predestinate, and appointed to everlasting life before the world was made," is expressly termed the "author, earnest, and unfaillable pledge of their faith." But was that faith either totally or finally admissible, the pledge by which it is ascertained could not be called unfaillable; for that faith itself must necessarily be unfaillable which has an unfaillable pledge. Besides, God the Holy Spirit could not, with any sort of truth or propriety, be the earnest of their inheritance, if the inheritance itself was precarious, and suspended on conditions of uncertain performance. An earnest is actually a part of payment, and so much of the inheritance advanced beforehand and which ensures the remainder; otherwise it would be no earnest at all. An argument in favour of the saints' final perseverance which I defy all the excuti-fidians in the world (as bishop Hall, no less justly than smartly, terms them) to answer.

You say too little, when you tell us that this catechism "speaks in pretty high terms of election and predestination." It speaks of those doctrines in terms the highest and the strongest: as also of original sin; the utter impotence of man's will by nature, in spiritual things; the eternity and immutability of God's decrees; the absolute freeness of justification; and the efficaciousness of divine grace, by which (as the very words are) "we are made to do those good works which God had appointed for us to walk in." I shall only add one or two very remarkable particulars concerning this excellent catechism. 1. It was published the very next year after the framing and setting forth our Church articles: and therefore may be considered as a professed explication and enlargement of them. 2. I have good reason to believe that, during the short remainder of king Edward's reign, it was usually prefixed to and bound up with those articles. 3. It was prefaced by the king himself, with an authoritative epistle of recommendation, strictly enjoining and commanding, "All schoolmasters whatsoever within his dominions, as they did reverence his authority, and would avoid his royal displeasure, to teach this catechism diligently and carefully in all and every their schools, that so the youth of the kingdom might be settled in the grounds of true religion, and furthered in God's worship."——I think it is sufficiently plain that Arminianism had no footing in the Church of England while headed by our English Josiah. Which, I presume, was the chief reason that made your beloved Peter Heylin impudently term this excellent young monarch (the first Protestant King we ever had) ill-principled.

Come we now to the reign of queen Elizabeth. Under this great princess, the Church of England raised its head again, and matters went happily on in the old Protestant Calvinistic channel. Of this many and ample proofs might be given. I shall offer a very decisive one, upon the authority of the worthy and laborious Mr.

Strype: a historian, whose attachment to our Church was indisputable, and whose faithfulness in relating facts, even when those facts make against his own favourite opinions (for he appears to have been an Arminian) is equally remarkable and praiseworthy. "We are to know," says this respectable annalist, "that, among those who now professed the gospel, there were considerable numbers differing from the rest, that followed some foreign divines of great name in the point of predestination; denying the doctrine of God's being any cause of the sins of men, and thereby of their damnation. One of these was Thomas Talbot, parson of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street, London. Those of this persuasion were mightily cried out against by the other, as Free-willers, Pelagians, Papists, Anabaptists, and the like: but they took their opportunity to address the bishops; plainly declaring their opinions and their sufferings, as well as others, for the gospel; and desiring therefore the favour of some act of parliament, to enjoy the liberty of their consciences without restraint or punishment (which some threatened) as others of the queen's Protestant subjects did. "I meet" [adds Mr. Strype] "with such a petition to the Church, the exact time whereof does not appear: but it being evident it was near the beginning of the queen's reign, and while a parliament was sitting, I venture to place it here," [i. e. under the year 1562, the very year that our articles of religion were revised and re-established, as we now have them]. The petition, says Mr. Strype "was exhibited by the fore-said Talbot." After which, he gives the petition itself at full length, (see Strype's Annals of the first twelve years of Queen Eliz. chap. xxviii. p. 293—296). The petition represents that the grand point wherein the petitioners differed from the other protestants was their holding "that God does fore-know and predestinate all good and goodness, but doth only fore-know, and not predestinate, any evil, wickedness, or sin, in any behalf." For thus thinking, they complained that they were "Esteemed and taken of their brethren the Protestants, for fautors of false religion; and are constrained hitherto to sustain at their hands, daily, the shameful reproach and infamy of Free-will-men, Pelagians, Papists, Epicures, Anabaptists, and enemies to God's holy predestination and providence; with other such-like opprobrious words; and threatenings of such-like, or as great punishments and corrections as upon any of the aforesaid errors and sects is meet and due to be executed."—Then the petitioners intreat that they may enjoy their opinion of God's not being the predestinator of evil, "Without any prejudice or suspicion to be had towards them of the opprobrious infamy of such heretical names above-named." And that none of those corrections, punishments, and executions, which the clergy hath in their authority already, and hereafter, by the authority of this present parliament, henceforth shall have in their authority, to exercise upon any of the aforesaid errors and sects, or any other; shall in no wise extend to be executed upon any manner of person or persons as do hold of predestination as is above declared: except it be duly proved that the same person or persons do, by their express words or writings, affirm or maintain that man, of his own natural power, is able to think, will, or work, of himself, any thing that should in any case help or serve towards his own salvation, or any part thereof.

From all which I conclude as follows: 1. That on the accession of queen Elizabeth the Church of England was re-established upon the old Calvinistic bottom on which king Edward had left it. 2. That our Protestant bishops and clergy were then more highly Calvinistic than, perhaps, the Scriptures will warrant: as holding that God was the author both of man's sin and damnation. 3. That nevertheless those persons who did not hold this were looked upon as differing from the rest of our Protestant Churchmen. 4. That our English divines did, in general, carry their notions of God's decrees to this great length: parson Talbot and his followers being expressly said to have imbibed their qualified notions of predestination from foreign divines. That part, therefore, of the present fashionable system which would exempt moral and penal evil from falling under God's decree, is not of English but of foreign growth. 5. Those who held this opinion of God's not being any cause of sin and damnation were, at that time, mightily cried out against by the main body of our reformed Church, as fautors of false religion. 6. That Free-will-men were ranked among Pelagians, Papists, Epicures, Anabaptists, and the enemies to God's holy predestination and providence. 7. That to be called a Free-will-man was looked upon as a shameful reproach and opprobrious infamy: yea, that a person so termed was deemed heretical, and that the doctrine and abettors of free-will were numbered among those errors and sects which called for the correction of the civil magistrate. 8. That the opposers of predestination were then a good deal more modest than they are at present. The parson of Milk-street, who was agent for the rest, only requested an act of toleration for himself and his brethren: which demonstrated a consciousness of their differing from the Church established. 9. As those sort of people were then more modest, so they were much more orthodox, than the modern Arminians. The Semi-pelagians of queen Elizabeth's reign were, as we have seen, very ready to consent that any ecclesiastical or civil penalty should be levied on those who should, "By their express words or writings affirm and maintain that man, of his own natural power, is able to think, will, or work of himself, any thing that should in any case help or serve towards his own salvation, or any part thereof." Where is the Arminian now who would make such a concession as this? Nay, Where is now the Arminian who does not stiffly maintain the very reverse? Whence I infer that our new Anti-Calvinists are as much degenerated from their forefathers as those forefathers degenerated from the purity of the Protestant faith in general, and from that of our own national Church in particular.

Every man, who has eyes to read, must see that at the restoration of the Church of England under queen Elizabeth the Church was Calvinistic as to doctrinals. Else, where had been either the necessity or the propriety of presenting such a petition as this, craving liberty and indulgence to those who differed from the heads of the Church only in not believing the absolute predestination of evil? Nothing can be more evident than that the bishops and clergy, to whom that petition was addressed believed the predestination of all actions and events whatever, evil as well as good; otherwise the petitioners would never have thought themselves in danger for not believing it.

Page 79, you enter on an academical transaction of a very different kind from that in which you have been recently concerned. I mean the expulsion (for such it virtually was) of the reverend Mr. William Barrett, fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, from that university, in the year 1595, for not being a Calvinist. This gentleman, in a sermon preached at St. Mary's for his degree of bachelor in divinity, had the courage to deny the doctrines of assurance of salvation; the certainty of a true believer's final perseverance; and the eternity and unconditionality of reprobation: interlarding his harangue with fierce invectives against Calvin, Beza, Zanchy, and other great lights of the Protestant Church. This sermon was preached April 29. (x) On the 5th of May following,

(x) For the process against him, see Strype's Life of Whitgift, p. 436.

(y) Besides, Prynne was a loyal man, even in Dr. Nowell's sense of the word. He was devotedly attached to the interest of Charles II., and for that reason was excluded from the House of Commons in the year 1661. Charles himself, ungrateful as he naturally and generally was, was yet so sensible of his obligations to Mr. Prynne that on his restoration,

Barrett was summoned before the consistory of doctors, where a solemn recantation was enjoined him, which he read publicly in the same pulpit of St. Mary's, May 10.—For this, you tell us, "We have the authority of that loyal and godly author, Mr. Prynne." Whether Mr. Prynne was really a godly man, or only such in pretence (which your irony seems to insinuate), must be left to the decision of the Judge who cannot err. But as to Mr. Prynne's loyalty, suffer me to remind you, sir, that true loyalty extends to one's country, as well as to the prince: and that to oppose tyranny is no breach of loyalty, but an essential branch of it. Loyalty (as the very word imports) is such an attachment to the king and people, as is founded on the laws: and a hair's breadth beyond law, true loyalty does not go. So allegiance is obedience, ad legem, according to law. Whenever therefore (as was eminently the case in Mr. Prynne's time), a prince oversteps law, loyalty itself obliges a loyal people to say to such a prince, as the Almighty to the sea, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further."<sup>(y)</sup>—With regard to the authority of Mr. Prynne's Anti-Arminianism, the treatise wherein Barrett's recantation of his Arminian errors is recorded, please to remember that the treatise was published little more than thirty years after the affair happened: and, had a tittle of Mr. Prynne's account been untrue, there were enough living who both remembered the fact, and could very easily have refuted our loyal and godly author. (z)—However, the matter is very far from depending entirely on Mr. Prynne's testimony. He refers his reader [Anti-Arm. p. 66.] to bishop Carlton's "Examination of Montague's Appeal;" and to Browne's Appendix to the "Life of Queen Elizabeth." He moreover gives us the recantation, in Latin, as it was delivered; transcribed from the original copy, in Barrett's own hand-writing; which Latin copy, he tells us, differs from his English translation of it only in this one respect, namely, that so much of our 17th article as relates immediately to predestination, and is but mentioned in the English, was inserted in Barrett's own copy, and recited by him at full length, when he was forced to unravel his web at St. Mary's.—The industrious Mr. Fuller, in his History of Cambridge, gives the same account in all material points, with Mr. Prynne, of Barrett's recantation; which having set he made him keeper of the records in the Tower, a place worth 500*l.* per ann., which he enjoyed till his death, which happened in the year 1669. See the Biographical Dictionary. See also Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 149.

(z) Strype himself appeals to Prynne's testimony as unexceptionable and valid. Life of Whitgift, p. 436.

down at large, he thus concludes: "This recantation was, by the doctors, peremptorily enjoined him; that on the Saturday following, immediately after the clerum, he should go up into the pulpit of St. Mary's (where he had published these errors), and there openly, and in the face of the university, read and make this recantation; which by him was done accordingly, but not with that remorse and humility as was expected: for after the reading thereof, he concluded thus, hæc dixi; as if all had been oral, rather than cordial. (a) Yea, soon after he departed the university; got beyond sea; turned papist; returned into England; where he led a lay-man's life until the day of his death." [Hist. Cambr. p. 151.] But I have yet another authority to allege. The great and famous Dr. John Edwards, who flourished in the reigns of king William and queen Anne, and was both a member of the university of Cambridge, and one of its brightest ornaments, informs us that there is a manuscript preserved in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, which puts the certainty of Barrett's recantation beyond all doubt. The doctor's words are; "More of this nature, relating to Mr. Barrett's case, may be seen in that valuable manuscript, which is kept in Trinity-college library, which MS. Mr. Strype, in his Life of Whitgift, very often appeals to. And" [adds the doctor] "from this excellent collection, may be confuted that groundless suggestion and conceit of Heylin, in Quinqu. Hist. that Barrett did not recant: for here it is recorded at length; and several copies of his own" [i. e. Barrett's] "Letters, do expressly own as much." Veritas Redux, p. 535.

For my own part, I cannot say that I approve the method of obliging any person to make a forced, pretended recantation of what he really believes to be true. It is a very high species of persecution; and calculated not to work conviction, but to make men hypocrites. Besides, as a writer of the first abilities observes, "The arbitrary imposition of opinions naturally creates a reluctance to the reception of them: and as in the collision of bodies, so of minds, the repelling force is equal to that which impels." But still the fact proves the university to have been Calvinists in judgment: otherwise they would never have inflicted censures on one of their own body, purely for broaching Arminian doctrines. Part of the very letter, which you yourself quote (written on this occasion, by the Cambridge divines, to archbishop Whitgift), renders my assertion indubitable: wherein the university observe to that prelate that Barrett had advanced untruths "Against the religion of our Church, publicly received, and always held in her majesty's reign, and maintained in all sermons, disputations, and lectures." (b)—I own, sir, it must be peculiarly grating to you, to be confronted with such an academical act as this: but, I suppose you comfort yourself with Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis.

Yet, remember, that though men and fashions may vary, truth does not: and what was Church of England doctrine in queen Elizabeth's reign is so still. You need not be informed who it is that says, "Veritati nemo præscribere potest: non spatia temporum; non patrocinia personarum; non privilegium regionum."

Next come the celebrated Lambeth articles. These you labour with all your might to depreciate: and good reason why; because the testimony they bear to the avowed Calvinism of the prelates and other eminent clergymen who agreed upon them is too glaring and full to the point. I shall give some account of these famous articles in the words of a historian already referred to, whose signal opportunities of information, and, above all, whose transparent integrity, entitle him to the esteem of all parties. "Now also began some opinions about predestination, free-will, perseverance, &c., much to trouble both the schools and pulpit:" [i. e. in the year 1595.] "whereupon, archbishop Whitgift, out of his Christian care to propagate the truth, and suppress the opposite errors, caused a solemn meeting of many grave and learned divines, at Lambeth: where, besides the archbishop; Richard Bancroft, bishop of London; Richard Vaughan, bishop elect of Bangor; Humphrey Tindal, dean of Ely; doctor Whitaker, queen's professor in Cambridge, and others, were assembled. These, after a serious debate, and mature deliberation, resolved, at last, on the now following articles:

"1. Deus, ab æterno prædestinavit quosdam ad vitam: quosdam reprobovit ad mortem."

God, from eternity, hath predestinated certain men unto life: certain men he hath reprobed unto death.

"2. Causa movens, aut efficiens, prædestinationis ad vitam, non est prævisio fidei, perseverantiæ, aut bonorum operum, aut ullius rei, quæ insit in personis prædestinatis: sed sola voluntas beneplaciti Dei."

The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works,

(a) See Strype, ibid., p. 436, 437, and 441.

(b) See also Strype, p. 446.

or of any thing that is in the persons predestinated: but only the good will and pleasure of God.

“3. Prædestinatorum præfinitus et certus est numerus; qui nec augeri, nec minui potest.”

There is pre-determined a certain number of the predestinate, which can neither be augmented, nor diminished.

“4. Qui non sunt prædestinati ad salutem, necessario, propter peccata sua, damnabuntur.”

Those who are not predestinated to salvation shall necessarily be damned for their sins.

“5. Vera, viva, et justificans fides, et spiritus Dei justificantis, non extinguitur, non excidit, non evanescit, in electis, aut finalitèr, aut totalitèr.”

A true, living, and justifying faith, and the spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, falleth not away, vanisheth not away, in the elect, either finally or totally.

“6. Homo verè fidelis, id est, fide justificante præditus, certus est, plerophoriâ fidei, de remissione peccatorum suorum, et salute sempiternâ suâ per Christum.

A man truly faithful, that is, such a one who is endued with justifying faith, is certain, with the full assurance of faith of the remission of his sins, and of his everlasting salvation by Christ.

“7. Gratia salutaris non tribuitur, non communicatur, non conceditur universis hominibus, quâ servari possint si velint.”

Saving grace is not given, is not communicated, is not granted, to all men, by which they may be saved if they will.

“8. Nemo potest venire ad Christum, nisi datum ei fuerit, et nisi Pater eum traxerit: et omnes homines non trahuntur à Patre, ut veniant ad Filium.”

No man can come unto Christ, except it shall be given unto him, and unless the Father shall draw him: and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to the Son.

“9. Non est positum in arbitrio, aut potestate unius cujusque hominis servari.”

It is not in the will or power of every one to be saved.

Fuller's Church Hist. b. ix. p. 229.

After which, our historian gives us the letter, sent by Dr. Matthew Hutton, archbishop of York, to his brother of Canterbury, testifying his concurrence with, and approbation of, the above articles.

Your grand fundamental objection, sir, to these articles is your hatred of the doctrines they contain. This is the worm that lies at the root of your exceptions. 1. You tell us (page 82,) that “They are no part of our faith.” You should have said, of your own faith. I am sorry for it. I am sure they ought. 2. They were never “Established by any legal authority.” I answer with Fuller, “That, as medals of gold and silver, though they will not pass in payment for current coin, yet will go with goldsmiths for as much as they are in weight; so, though these articles” are not [as that historian observes,] “Provincial acts, yet will they be readily received of orthodox Christians, as far as their own purity bears conformity to God's word:—and will be taken as witnesses beyond exception; whose testimony is an infallible evidence what was the general and received doctrine of England, in that age, about the fore-named controversies.” (Fuller, ib. p. 232.)—

3. You add, “They are urged against us by the author of the Confessional.” What if they are? Does that in the least impair their value? I am only concerned that any who now call themselves members of our Church should, by deserting her principles, lay themselves open to the scoffs of such authors.—4. “They gave great offence, not only in the university, but at court.” Offence they could not give to the university; except only to a few heterodox individuals, whose innovating tenets were in danger of public suppression by counter decisions so clear and peremptory.—Whether or no they gave any real offence at court, is questionable. But, if they even did, it can be no matter of wonder to those who consider the character of queen Elizabeth, and how tenderly jealous (c) she was of her own supremacy in ecclesiastical matters. The articles had been transmitted to Cambridge without her leave: which alone had been enough to displease a monarch of less haughtiness than Elizabeth; who was too much her father's own daughter, and too tenacious of her prerogative, to smile on any measures that had not received the previous sanction of her approbation. For the same reason, that archbishop Whitgift is said to have resented (d) the university proceedings against Barrett (observe he did not resent their condemnation of Barrett's tenets, for of these the archbishop openly avowed his detestation, (see Strype, p. 447.) as much as they; but their presuming to proceed judicially against that innovator, by virtue of their own sole

(c) See Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 194.

(d) This gave occasion to that excellent letter of apology, sent to the archbishop from Cambridge: for which see Strype's Whitgift, p. 437. Barrett had been beforehand with the university in writing to the archbishop; which artful expedient did at first prejudice the prelate in his favour. See Strype, p. 438. Conscious, however, of the badness of his cause, he began to trim, and to eat up part of his assertions. See Strype's Appendix to Whitgift p. 188.

authority and without first consulting with their metropolitan. (e) For the same reason (mutatis mutandis), Elizabeth herself resented, if it be true that she did resent, the subsequent proceedings of Whitgift. At all events this is certain, that her extreme affection for that prelate did not suffer her resentment to proceed far, or to continue long. (f) One Corvinus, a noted Dutch Arminian, in a book of his, published beyond sea, seems to have been one of the first who made public mention of the queen's displeasure at this supposed invasion of her prerogative. Concerning the degree of credit due to this foreign writer, who affected to know more of our English affairs than the English themselves, let us hear the candid and judicious historian last cited: As for Corvinus, as we know not whence he had this intelligence, so we find no just ground for what he reporteth, [viz.] That Archbishop Whitgift, for his pains incurred the queen's displeasure and a præmunire. We presume this foreigner better acquainted with the imperial law and local customs of Holland, than with our municipal statutes and the nature of a præmunire. Indeed, there goes a tradition that the queen should, in merriment, say jesting to the archbishop, 'My Lord, I now shall want no money; for I am informed all your goods are forfeited to me, by your calling a council without my consent; but how much of truth herein, God knows. And be it referred to our learned in the law, whether without danger of such a censure the two archbishops by virtue of their place had not an implicit leave from the queen to assemble divines, for the clearing, declaring, and asserting of difficult truths, provided they innovate or alter nothing in matters of religion.' Fuller, p. 232. (g)

As to lord Burleigh's supposed disapprobation of the articles, I apprehend it is nothing to the purpose, even admitting it to be true. (h) That great person was certainly a very able statesman; but it does not therefore follow that he was a good divine. The famous Mr. Wilkes is, in the opinion of very many, a passable politician; yet I question whether you yourself (though, like you, he is far enough from being a Calvinist) would venture to pronounce that gentleman a consummate theologian.

In consequence of these articles approved of at Lambeth, and thence sent to Cambridge, Peter Baroe, D.D. and Margaret-professor, chose rather to quit the university than either to relinquish his Arminianism, or profess himself a Calvinist when he was not so. The matter is thus related by Fuller: "The end of Dr. Peter Baroe's triennial lectures began to draw near. Now, though custom had made such courtesy almost become a due to continue the same professor, where no urgent reasons to the contrary were alledged; yet the university intended not to re-elect him for the place: meaning fairly to cut him off at the just joint (which would be the less pain and shame unto him) when his three years should be expired. He himself was sensible thereof: and, besides, he saw the articles of Lambeth, lately sent to the university; and foresaw that subscription thereunto should be expected from, yea, imposed on him; to which he could not condescend, and therefore chose to quit his place. So that his departure was not his free act out of voluntary election; but that whereunto his will was necessarily determined: witness his own return to a friend requiring of him the cause of his withdrawing: "Fugio," said he, "ne fugarer; I fly for fear of being driven away." Some conceive this had measure to one of Dr. Baroe's qualifications: for, 1. He was a foreigner, a Frenchman: 2. He was a great scholar, &c. Others alledged that, in such cases of conscience, there lies no plea for courtesy; and that Baroe, as he was a stranger, had brought in strange doctrines, - to the infecting the university, the fountain of learning and

(e) See Strype, ib. p. 440. And in this, the university certainly acted imprudently; Whitgift being then at the head of the ecclesiastical commission, and also having a peculiar jurisdiction over Cambridge, pro tempore; the see of Ely being then vacant. In short, the dispute between the archbishop and the university was little else but a mere struggle for power. The heads at Cambridge were, at last, apprehensive that in their scuffle with the archbishop concerning the extent of his jurisdiction over them, the truths of religion might eventually suffer; wherefore they present to him a very respectful, but very nervous, petition: which see in Strype, p. 451.

Soon after, Barrett was, by the archbishop's order, strictly examined at Cambridge, upon these eight questions; which, with his answers, see in Strype, p. 452, 453. Then examined again at Lambeth, before the archbishop in person, p. 457; and another form of recantation (more moderate and qualified than that he had before delivered at St. Mary's) was drawn up at Lambeth, with Barrett's consent, and transmitted to Cambridge; but which, however, this prevaricating Pelagian delayed to make, p. 457, 458. The whole affair is summed up by the archbishop himself, as follows: and is such a proof of this prelate's Calvinism as must for ever leave it incontestible, p. 453, 459.

Here, properly, come in the Lambeth articles; p. 461, which were sent to Cambridge, accompanied with a letter from the archbishop, which breathes the true spirit of a Christian and a Protestant, p. 462: yet was he firmly persuaded of the truth of the doctrine asserted in these articles, p. 463. See Sand. Pax. Eccles. p. 61.

(f) See Strype, p. 464. She was, however, enraged at Baroe's impudence in presuming to preach against the Calvinistic doctrines, as we shall presently see.

(g) A Cambridge divine, so low down as 1634, was stopped of his degree, for seeming to nibble at the doctrine of justification by faith only. See Usher's Letters, p. 470.

(h) It is extremely questionable whether he did quite dislike them. See Strype, 464.

religion; and therefore archbishop Whitgift designed the removing," [or, as Dr. Nowell would have termed it, the Amotion] "of him from his place." [Hist. of Camb. sect. vii. p. 21, 22.] (i)

I shall subjoin the account given by Dr. Edwards of these celebrated Lambeth articles, who, after setting them down as I have cited them above, adds: "The archbishop of Canterbury, in the letter to the vice-chancellor of the university, when he sent Dr. Tindal and Dr. Whitaker back from Lambeth with these articles, professed that he thought them to be true, and correspondent to the doctrine professed in the Church of England and established by the laws of the land. And again, in his letter to Dr. Nevil, master of Trinity college, he asserts the propositions to be undoubtedly true, and not to be denied of any sound divine. Matthew Hutton, archbishop of York, in the close of his letter to archbishop Whitgift, adds these words: "Hæ theses ex sacris literis, vel aperte colligi, vel necessariâ consecutione deduci possint, et ex scriptis Augustini." i. e. These positions may plainly be gathered out of the sacred Scriptures, or by necessary consequence may be deduced out of them and St. Augustine's writings. (k) John Young, bishop of Rochester, in a letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, allowed of all the articles but one: 'I am something doubtful,' saith he, 'of the fourth proposition, because I do not perfectly understand it: for the rest I have no manner of scruple.' The determination of Dr. Launcelot Andrews concerning these articles is also set down in the Trinity college manuscript, whence I had the foregoing informations. He (bishop Andrews) agrees with the archbishop as to the main, and submits his judgment to the censure of that prelate. There likewise we have Dr. Bisse's opinion of the propositions, wherein he fully gives his suffrage in their behalf, and distinctly sets it down according to the order of the propositions. This and the other particular testimonies may be seen in that fore-mentioned manuscript, which is a standing confutation of those false things that are told by Dr. Heylin concerning the articles of Lambeth, and particularly of that calumny which another of the same genius hath had the confidence to publish to the world, namely, (l) that archbishop Whitgift did not in the least approve of the theses, but yet subscribed to them out of facility and fear of discord. (m) The contrary manifestly appears from that choice collection of papers which I have made use of, and which was compiled by the archbishop himself, or by his order, so as it may be looked upon as his, which I gather from the manuscript itself, it being bound up in a leather cover, on which are the arms belonging to the archbishop's see. From the whole we may conclude what was the judgment of the prelates and other divines of the Church of England in queen Elizabeth's time concerning those high points. Yea, indeed, the conclusion is made to our hand; for the force of truth hath drawn this acknowledgment from one of our chief adversaries, that in those times 'Predestination and the points depending thereupon were received as the established doctrines of the Church of England.' [Heylin's Life of Laud, p. 51.] And again, 'The books of Calvin were the rule by which all men were to square their writings; his only word, like the ipse dixit of Pythagoras, was admitted for the sole canon to which they were to frame and conform their judgments.' He adds, 'It was safer for any man in those times to have been looked upon as a heathen or publican than an Anti-Calvinist.' (n) [Ibid. p. 52.] Veritas Redux, p. 537, 538.

It will appear, sir, even to yourself, how greatly mistaken you are in asserting so confidently that the Lambeth articles gave offence in the university, when you consider the letter sent by the university to their chancellor, the lord Burleigh, within four months after those articles had been agreed upon at Lambeth. We have it at length in Heylin's Quinquarticular History, part iii. chap. xxii.; and, I dare believe, this writer has been very careful not to give it in stronger terms than it was written: a historian of his bigotted complexion is more likely to have castrated such a monument of Cambridge Calvinism than added to its vigour. However, in this letter, even as preserved by him, I find the following passages: "The peace of this university and Church being brought into peril by the late reviving of new opinions and troublesome controversies among us, hath urged us, in regard of the places we here sustain, not only to be careful for suppressing the same to our power, but also to give your lordship further information hereof. About a year past (among divers others who have attempted to preach new and strange opinions in religion) one Mr. Barrett, more bold than the rest, did preach divers Popish errors in

(i) The queen was enraged with Baroe, for his impudence and ingratitude, shown in his presuming to preach against the Calvinistical doctrine; Strype, p. 464, 465, and so was the archbishop, who was Hutton, archbishop of York, p. 476. The articles, for which this French Semi-pelagian was accused, were chiefly four. Strype, p. 470.

St. Mary's, with whose fact and opinions your lordship was made acquainted by Dr. Some, the deputy vice-chancellor. Hereby offence and division growing, as after by Dr. Baroe's public lectures and determinations in the schools; contrary to Dr. Whitaker's and the sound received truth ever since her majesty's reign, we sent up to London, by common consent, in November last, Dr. Tyndal and Dr. Whitaker (men especially chosen for that purpose) for conference with my lord of Canterbury and other principal divines there; and that the controversies being examined, and the truth by their consents confirmed, the contrary errors and contentions thereabouts might the rather cease. By whose good travel, with sound consent in truth, such advice and care was taken, by certain propositions" [i. e. the Lambeth articles], "containing certain substantial points of religion taught and received in this university and Church during the time of her majesty's reign, and consented unto and published by the best approved divines both at home and abroad, for the maintaining of the truth and peace of the Church, as thereby we enjoyed here great and comfortable quiet, until Dr. Baroe (in January last, in his sermon ad clericum in St. Mary's, contrary to restraint and commandment from the vice-chancellor and the heads), by renewing again these opinions, disturbed our peace, whereby his adherents and disciples were and are too much emboldened to maintain false doctrine, to the corrupting and disturbing of this university and the Church, if it be not in time effectually prevented. Now, unless we should be careless of maintaining the truth of religion established, we cannot (being resolved and confirmed in the truth of the long-professed and received doctrine) but continue to use all good means and seek at your lordship's hands some effectual remedy hereof, lest, by permitting passage to these errors, the whole body of Popery should, by little and little, break in upon us to the overthrow of our religion. As we find, by late experience, it hath dangerously began." Such were the ideas which the university then entertained of those Arminian errors which have since grown so rampant among us! (o)

Presently after giving us the public letter, whence I have extracted the above passages, this very Heylin has the impudence to call Arminianism the genuine doctrine of the Church. And yet he dates the rise of this genuine doctrine from the time he there treats of, viz. the year 1595; and acknowledges, in effect, that Calvinism was the doctrine universally received in our Church until then. His words are: "Such was the condition of affairs at Cambridge at the expiring of the year 1595; the genuine doctrine of the Church" [by which he means Arminianism, propagated by Barrett, Baroe, and Harsnet] "beginning then to break through the clouds of Calvinism, wherewith it was before obscured." Yet he seems to lament that Arminianism made so slow a progress at that time; for he adds, "that there were some still left of the old predestination leaven." Strange that the Church of England should be without her genuine doctrines for the first fifty years after her establishment! I should rather have thought that the Arminian doctrines, which, by the confession of Heylin himself, did not begin to break through the clouds of Calvinism until the Church was half a century old, must, for that very reason, be looked upon as new and adventitious; and that, on the other hand, the old predestination leaven, which met with no considerable opposition until the year 1595, was and must have been the truly genuine doctrine of our English Church.

You next advert to the ever-memorable synod of Dort, held in the reign of James I., (p) which renowned assembly and its decisions have always been as great an eyesore to Arminians as ever the council and creed of Nice were to the Arians, or Geneva to his holiness of Rome. That the decrees passed in this synod are not binding in England is what I never knew so much as questioned. All that we refer to it for is to prove that our national Church was not then Arminianized, as appears from the character and principles of those English clergymen who, as representatives of the Church of England, were sent over to Holland to assist the foreign Churches in the solemn condemnation and proscription of the Arminian doctrines. This important convention was at Dort, where the synod, composed of the flower of the reformed Churches, was opened Nov. 13, 1618. Of all the councils that ever sat since the apostles' days, this was, perhaps, taking every thing into the account, by far the most respectable. Scarce ever, I believe, did the Christian world, before or since, see such a number of evangelical divines, so learned, so pious, so discreet, so candid, assembled together under one roof. The English divines, who made so eminent a figure in this synod, and whose orthodoxy, learning, and great abilities reflected so much honour on our church and nation, were George Carlton, D. D., then lord bishop of Llandaff, afterwards of Chichester; Joseph Hall, D. D., then dean of Worcester, afterwards successively bishop of Exeter and Norwich; John Davenant, D.D., then Margaret professor and master of Queen's college, Cambridge, afterwards bishop of Salisbury; and Samuel Ward, D.D., then master of Sidney college, Cambridge, and archdeacon of Taunton. To these was soon after added, as representative of the Church of Scotland, George Balcanquhall, B.D., and fellow of Pembroke hall. Dr. Hall, after about two months' stay in Holland, was forced, by want of health, to return to England (having first taken a most respectful and tenderly affectionate leave of the synod in a pious and elegant speech still extant), and was replaced by Thomas Goade, D.D., chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury. That these great divines, who represented our Church with such fidelity and ability, were every one of them doctrinal Calvinists, the reader may see for himself by consulting the acts and memorials of the synod, published at Dort, A.D. 1620, where the determinations of our English divines, their speeches, and their subscriptions, stand on record, and prove how deeply and how inexcusably we, in the present day, are revolted from our first love, and degenerated from our first faith.

I will not call the Arminian writers (as bishop Bull, not very politely, did the Arians) "mendacissimum genus hominum," a most lying set of men; but I cannot, without doing violence to truth, acquit them in general of artifice and wilful misrepresentation, hardly compatible with heathen honesty, and still less with Christian integrity, when they treat of doctrines and transactions relative to Calvinism. Even you, sir, do not seem to have quite escaped the ungenerous infection. Hence you venture to assure the world, p. 92, that "It was indeed in great measure owing to the heats and violence with which matters were carried in that synod, and the great severity of the horrible decrees" [a phrase you have apparently borrowed from Mr. John Wesley] "here framed, that our English divines who attended that synod began to have less reverence for the doctrines of Calvin." If ever there was a mistake in the world, this is one. I, as an individual of that public to whom you have submitted your pamphlet, have a right to call upon you for proof of this confident assertion. Bring forth your strong reasons, or the world will be at full liberty to draw conclusions not to your advantage. [g] and unanimity, than in this synod. The Arminians (who were cited to answer for themselves, as corrupters of the Church and disturbers of the state) did indeed endeavour all they could to embarrass and throw matters into confusion; and never did chicanery and insolence of the remonstrant sect more palpably appear than at that period. These mushroom-schismatics were in hopes, by raising a dust, to elude the censures they justly dreaded, and to catch some advantage to themselves by striving to occasion divisions in the synod; thus exactly treading in the steps of their good friends and cousin-germans, the Papists, who, ever since the first dawn of the reformation, have acted on the same plan and with the same views. But the venerable Dordracene fathers saw the drift of the Arminian faction, and happily defeated its wishes by standing together like a chain of rocks, which neither fraud nor force could shake nor sever. Nor were the divines of England staggered in their judgments upon their return hither from Dort, concerning either the justice and moderation of the synod's proceedings, or the orthodoxy of its decisions, as may, if need require, be easily and largely demonstrated from the writings of Hall, Carlton, Davenant, &c., published long enough afterwards. I therefore call, once more, on Dr. Nowell, as he is a clergyman and a man of honour, either to prove or to retract what he has (I would hope unadvisedly) advanced.

Nor can I wholly pretermitt your next paragraph, wherein you assure us that the learned Mr. Hales went to Dort "a rigid Calvinist; but there I bid John Calvin good night, said he to his friend Mr. Faringdon." The learned Mr. Hales both was and continued a Calvinist, as appears from that very book to which Mr. Faringdon's letter is prefixed. Yet, if he had changed his judgment ever so greatly, which, by the bye, he never did, if his own (r) subsequent writings are allowed to have the casting vote, still that would not affect the Church of England. He did not go to Dort invested with any public commission or character from this kingdom, but merely as a private person. (s) However, since you affect to lay so much weight on the pretended change of this learned man, I will subjoin what the famous Dr. Edwards delivers on the subject: "The sentiments of Mr. Hales, of Eton college, who was present at the synod of Dort, may be here inserted; for though some tell us that when Episcopius urged John iii. 16,

(g) Here might have been introduced the judgment of these divines at the synod, from the acts of it.

(r) See his Golden Remains, passim.

(s) He went to Holland in capacity of chaplain to Sir Dudley Carlton, James's ambassador to the States. Hence he came to be present at the synod at Dort, held at that time. Biog. Dict. vol. vi. p. 279.

this Mr. Hales 'bid John Calvin good night,' yet it is likely he was reconciled to him next morning; for his writings, that are since extant, give us the best account of his opinions. He expressly acknowledges the purpose of God's election and the purpose of God's reprobation in a sermon on Matth. xxvi. 75. And in another sermon, on Rom. xiv. 1, he tells us That some with favourable countenance of Scripture make the cause of reprobation only the will of God, determining freely of his own work as himself pleases, without respect to any second cause whatsoever. He owns that this doctrine may be profitably taught and heard, and that matter of singular exhortation may be drawn from it. And he adds, "It is a noble resolution so to humble ourselves under the hand of Almighty God as that we can with patience hear, yea, think it an honour, that so base creatures as ourselves should become the instruments of the glory of so great a majesty, whether it be by eternal life or by eternal death, though for no other reason but for God's good will and pleasure's sake." This is very high, and more than I have ventured to say; but thence we may gather what kindness this great man had for Calvin's opinions, yea, for that which is the most exceptionable of all, and how averse he was to Arminius's system of divinity. (t)

"And it is to be observed that Mr. Hales's book, wherein these passages are, is commended to the reader by two excellent divines of our Church, Dr. Pearson, (afterward bishop of Chester), and Mr. Faringdon, who were well skilled in these points. Which puts me in mind [N. B.] of what the former of these learned men told me when he was pleased to admit me to some discourse with him, namely, that 'when he (Bishop Pearson) was a young master of arts, he thought there was no difficulty in these grand articles [of predestination, &c.]; that he was able to determine any of them with ease, especially on the Arminians' side; but since he found it was otherwise; and he disapproved of men's rash censuring and condemning the other side; and, indeed, we may guess this to be his inclination, by his approving of Mr. Hales's remains." Verit. Red. p. 542, 543. Of all the English clergymen who assisted in the synod of Dort, the great and good bishop Hall was the longest survivor. The Arminian fanatic, John Goodwin, in his libel on the Protestant doctrines, entitled "Redemption Redeemed," published during the usurpation, slandered the synod with the blackest calumny his malice could invent, thinking that he might safely vend his falsehoods at a time when the far greater part of the persons who composed that apostolical assembly were gathered home to the Church triumphant. It was a happiness that we had, however, one excellent man living who was able, upon his own knowledge, to wipe off the aspersions of this bigotted miscreant. The pious, the aged bishop Hall, upon the coming out of Goodwin's book, wrote a pretty long letter to Fuller, which that historian published at full length in his Church History, b. x. p. 85. I wish I had room to transcribe the whole; but it concludes thus: "Since I have lived to see so foul an aspersion cast upon the memory of those worthy and eminent divines, I bless God that I yet live to vindicate them, by this my knowing, clear, and assured attestation, which I am ready to second with the solemnest oath, if I shall be thereto required.

"Your most devoted friend, &c.

"Higham, Aug. 30, 1651."

About two years after, the same incomparable prelate wrote another letter to the learned Mr. George Kendall (u) upon the same subject. The reader may see the whole of it in Mr. Kendall's Sancti Sancti, published in the bishop's life-time. The latter part of it is as follows: "My unhappy

(t) The very poets of that and the preceding times were Calvinists. See Spenser, Shakespeare, Waller, Quarles.

(u) This great man effectually answered John Goodwin's "Redemption Redeemed" in two separate treatises; the one entitled Θεοκρατία, or a Vindication of the Doctrine commonly received in the reformed Churches concerning God's Intentions of Special Grace and Favour to his Elect in the Death of Christ; as also concerning his Prerogative, Power, Prescience, Immutability, &c.: printed 1653. The other entitled Sancti Sancti, or the Common Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints vindicated: published in 1654. In these two volumes the doctrines of grace are explained, asserted, and defended with such solidity of nervous argument—such a display of useful learning—such transparent piety—such pleasing perspicuity—and the whole enlivened with such acumen of wit, as few controversial pieces, written in that age at least, can boast. If, after giving my opinion of this most excellent author, I may, without presumption, subjoin the attestation of the truly primitive bishop Hall, I would lay before the reader that most worthy prelate's letter to Mr. Kendall, signifying how greatly he approved, and even admired, the first of the above performances, which the author had made him a present of soon after its publication. A testimony from such a hand will at once enrich this note, give the utmost weight to my recommendation, and both gratify and edify such of my readers as have not met with it before. The bishop's letter is affixed to Sancti Sancti, between the dedication and the preface, and runs, verbatim as follows

"Worthy Mr. KENDALL,

"I cannot forbear, though with a sick hand, to signify my thankful receipt of your excellent work (the Θεοκρατία), part whereof I had eagerly perused before your welcome present came, and had desired my sonne to impart unto you my appreciative thoughts concerning it. I easily foresee how highly you will be tempted with applauses for so acceptable a service. I know I need not, but my tender love of you bids me, desire you, with a humble heart, to sing Non nobis Domine; but let the whole praise run clear back to that infinite bounty whence sickness called me off before the full conclusion of that work" [viz. the formal condemnation of the Arminians (called in Holland Remonstrants) by the synod of Dort]: "but I stayed so long as any public session or appearance of the Remonstrants continued. Thus much, in effect, I have formerly, upon the motion of my worthy successor at Waltham, Mr. Fuller, signified to him, as one who cannot but think it was one end of this unexpected protraction of my days, after all the rest of my fellows, that I might do this right to that godly reverend learned assembly. With the intimation whereof I bid you farewell in the Lord, and do heartily commend your studies to the divine benediction, professing myself

"Your loving and

When arguments fall short, it is too common with controversial writers to call names, and fling dirt, in hopes of casting an odium on what they find themselves unable to confute. I could wish, sir, that you had not stooped to this illiberal resource, your following expostulation had then been spared; page 93. "Consider what faction it was which then" [i. e. in the time of Charles I.] "prevailed towards the overthrow of the Church. Was it not that of the Puritans? And were not the doctrines of Calvinism their leading principles?" Permit me, sir, to ask, Were all the disturbers of those times Calvinists? Were Charles and his French queen; were Laud and Buckingham, Calvinists? These were the primary disturbers, whose evil counsels and whose arbitrary measures laid the sad foundation of those disturbances which issued in the overthrow of the Church. The confusions of that unhappy reign, and the miseries that followed, are to be radically charged, not on those who repressed the haughty strides of despotism, but on the despots themselves, whose violent proceedings rendered that opposition absolutely necessary. Matters at last were wound up to that fatal height that both sides found themselves reduced to the dismal necessity of going to much greater lengths than either of them foresaw at first setting out. On one hand there was a court equally despotic and corrupt, and, as the event proved, no less feeble than proud and unyielding. On the other there was patriotic zeal, gradually enflamed into party rage, by a long series of repeated insults and unrelenting oppressions. No wonder, therefore, that, under the confluence of such circumstances, the constitution received that eventual subversion which you, either through forgetfulness of history or by disingenuous misrepresentations, would, untruly and ridiculously, charge on the Calvinism of that age.

As Charles (x) and his court were far enough from inclining to the Geneva doctrines, so likewise were some who, though they agreed with that unfortunate prince as an Arminian, yet detested and resisted his measures as a tyrant, and even publicly justified the putting of him to death. Witness John Goodwin, (y) that virulent Anti-Calvinist, who wrote an elaborate treatise in professed vindication of Charles's murder, under the title of "A Defence of the Sentence passed on the late King by the High Court of Justice." This was the same John Goodwin who, about the same time, published his Redemption Redeemed, that infamous libel on the doctrines of the reformation, wherein he endeavours throughout to prove Calvin and all the reformed Churches in the wrong, and asserts universal redemption, free-will, justification by works, and falling from grace, not quite so smoothly, but altogether as tenaciously, as you yourself have done, or as the authors of your admired Popish book, the Pia et Catholica Institutio. Add to this (and deny it if you can), that those execrable enthusiasts who were the chief authors of Charles's these precious gifts came. And go on to improve those great parts to the further honour of the Giver.

"With my thankful acceptance of your comfortable letter and rich present I take leave, professing myself

"JOS. HALL, B. N."

"Higham, March 16, 1652."

Is it possible to read such an apostolical letter without being charmed with the venerable simplicity, improved by the sweet humility, and warmed with the experimental piety, which glow and shine in every sentence?

(x) There is indeed a book extant, published in 1651, entitled "Certamen Religiosum, or a Conference between the late King of England and the Lord Marquis of Worcester concerning Religion." It is written with great poignancy, clearness, and learning, and contains a most excellent defence of the Protestant faith, especially of those branches of which now go under the name of Calvinism.

Could the authenticity of this masterly performance be satisfactorily ascertained, it would effectually overthrow my supposition of Charles's attachment to Arminianism. If he can be really thought to have borne that part in the conference which this treatise represents, he did indeed literally merit the title of Defensor Fidei, and must have been as sound a Protestant as ever lived, and as strenuous a Calvinist as any Puritan in his whole dominion. But the book bears the signatures of a much finer genius and of far more extensive learning than Charles seems to have possessed, though his abilities were by no means inconsiderable. It was evidently written and fathered upon the king by some learned churchman who was a well wisher to his memory. I have great reason to think its author was archbishop Usher, who certainly was with the king at Ragland at the time the conference is said to have been held. See Parr's Life of Usher.

(y) For some account of this Arminian fanatic, see bishop Burnet's Own Times, vol. i. p. 67 and 163, folio; and Ant. Wood in several places.

execution were not Calvinistic divines (z) (for these were so far from approving of the king's murder that they offered a petition against it), but a rabble army, composed of the dregs of almost every sect, and particularly of Papists in disguise. (a) With regard to the Puritans, properly so called, many of whom had previously made a stand against the despotism arrogated by that misguided king and his delinquent ministers, these (the Puritans), to their credit be it said, joined with those of the Episcopalians who were undissembling lovers of the Church and of their country, in warding off the slavery which it was the endeavour of an infatuated court to obtrude; whence all, whether churchmen or dissenters, who were engaged in this noblest of causes, were lumped together, and stigmatized indiscriminately with the name of State Puritans. The friends of liberty and the constitution stood up in defence of both, not merely as Calvinists, but as Englishmen. What concern, for instance, had the doctrines of efficacious grace and final perseverance in the just opposition that was made to ship-money, star-chamber prosecutions, and ten thousand other intolerable grievances? Let me request you, sir, as you tender your own credit, to think before you write, and weigh matters with some degree of care. Had you done this lately, you had not attempted to palm such absurdities on the public. I must add, that the history of Charles's and the two preceding reigns makes it undeniable that those of the Puritans, who were non-conformists, did not dissent from our Church in doctrinal matters, but solely in the matter of rites and ceremonies. And what had this partial dissent to do with the doctrine of predestination, in which the main body, both of conformists and non-conformists, were reciprocally agreed? It is notorious that the latter had their name, not for disbelieving our doctrinal articles (which was never, that I can find, so much as laid to their charge), but for not conforming to our modes of worship. (b) If a Calvinist and a non-conformist were, as you would unjustly insinuate, convertible names, it would follow that we must un-church our own Church for the first hundred years after the Reformation, and date its genuine commencement from the introduction of Arminianism under archbishop Laud. That innovating, hot-headed prelate, if your premises are admitted, is to be considered as the father and founder of the Church of England; whereas he was, in reality, its corrupter, and its eventual destroyer; for he drove so rapidly towards Rome that he overset the Church, of which he unhappily held the reins, and was not a little accessory to the concomitant fall of the state likewise, which, rushing precipitant, entombed both his sovereign and himself in its ruins. I will only observe farther, that, even in the present century, we have had some Calvinistic bishops: bishop Beveridge and bishop Hopkins, for instance. And will you call these truly bright ornaments of our Church Sectarists, Puritans, and Methodists, because they were professed Calvinists?

The farther I advance in your pamphlet, the more my surprise and concern increase. In order to prove what you call the moderation of our articles, you are not content with distilling away and forcing off the sense and spirit of the doctrinal ones, but would even insinuate that the necessity of episcopal ordination itself is not determined in our articles. Treating of article XIII. you say (page 95), "The compilers were not willing to condemn or unchurch the reformed Churches abroad where episcopacy was not established, and therefore prudently avoided determining the question, whether episcopal ordination is necessary. Those who hold and those who deny the necessity of episcopal ordination may both subscribe to this article: those only are condemned by it who hold that a man may preach without any lawful vocation. The same moderation the compilers of our articles have observed in the points before us," i. e. in the Calvinistic ones. I can hardly believe my own eyes. So, rather than not expunge predestination from our articles, you would expunge with it the necessity of episcopal ordination! This is sweeping the Church clean indeed. Though the respect I bear you forbids me to treat your paragraph and your insinuation in the manner they deserve, yet the still greater respect which I bear to the Church constrains me to hang out the

(z) Very many Calvinists were on Charles's side; as Usher, Hopkins, Hall, &c.

(b) "Albeit the Puritans disquieted our Church about their conceived discipline, yet they never moved any quarrel against the doctrine of our Church. Which is well to be observed; for if they had embraced any doctrine which the Church of England denied, they would assuredly have quarrelled about that as well as they did about the discipline. But it was then the open confession, both of the Bishops and Puritans, that both parties embraced a mutual consent in doctrine; only the difference was in matter of in conformity. Then hitherto there was no Puritan doctrine, as distinct from that of bishops and clergy, known." Upon which passage, quoted from bishop Carleton's Examination of Montague's Appeal, Dr. Edwards makes this obvious remark: "This is a full confutation of that idle conceit, taken up by so many in our age, that the Anti-Arminian doctrines were not the doctrines of our Church, of our bishops, and of the rest of our clergy, but only of a few disciplinarians and nonconformists." Veritas Redux, p. 548.

detached paragraph to open view, and leave it to the public indignation. Whoever can persuade himself that our episcopal Church does not insist on the necessity of episcopal ordination may well enough believe, when his hand is in, that our Calvinistic Church has not determined in favour of the Calvinian doctrines. Nor does it follow that the Church of England in believing for herself the necessity of episcopal ordination, does thereby unchurch those of the reformed Churches abroad which have no bishops, any more than that those Churches unchurch us for retaining our excellent and primitive mode of ecclesiastical government. National Churches that are independent of each other have respectively an internal right to establish such forms of regimen as to them seem most scriptural and expedient. And this indefeasible right may pass into execution without any violation of that Christian charity and neighbourly affection which ought to subsist between Churches

t agree in the common faith of the gospel. I cannot, however, forbear to repeat the astonishment I feel that a clergyman of this Church should, through zeal against the Geneva doctrines, make such an unwarrantable concession in favour of the Geneva discipline. Who could ever have thought that an Oxford divine should, and that from the Clarendon press, rather let go the hierarchy than give up free-will? Oh, tell it not in Glasgow! publish it not in the streets of Edinburgh! lest the Presbyterians rejoice, and the daughters of the kirk triumph!

No wonder, sir, that, after this, you should assert as follows concerning grace and free-agency. You, indeed, give us to understand that you do not wholly explode all influences of the Holy Spirit: "But the supernatural, extraordinary, and irresistible influences of the Holy Spirit," page 98. If by supernatural, extraordinary, and irresistible, you mean the miraculous gifts and influences of that adorable person, Calvinists as much disclaim all pretension to these as you can do. We believe that the end of their vouchsafement in the primitive ages being fully answered by the confirmation of the gospel, the gifts themselves are long since ceased; and that no man who now makes this claim (if any such mad-man is to be found) can expect to be credited, unless he actually has miraculous powers to prove it by. Yet there is certainly a sober sense in which all the gracious influences of the Spirit may, and ought to be, termed supernatural, or superior to the powers and reach of nature. You will not surely assert that the influences of the Spirit are natural to fallen man; for that would be setting aside the essential difference which Scripture and reason are so careful to maintain between nature and grace. Constant experience also, and daily observation, confirm the apostle's decision, that "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; neither can he" even "know," much less receive, "them, because they are spiritually discerned;" and, until the natural man is renewed by grace, he has no spiritual eyes to discern them by. In exact conformity to this certain truth, the first exhortation in our baptismal office hath these words: "Forasmuch as all men are conceived and born in sin, and that our Saviour Christ saith, None can enter into the kingdom of God except he be regenerate and born anew of water and of the Holy Ghost, I beseech you to call upon God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, that of his bounteous mercy he will grant to this child that thing" [namely, regeneration] "which by nature he cannot have." If, then, the new birth and the renovating influences of the Spirit are not natural to man, they must be supernaturally conferred. The same influences may, in some sense, be safely enough termed extraordinary, inasmuch as they are extra ordinem, or out of the common course; for all men have them not. But I lay no manner of stress on this remark. Thus much, however, it proves: that the word, so carefully explained, may be used in a rational, harmless sense. Though, for my own part, I always choose to abstain, as much as possible, from the use of such terms as are liable to misapprehension, and require a tedious circuit of explanation. As a great man observes, Quid hoc malæ rei est, ita ex destinato consilio loqui, ut mox prolixâ explicacione indigeas, apud auditores simplices et candidos; et apologidâ apud minus faventes ac suspicaces? I have, therefore, always acquiesced in the usual distinction of the Spirit's influence into ordinary and extraordinary, and understand by the former his supernatural agency in a way of saving grace; by the latter his agency formerly exerted in the collation of miraculous gifts.

By I see not so much reason for absolutely cashiering the epithet irresistible; though I could wish that the term invincible (which more exactly conveys our true meaning) were always substituted in its room. Irresistible may seem (though we intend no such thing) to imply some compulsive force on the will of man in regeneration, whereas we neither assert nor believe that the will is violently compelled, but only that it is effectually changed for the better, without any violation of its natural freedom. An elect sinner is not made good against his will, but is by grace made willing to be good, according to that of the psalmist: "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power," Psalm cx. 3. We apprehend this to be effected, as St. Augustin expresses it, suavi omnipotentid et omnipotenti suavitate: so that, though the effect of the Holy Spirit's operation is infallibly secured, and cannot but issue in conversion (for he does nothing in vain), yet is this blessed effect accomplished in a way suitable to the natural powers wherewith man is endued. By irresistible, therefore, if you understand grace that is efficacious, invincible, and certainly victorious, we are authorized both by Scripture, reason, and the strictest maxims of philosophy, to term converting grace irresistible; since where God really designs to renew a sinner unto righteousness and true holiness, we think it incompatible with every notion of Deity to suppose that the intent of an all-wise Being should be eventually defeated and his plan disconcerted, or that the measures made use of by an Almighty agent should be baffled and issue in nothing. Neither can we apprehend that a Deity of this infinite wisdom and infinite power, who is "excellent in counsel, and mighty in working," can ever find himself at a loss how to carry his immutable purposes, whether of grace or providence, into execution, or be unable to operate effectually on the wills of men, without trespassing on that freedom of which he himself is the author and giver. Surely he who, without our consent, made us reasonable beings, can, by virtue of his own omnipotently transforming grace, make us holy beings! and that without making us mere machines. He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that made the eye, shall he not see? He that endued my will with natural freedom, cannot he renew this will of mine without infringement of the freedom he gave? Time was when the Christian world did not entertain such low thoughts of God and such lofty thoughts of man as now too generally prevail. How beautiful, how just, how nervous is that petition which, Grotius (c) informs us, was a part of the public devotions of some ancient churches! "Ad te nostras etiam rebelles compelle propitius voluntates:" In mercy force over even our obstreperous wills to thy blessed self. That fine prayer of the ascetic Raymond Jordanus (d) is animated with the same heavenly spirit of internal humiliation and absolute submission to sovereign grace: "Per violentiam tui dulcissimi amoris, compelle rebellem animum meum ad te amandum:" By the overpowering virtue of thy sweetest love, constrain my rebellious soul to the love of thee. O that God would put such a cry into the heart of the person to whom I am w<sup>r</sup>ing!

You would, then, sir, never more draw your pen against the doctrines of grace; but, if reduced to the alternative, you would rather, with Cranmer, hold your hand in the flames until it was consumed from your arm. I must observe, however, that the holy persons above quoted are not to be understood as if they imagined that God, in his operations of grace, offered violence (properly so called) to the human will, or compelled his people to love him whether they would or no, as an ox was dragged to sacrifice; but the meaning of their supplications was that he would effectually incline and attach their wills to himself, and that the omnipotence of his constraining love would reduce and master their natural obstinacy and perverseness. However, the strong and nervous manner in which their petitions were expressed show what ideas these ancient Christians entertained of the stubbornness, rebellion, and depravity of man's will by nature, and the Almighty exertion of divine grace which is requisite to subdue it. The invincibility of converting grace, and, at the same time, the immunity of the will from all forcible, involuntary compulsion are very happily expressed in the 10th of those articles of religion (e) set forth by king Edward VI. "The grace of Christ, or the Holy Ghost which is given by him, doth take from man the heart of stone, and giveth him a heart of flesh. And though it rendereth us willing to do these good works which before we were unwilling to do, and unwilling to do those evil works which before we did, yet is no violence offered by it to the will of man; so that no man when he hath sinned can excuse himself as if he had sinned against his will or upon constraint, and therefore that he ought not to be accused or condemned upon that account."

As for the passages of Scripture which you have accumulated as making for your own notions of free-will, conditional grace, &c., and which, having wrenched and detached from their contexts, you would fain torture into a sense which, it is demonstrable, the inspired writers never thought of, you will find all those perverted passages, and many others which are no less impertinently pressed into these controversies by the partizans of Arminius, restored to their primitive and obvious meaning in Dr. Edwards's Veritas Redux, or in Dr. Gill's Cause of God and Truth. As to the forms of these valuable books, I cannot find that it was ever attempted to be answered. And for the latter it has stood unanswered for, I believe, near thirty years; and you, sir, or any other expert Arminian, would do well to try your skill upon it if you are able, while the learned and judicious author is detained from Abraham's bosom. But surely so long as such capital books as those remain in full possession of the field, it is idle, to the last degree, for the gentlemen of your side of the question to amuse themselves and trifle with the public by letting off pop-guns and throwing paltry squibs at what they call Calvinism.

Speaking of the doctrines of election and reprobation, you justly observe that you are "pressed with the authority of the 17th article," p. 103. Indeed you are, and pressed hard too; else you would never have added, as you do in the next page, "The article speaks of a predestination decreed by God's counsel, secret to us, and to be discerned only by the working of the Spirit of Christ mortifying the works of the flesh; and directs us to receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in the Holy Scripture." Is it possible that these truly Calvinistic sentences should drop from the pen of a Dr. Nowell? O vis veritatis, invitis etiam pectoribus erumpentis! What a concession is here! You have granted as much as any Calvinistic writer could have granted, or a Calvinistic reader can desire. You are got into the very midst of Geneva before you are aware; a place where I no more expected to have met you than the Normans did, at one time, think of seeing the great lord Clarendon at Roan.

Nor is your concession weakened a jot by what you immediately subjoin: "But there" [i. e. in Scripture] "we shall find all these promises conditional." For, 1. All the divine promises are not conditional; witness that famous one in which every other spiritual promise is virtually comprised: "I will be their God, and they shall be my people." 2. It does not follow, because some promises seem to run conditionally, i. e. hypothetically, that therefore the performance of the conditions themselves is suspended on the free-agency of man. In the distribution of the blessings promised to the elect, a certain order and economy are observed. Grace is first given, then glory. Thus we believe and say, with the apostle, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord; or, that a man must be sanctified before he can be finally glorified. God does not eventually save an elect person until he has previously regenerated that person. Hence final salvation is frequently in Scripture held forth to the view of his people, not only under the character of elect, but likewise under every other character they sustain, such as penitents, believers, saints, and workers of righteousness; because, in consequence of their predestination to life, they are endued with the graces of repentance, faith, and sanctification, in order to their meetness for, and enjoyment of, that eternal life which they were predestinated to. Regeneration must, and always does, come between the decree of election and the ultimate accomplishment of that decree, the means and the end being inseparably linked together, both in God's own purpose and his execution of it. Yet means are one thing; conditions are another. And I challenge any one Arminian to point out any one spiritual qualification represented in the Bible as previously requisite to everlasting life, which qualification is not in the same Bible declared to be the gift of God, and the work of his own grace in every one that shall be saved. So much for the Scriptures. Next for our Liturgy. You assert, page 106, that "The sentences of Scripture with which the morning and evening prayer are appointed to begin fully declare the free-will of man." They declare neither more nor less than this: that persons, possessed of such and such graces, have an evidential right to such and such privileges, by virtue of God's free promises. You add, "In the absolution the priest declares that Almighty God desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he may return from his wickedness and live." Granted. But what sort of sinner is here meant? Let the absolution itself decide. It is such a sinner as belongeth to "his people," the people of Almighty God, who are farther described under the visible characters of "them that truly repent, and unfeignedly believe his holy gospel." But are all sinners partakers of this true repentance and unfeigned faith? And can you really persuade yourself that God actually wills the salvation of those in whom these graces are not finally wrought? This would be opening a door to licentiousness indeed; nay, it would be a most tremendous misrepresentation of the Deity himself, as if it was possible for him to love the wicked as wicked. Surely you will never offer to father such horrid doctrine upon the Church of England! Did all sinners truly repent and unfeignedly believe, they would come under the opposite denomination of saints. The plain meaning, then, of this declarative absolution is that, until repentance and faith (the two grand constituents of regeneration) are wrought in us, and show forth themselves by the peaceable fruits of righteousness, we have no right to look upon ourselves as pardoned and absolved; but that, when these are wrought in us, we have, in the judgment of our Church, a safe and scriptural warrant to conclude that we are in a pardoned state. Our reconciliation unto God by the death of his son being to be inferred from, and proved by (though in no sense founded upon) the grace he hath given us, and the good works he enables us to do. And that the faith and repentance which the absolution mentions were, in the intention of the compilers, considered as the effects of God's free grace, and not of man's free-will, appears incontrovertibly from a subsequent part of the absolution itself, which runs thus: "Wherefore let us beseech him to grant us true repentance and his Holy Spirit, that those things may please him which we do at this present, and that the rest of our life hereafter may be pure and holy." But, upon your principles, in vain we do pray for these blessings; since, if your hypothesis be right, we had them in our own power before. Were Arminian free-willers to act consistently with their darling tenet, they would never pray at all.

As a proof of the Church of England's denial of final perseverance you gravely inform us (p. 106.) that, "In the Lord's Prayer we petition God not to lead us into temptation." A most formidable argument indeed! reduced to some little sort of form, it stands thus:

The Church of England hath adopted the Lord's Prayer into her public service:

But in that prayer, we request to be preserved from temptation:

Ergo, the Church believes that the truly regenerate may totally and finally fall from grace.

Here are premises without a conclusion; and a conclusion without premises. For are temptation and final apostasy terms synonymous? If they are, it would follow that every saint is actually a final apostate; because there is no saint who is not tempted to evil, more or less, every day of his life. If the terms are not synonymous, then your inference, drawn from this topic, falls to the ground and vanishes into air.

Enter, now, a proof, no less cogent, in behalf of unlimited redemption. "The hymn called Te Deum thus celebrates the universal redemption by the incarnation and death of Christ; 'when thou tookest upon thee to deliver man, thou didst not abhor the Virgin's womb: when thou didst overcome the sharpness of death, thou didst open the kingdom of heaven to all believers.'" (page 107.) The conclusion you would deduce hence must be this, if any:

Christ, by the merits of his death, opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers:

Ergo, he opened the kingdom of heaven to every individual of mankind, that ever did, that now does, or ever shall, exist.

I could not have expected such reasoning from the public orator of our English Athens. Indeed, sir, you can never prove, from these two verses of the Te Deum, that our Church holds absolutely universal redemption, until you have previously made good these two points: 1. That all mankind, not a single individual excepted, are believers: and 2. That faith is not the gift of God. My argument, drawn from this part of that seraphic hymn, stands thus (and I leave to the judgment of the impartial whether it be not perfectly obvious and unforced):

Our Church, in the Te Deum, asserts, That Christ, by his incarnation and death, opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers:

But the whole of mankind are not believers:

Ergo, our Church, in the Te Deum, does not assert that Christ opened the kingdom of heaven to the whole of mankind.

Nay, I will go a step further. The Church, in this place, does evidently limit redemption to only a part of mankind. For, by saying that Christ opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers, she virtually declares that he opened heaven to believers only: so that in the judgment of the Church they alone were intentionally redeemed by Christ who should finally believe. And what is this but the very essence of that innocent, yet much dreaded thing, called Calvinism? in running away from which, you plainly run away from the Church. Ita fugis, ut præter casam. Still your ammunition is not exhausted; for, in the same page, you hurl another thunderbolt at John Calvin's head: "The suffrages offered up by the priest, and all the congregation alternately, are quite inconsistent with the notion of absolute predestination and indefectible assurance:—'Grant us thy salvation'—'Take not thy holy Spirit from us.'" The suffrages themselves are most excellent; but your inference from them is a mere telum imbelles sine ictu. As if prayer (which is one of the very means by which the end is decreed to be come at)—as if prayer, on man's part, was incompatible with predestination on God's! So far is this from being true, that the belief of his immutable purposes is the very thing which excites and warrants effectual fervent prayer, and puts life and confidence into our approaches to the throne of grace. I shall give two remarkable instances of this: one from Scripture, the other from our Liturgy. 1. From Scripture. David, having received some gracious intimations of what good things God had decreed to bestow on his family after him, instead of sitting down idle, and restraining prayer before God, as if human duty was superfluous on the supposition of divine decrees, the holy monarch breaks forth into supplication for the very mercies which had been so peremptorily promised.

—Thou, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee a house; therefore hath thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee, 2 Sam. vii. 27. It is equally plain, 2. That the compilers of our admirable liturgy considered matters in the same view. Those evangelical divines well knew that God hath determined the times before appointed (Acts xvii. 26.); and that the day of Christ's second coming is, in particular, fore-ordained and fixed in God's determinate counsel and fore-knowledge (Acts xvii. 31.) "Surely, then," might an Arminian say, "those compilers have not directed us to pray for the coming of this predestined period." Indeed but they have; and that on a very solemn occasion, and in these very solemn words: Humbly beseeching thee of thy gracious goodness shortly to accomplish the number of thine elect, and to hasten thy kingdom. (f) Prayer, therefore, and the other means of grace are not superseded, but even rendered needful by the certainty of God's predestination: for Qui vult finem, vult etiam media ad finem. The manifestation of God's goodness, in the final salvation of his people, being the end designed by him in his gracious decree, must necessarily have been first in the divine intention: but this end being last in actual execution, certain correlative means must necessarily intervene in order to carry the divine intention into actual execution, and to connect the decree and the accomplishment of it together. Of these means prayer is one. Therefore, supposing our Church had directed her regenerate members to pray, even in express terms, (which, however, I do not recollect she has) for preservation from total and final apostacy; that would not have proved the defectibility of the saints: watchfulness and prayer being means of perseverance no less decreed than perseverance itself. Thus the apostle, like a wise master-builder in Sion, joins the certainty of perseverance with prayer for it: The very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it. 1 Thess. v. 23, 24.

You tell us, p. 107, that some infer the doctrine of election from that petition in our liturgy, "make thy chosen people joyful." They do: and not only directly, the doctrine of election; but indirectly, that of assurance likewise. The petition evidently proceeds on this datum, that God really had a chosen people; and, agreeably to such a belief, beseeches him to make his chosen people joyful: i. e. to rejoice them with the comfortable sense and persuasion of their belonging to that chosen number. But you object (ibid) that, "The word chosen, or elect, signifies in Scripture, either all Christians in general, or such Christians as walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they are called." Easily said; but, so far as I have been able to find, never yet proved. Every text appealed to in your references demonstrates the very reverse to be true. The word εκλεκτος, elect, chosen; is evidently formed from the participle εκλεγμενος, which, as every body knows, signifies selected, picked out, and chosen from among others. But I have such an authority to vouch, for this sense of the word, as is infinitely superior even to the natural propriety of the word itself: I mean the authority of no less person than the eternal Son of God; the incarnate Λογος, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. He surely, if any, both perfectly knew, and was able to fix rightly the meaning of this religious term. And how does he define the word elect? In Dr. Nowell's vague, jejune manner? Quite the contrary. Consult Mark xiii. 20. And except the Lord had shortened those days, no flesh should be saved: but for the elect's sakes whom he hath chosen, he hath shortened the days. According therefore to Christ's own definition, οι εκλεκτοι the elect, are οι εξελεξατο, those whom he [the Lord] hath chosen. Consequently, this important word does not signify, either all professing Christians at large, nor yet such Christians as walk worthy of their vocation. But simply and singly, the objects of gracious God's choice, abstractedly considered as such, without

(f) See the Funeral Office. From the petition cited above, it is undeniable, that according to the doctrine of the Church of England, there is, 1. A body of elect persons; which elect persons are, 2. chosen and elected of God himself: whence she terms them thine elect. These elect of God are, 3. a certain determinate number; and this round number will, 4. be accomplished, perfected, and made up; so that not one of the number shall be missing; it being a rule that holds good, no less in divinity than in metaphysics, sublatâ quâcumque parte, tollitur totum. Hence the Church, ever consistent with herself, begins one of her collects thus: "O Almighty God, who hast knit together thine elect into one communion and fellowship in the mystical body of thy Son," &c.

And surely those whom God hath knit together can never be put asunder: for what God doth, it shall be for ever; nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it, Eccles. iii. 14. The above collect is for the festival of All Saints. Now, if all saints are thus divinely knit together, and make up the Mediator's mystical body; it follows, that not one true saint can perish. As not a bone in Christ's natural body was suffered to be broken, so neither shall his mystic body be maimed, by the loss of any the meanest member: for the world of the elect, collectively taken, constitute the mystical fullness of him who filleth all in all, Eph. i. 23. So that, without every one of them, Christ himself (considered relatively, as the head and Saviour of his spiritual body) would not be made perfect.

any respect had to aught in them, or done by them, whether actual or foreseen. A cordial profession of Christ, and a walking worthy of their high calling are after-parts of their character; and have no place in the persons chosen, until, in consequence of their election from everlasting, they are regenerated and made new creatures in Christ Jesus. As real conversion is the fruit and result of predestination; so holiness of heart and purity of life are the fruits of real conversion: which is the immediate (as election is the remote) cause of all the good that is wrought in us, and that is done by us. Upon the whole, then, as long as the good old definition of the elect remains on record in the above Scripture, so long we obstinate Calvinists must beg leave to reject Dr. Nowell's new-fangled vapid explication, as utterly inconsistent with the plain obvious import of language, and (which is still worse) as totally counter to the express determination of Christ himself.

Your slashing treatment of Scripture-phrases and scripture-doctrines, which you hack and mangle so unmercifully when they happen to militate with your own preconceived opinions, unhappily realizes but too well that remark of Dr. Middleton; "We may observe," says this able writer, "how impossible it is for men, even of the greatest learning and piety, to interpret Scripture with success, when they come to it prepossessed with systems, which they are listed, as it were, to defend. For instead of searching candidly the true meaning of the text, they come provided with senses which they are obliged to ingraft upon it; until by a practice and habit of wresting the Scripture on all occasions, they acquire a dexterity of extracting what doctrines they please out of it." Miscell. Tracts, p. 12.

The fashion of explaining away the word elect, by saying it only means good Christians, was invented at a pinch, for much the same reason that people look at the sun through a fumigated glass; namely, to diminish and obscure the native lustre of its beams, by the intervention of a dark, discoloured medium. Thus some artful Arminians, in order to secure a majority, would persuade superficial enquirers (who make up the bulk of mankind) that the word elect does not signify elect, but something very different from its own meaning. By virtue of which artificial fumigation the meridian truth is clouded; and all who believe election to be election, are set down for Calvinists, Puritans, Methodists, and low church men; only because they are so very unmanly (g) as not to look at Scripture through the Arminian's dark glass; which glass has just the same effect on gospel-truths as Dr. Hooke's helioscope has on the rays of the sun; which he tells us will be so weakened if beheld through that qualifying tube, "as only to strike the eye with a 256th part of their force."

Still, sir, you harp on the same beloved string; and would fain fumigate our catechism among the rest. There the Church tells us that the Holy Ghost sanctifies all the elect people of God; that is say you, (p. 107). "All Christians, or at least all good Christians, who are ready to comply with his motions." And can a person of your good sense really believe this to be the meaning of elect? I will not offer you such an affront as to suppose it. And yet, alas! on the other hand, if you do not believe your own interpretation, what becomes of your integrity? "The Holy Ghost sanctifies all good Christians:" so then men must be good Christians before they are sanctified, and when they have made themselves good Christians, then the blessed Spirit sanctifies them. A piece of information for which the poor ignorant Calvinistic Church of England men are solely indebted to the labours of Dr. Nowell. I really before was so weak as to imagine, with St. Paul, that goodness was a fruit of the Spirit, and a constituent part of sanctification itself; but now I perceive goodness precedes sanctification; and that the office of the Holy Ghost (I tremble to write it, but let them answer for the conclusion who avow the premises) is, only to make such people good as were good before. Hence you revert once more to universal redemption, which you infer from that passage in the catechism, "Who hath redeemed me and all mankind;" on which your comment is, p. 108, "All those, therefore, whom God the Son hath redeemed, God the Holy Ghost sanctifies." Excellent. You now write indeed like a true minister of the Church. Not a Calvinist, in the whole world, but would subscribe to this with both hands. But pray, sir, is every individual of mankind sanctified by the Holy Ghost? If the contrary is but too evident, then it follows from your own positive premises that every individual of mankind was not redeemed; since you justly assert redemption and sanctification to be equilateral and commensurate with each other; "All those whom God the Son hath redeemed, God the Holy Ghost sanctifies." That all mankind, there-was a loaf, and could not be a shoulder of mutton. See the Tale of a Tub.

(g) In like manner Peter, with his triple hat, kicked his two brothers, Martin and Jack, out of doors, because they would insist upon it that a loaf

fore, which our Church hath declared to be interested in Christ's redemption, is not to be understood of every individual, but of some of all nations, even those and those only, whom God the Holy Ghost sanctifies. Thus your own explication of the phrase all mankind exactly comports with the explication of it, which the Church herself gives in the very next paragraph, "All the elect people of God."

I should congratulate you, sir, on your candour and attention to evidence, did you not immediately recant, and build up the things you had just destroyed. Your whole paragraph stands thus: "All those, therefore, whom the Son of God hath redeemed, God the Holy Ghost sanctifies; but both only on condition of their own concurrence and compliance with the terms offered." The Church of England says no such thing. You have clogged redemption and sanctification with dead weights of your own putting on. There is not a word in the catechism, directly or indirectly, about concurrence and compliance. Redemption itself is there represented as a finished preeminent thing; not as a term or condition tendered to man's acceptance, but as a real price actually paid down for the ransom of mankind. "God the Son who hath redeemed me, &c." Not who will redeem me, if I am pliable and concurring; but who hath done it, to make me so. Whatever conditional salvation may be, a conditional redemption is a contradiction in terms; for either the ransom price is paid, or it is not; there is no medium, nor room for any qualifying salvo or drawback. The doctrine of the Church, as well as of the Scriptures, and of plain common sense is, that Christ hath, "by the one offering of himself, perfected for ever them that are sanctified," or set apart for God. Nor is the notion of a conditional sanctification less absurd. I must be either sanctified by the Holy Ghost, or not. If I am, I comply and concur with him of course, by virtue of that very sanctification which he imparts; if I am not sanctified by him, I shall neither concur nor comply; because this concurrence and compliance are a part of sanctification itself, and can have no existence without it. I blame no man for believing according to the best light of his own judgment, let his faith to me seem ever so ill-grounded; but I blame any man who dares to palm his own private notions upon the Church.

However, by way of canvassing your paragraph as minutely as I am able, and letting it have all the fair play it possibly can, by considering it in every point of view, I will suppose, for once, that both redemption and sanctification are conditional. What will you get by it? You will plunge head foremost, quantus quantus es, into the lake of Geneva, and come out a limited redemptionist. A very able writer observes that all violent extremes, how widely remote soever they may seem, have, in fact, a common central point, to which they mutually verge, and in which they ultimately coincide. You yourself, sir (with all due respect I dare to speak it), are an instance of the justice of this remark. "God the Son," you tell us, "hath redeemed us only on condition of our concurrence and compliance." We will put the case, that some persons do eventually neither concur nor comply. Such persons were, by your own acknowledgment, unredeemed. Therefore, say I, admitting these premises, redemption is not universal; they only (according to Dr. Nowell) being redeemed by Christ who "concur and comply with the terms offered;" which all do not.

We enter now on a new scene. Prepare thyself, reader, for a fresh discovery; even such a one as I, for my own part, should never have dreamt of, but for the assistance of Peter Heylin and Dr. Nowell. Calvinism it seems is downright Poper; and Poper is orthodox Calvinism. But by what art of transubstantiation is this proved? The proof follows; page 108, "The word elect frequently occurs in the Roman breviary, the Papists make use of it in their rituals, as well as we; so that if the use of this word will prove the compilers of our liturgy predestinarians, it will prove the Church of Rome so too, and that in this respect it is as orthodox as Calvinism itself." Not quite so fast, sir. Let us weigh premises before we jump to conclusions. The sense of the word elect, as it stands in a reformed Liturgy, is not to be determined by the sense affixed to it in a Romish breviary. Such an insinuation comes with a very ill grace from the pen of a Protestant divine. It would at least have saved appearances had you referred us for the sense in which the Church of England uses the word elect, to her own 17th article, where she professedly treats of election; instead of sending us back again into Egypt, to consult mass-books and breviaries. The spouse of Christ is not to learn the meaning of her husband's language from the mother of abominations. 2. The amount of your observation is this, if I understand it right; "By the word elect, when used by Papists, they do not mean God's predestinated children, but all good Catholics; ergo, the same word, when used by Protestants, is to be understood as denoting all good Christians." I deny the consequence. Because Papists are perverters of language, Scripture, common sense and every thing that is good, it does not follow that Protestants should be so too. 3. Neither does it follow that the Church of Rome are predestinarians, because the word elect occurs by chance in their public offices. Popish priests when they mutter out the word elect, are (like ladies on some occasions) to be understood by contraries; in which too many professing Protestants who ought to know better, are not ashamed to imitate those locusts of the bottomless pit.

In farther opposition to the doctrines of predestination and perseverance, you appeal to our baptismal office. Excellent as that office is, we have had some truly great and good men who thought it not quite unexceptionable. But for my own particular part (if I may, without presumption, offer my own judgment), I know not of one syllable in the whole which does not harmonize with those doctrines. That part of it on which you seem to lay the greatest stress is where the Church appears to take the regeneration of the baptized for granted. Whence Arminians would endeavour to infer that, since many baptized persons persist finally in sin, and may be supposed to perish at last, therefore, the regenerate are not secured from absolute apostacy. That baptism is a typical regeneration I grant; as also that it is the ordinance of initiation, whereby a person whether infant or adult, is incorporated into the visible Church, and entered on the list of Christian professors. From the maturest consideration of what our Church has delivered concerning the nature and effect of this sacrament, it appears to me that, in her judgment, the administration of baptism is very frequently attended with the true, real, renovating influences of the Holy Ghost; which influences being internal, spiritual and invisible, and consequently not to be discerned by the baptiser; he is directed to acquaint the bystanders with the charitable hope of the Church, both in his subsequent address to the sponsors, and in his presumptive thanksgiving to Almighty God. Yet I can no where find, that the Church pretends to tie the regenerating grace of the Spirit to the bare administration of this ordinance; as if that infinitely glorious and absolutely independent person always seconded the good intentions of the Church, by invariably crowning that rite with real regeneration. The Church (h) of Rome, indeed, bawls out that every sacrament does, ipso facto, confer grace ex opere operato and curses them that will not believe it; as also, that baptism impresses I know not what spiritual mark on the soul, even such a mark as can never be effaced; which assertion she likewise arms with a sting in the tail; pronouncing them accursed who deny it. But our own Church has nothing like this. On the contrary, she positively defines a sacrament to be "An outward and visible sign of an inward spiritual grace, given unto us, ordained by Christ himself, as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof." She adds that, "The outward visible sign, or form in baptism," is "water, wherein," or wherewith, "the person is baptized in the name of the Father, &c." Baptism itself, therefore, is not regeneration, but a sign or type of it; and is then only a proof of regeneration when accompanied with "the inward and spiritual grace," which the Church does not affirm it always is. And, indeed, I should wonder if she had; since, if all baptized persons were truly regenerate, christendom would be a much better part of the world than it is. This inward and spiritual grace, of which baptism is the sign and figure, is defined by our Church to consist in "A death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness. For being by nature born in sin, and the children of wrath, we are hereby [i. e. by inward and spiritual grace, the last immediate antecedent] "made" [constituted and proved to be] "children of grace." Exactly coincident with our catechism is our 27th article: "Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened; but it is also a sign of regeneration or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the Church, &c." I conclude hence that in the judgment of the Church of England baptism and internal regeneration (the former being simply considered in itself only a sign or symbol of the latter) are two distinct things; which, though they sometimes go together (when the Holy Spirit pleases to make baptism the channel of his gracious influences), yet do not necessarily nor constantly accompany each other; and, therefore, the subsequent apostacy of some baptized persons does not in the least (as bishop Burnet would infer, and you from him) shake the doctrine either of immutable predestination on God's part, or of infallible perseverance on the part of the truly regenerate. But you observe, page 109, that, "With regard to infants, the rubrick declares it is certain by God's word that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved." I firmly believe the same. Nay, I believe more. I am convinced, that the souls of all departed infants whatever, whether baptized or unbaptized, are with God in glory. And I think my belief warranted by an authority which cannot err, Matt. xviii. 14. You have, therefore, no occasion to lug in children by head and shoulders, page 110, and to ask, with an air of insult, where then is the "doctrine of absolute, irrespective predestination and reprobation, which would include children as well as adults?" I believe that, in the decree of predestination to life, God hath included all whom he hath decreed to take away in infancy; and that the decree of reprobation has nothing to do with them.

Now we come to what you and others of your party represent as monstrum, horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum: I mean the doctrine of reprobation. Absolute reprobation, you say, "Is no where taught in our articles, nor in the scriptures; but just the contrary." I, on the other hand, maintain, that it is plainly implied in our articles, and expressly asserted in the Scriptures. Of the latter I shall say little here; but I cannot in justice to the Church omit a short proof or two respecting the former. In doing this, I must really be so unpolite as to hold up the 17th article to you, though I am sensible it is an article you have no great affection for. However, as it has received the sanction of your own solemn subscription, you are bound, both in honour, conscience, and law, to stand or fall by the evidence it brings. "Predestination to life" [which implies, on the other hand, a predestination to death; otherwise the article is lame] "is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby, before the foundations of the world were laid, he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those [observe that restrictive word], whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind," [all mankind, therefore, were not chosen, but some were passed by; for if there was no decretive distinction in God's election, the elect could not be said to be chosen out of mankind], "and to bring them by Christ" [and not the rest, out of whom they were chosen], "to everlasting salvation as vessels made to honour." [There are, therefore, some vessels not made unto honour.] In thus asserting everlasting, personal, immutable election; the Church, tacitly, indeed, but virtually, and by necessary (l) consequence, sets her seal to the opposite doctrine of preterition; since there can be no choice, without a refusal; no election of some without a rejection of others; no partial admission, without a partial exclusion. The Church, indeed, does not expressly say as much; but, from the premises she has laid down, the conclusion follows as unavoidably as if she had; and I defy all the sophistry of man to affirm the premises, without admitting the conclusion. Election without reprobation cannot stand: it must have the other leg or it will tumble down. But I recur to the article; and shall begin where I left off. After asserting the decree of predestination unto life, and telling us what it is; the Church goes on to affirm that this decree cannot be frustrated, but shall certainly have its accomplishment, in the salvation of its objects at the appointed time, and through the appointed means: "Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God" [namely, with the excellent benefit of God's election and predestination to life], "be called" [and that not with a random call, but] "according to God's purpose, by his Spirit working in due season;" [nor with a precarious, ineffectual call; but with such a spiritual and internal call as insures the end for which it was vouchsafed: for] "They, through grace, obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ: they walk religiously in good works;" [not only for a while, but to the end of their days; otherwise it would not be added] "and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity, [so that they who do not eventually attain to everlasting felicity, were never in the number of God's elect.] (m)

In the next place this article proceeds by way of practical improvement, to point out the most obvious uses and abuses of the doctrine of predestination. 1. Its uses. "As the Godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is [1.] full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things; as well because [2.] it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, as because [3.] it doth fervently kindle their love towards God;" [now follow the abuses of it] "so for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of God" [i. e. the reprobate, who are described in Scripture (Jude 19.) under this very character of not having the Spirit], "to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's predestination, is a most dangerous downfall; whereby the devil doth thrust them either [1.] into desperation, or [2.]

(m) See a most remarkable concession of Heylin's. (Life of Laud, p. 29.)

into wretchedness of most unclean living, no less perilous than desperation." The article then plainly speaks of two distinct sorts or persons; the elect, and the non-elect. With regard to the converted elect, the consideration of their predestination in Christ fills them with sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort; it greatly establishes and confirms their faith; and doth fervently kindle their love towards God; which love is the never-failing source of all good works. But with regard to the others, the article expressly declares God's predestination to be a sentence; and a dismal sentence it is to such; the contemplation of which serves to thrust them into desperation and unclean living. Never was any ecclesiastical decision a more exact unison with scripture. Who can read this 17th article, and not be reminded of that passage in the apostle, 1 Pet. ii. 8, 9?

The article closes with two wise and useful cautions; "furthermore, we must [1.] receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth in Holy Scripture; and [2.] in our doings, that will of God is to be followed which we have expressly declared unto us in the word of God." Two propositions these, which every Calvinist allows; and the latter of which, by the by, is evidently formed on the Calvinist distinction of the divine will into secret and revealed.

But you still wage war against the import of the word elect. Hence, page 112 you serve up the crambe repetita again, and will have it that "the elect and chosen of God are all good Christians." You have given us to understand before that God the Son redeemed, and God the Holy Ghost sanctifies, none but good Christians; as if the effect went before the cause; and now (if your definition has any meaning at all), you would insinuate, again, that God the Father does not elect and choose men until they become good; and then, I suppose, if they lose this goodness (for upon Arminian principles, it is a very slippery thing), they are presently cashiered and un-chosen; but if their free-will should once more yield itself so pliable as to grow good again, they are re-elected anew; and, perhaps, after they have been, in the course of a few years elected and un-elected, redeemed and unredeemed, sanctified and unsanctified, born again and unborn, some hundreds of times; these "elect and chosen of God, these good Christians," may (for it is all a chance) perish and go to hell at last. A very suitable representation this of the God who changeth not, and of the everlasting covenant which is ordered in all things and sure! "The elect and chosen of God are all good Christians!" invert the proposition and you will advance a certain truth;

"all good Christians," those that are renewed, and sanctified in the spirit of their minds by divine grace, "are the elect and chosen of God; known and discovered to be his chosen, by the grace which he hath given them." I am sure, St. Paul represents sanctification, not as a cause or condition of election, but as a fruit, effect, and one subordinate end of it; according as he hath chosen us in him [in Christ] before the foundation of the world, [not because we were, or he foresaw we would be, "good Christians," but] that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, Eph. i. 4, 5. I wish you would read what bishop Fell observes on this passage; the testimony of that learned and worthy bishop of Oxford might be a means of making you see the absurdity, as well as impiety, of turning the gospel plan upside-down, by bottoming God's decrees on any qualification (whether actual or foreseen) in the creature. You go on, (ibid.) "Christ's sheep are they who hear his voice, and follow him, and abound in good works." We all grant that his sheep, or his elect, "hear his voice" sooner or later, in effectual calling; that they are made to "follow him" in the regeneration, "and abound in good works," from the genuine principles of faith and love. But then we assert with the Scripture, and conformably to the doctrine of our Church, that this sanctification of them is not the cause of their being his sheep and his chosen, but proofs, marks, and evidences of their having been so from everlasting. Our Lord himself, John x. styles the elect his sheep, previously to their hearing his voice; My sheep hear my voice, &c. they do not hear it in order to their becoming his sheep, but hear it as such, and because they were such. So, verse 16, the elect, even while unregenerate, and who had not yet heard his voice, are termed his sheep; And other sheep I have, which are not of this [of the Jewish] fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; according to what he says elsewhere, All that the Father giveth me shall come unto me. He tells the reprobate Jews, chap. x. Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, i. e. in the number of my elect. But if the word sheep does not signify elect persons, but good Christians; the sense of our Lord's declaration would be this, "Ye are not believers and good Christians, because ye are not believers and good Christians!"

As you will not let the word elect have fair play for itself, the word Church must, it seems, come in for a share of the same fate, page 112. "The Church, in Scripture, signifies the whole body of Christians, of which Christ is the head." Do you mean the visible, or the invisible Church? If the visible, it does most certainly consist of the whole body of professing Christians, of whom Christ is the acknowledged head. But if you mean the invisible Church (that Church which Christ loved, and for which he gave himself unto death, Eph. v. 25.) your definition is much too vague and lax: this Church being συνεκλητην, co-elect with Christ, and ordained to grace and glory through him; the Church of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven, Heb. xii. and whose names are from before the foundation of the world, in the Lamb's Book of Life, Luke x. 20. Phil. iv. 3. Rev. xvii. 8. The constituent members of this invisible Church, when brought to the knowledge of Christ by effectual calling, and added to the visible fold are, in Scripture, the true εκκλησια, or the company of men called out of the world, and gathered in from among mankind; so that, during their abode on earth, they are a kingdom within a kingdom, as being not only subjects of the kingdom of Providence (which they were before, in common with the rest), but, likewise exalted to be subjects of the kingdom of grace, which all mankind are not.

I could wish, Sir, that you had observed some regular plan in your handling of the points in debate. Instead of this, the method you observe is as rambling and embarrassed as the system you have embraced. Your performance had been less intricate and confused if you had reduced it to some order, and delivered all you had to say on predestination, free-will, and final perseverance, under each of those heads respectively, without running them one into another. For want of this I am forced to follow you through your various windings, and measure back the ground already trod by perpetually reverting to the same subjects.—After giving us your definition of the word Church, you recur to the doctrine of universal redemption, which you aver to be taught by our homilies. That the Church, when treating of Christ's sacrifice and death, does not always, in so many words, expressly limit redemption to the elect only, is no argument of her holding the absurd doctrines of a random salvation, and of redemption without a plan. It is her own stated rule, and a very just one, that "The promises of God are to be received in such wise as they be generally set forth in Holy Scripture." This rule she has generally followed, and in it we follow her too; and assert, pleno ore, that "God so loved the world," i. e. Gentiles as well as Jews, "that he gave his only begotten Son to the end that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The question, then, between the Arminians and us is, not whether all true believers shall be saved, for we hold that as a certain truth; but whether saving faith (which always works by love) is of man's acquisition, or of God's operation.

Now, again, for perseverance, p. 118. "The 16th article teaches that, after we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given and fall into sin; and that deadly sin is here meant appears from the beginning of the article. It follows that, by the grace of God, we may rise again; which plainly implies that we also may not rise again." Pray, Sir, let the article speak for itself. The title of it runs thus: "Of sin after baptism;" and the article itself is as follows: "Not every deadly sin wilfully committed after baptism is sin against the Holy Ghost and unpardonable. Wherefore the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after baptism. After we have received the Holy Ghost" [i. e. after we have been baptized, as the words immediately preceding explain it] "we may depart from grace given," &c. The conclusions to be inferred from this article are, 1. That it treats of sins committed, not after spiritual and internal regeneration, but simply after baptism. 2. That it is probable some common, restraining influences of the Spirit may usually be vouchsafed to the recipients of this ordinance; but still these influences do not, for any thing the article says, amount to real regeneration; consequently it has nothing to do with the doctrine of final perseverance, which relates to the truly regenerate, and to them only. 3. The departure from grace given, of which the article makes mention, is only simply stiled a departure, without declaring that departure to be either total or final; consequently it does not at all affect the present argument. 4. The whole apparently relates, not to matters of spiritual grace, but to ecclesiastical censures and the exercise of Church discipline. If, for example, a member of the Church be under excommunication for some atrocious crime committed, or for some public scandal given, after baptism, the Church, upon such a person's open repentance, is to accept of his submission and recal her censures, as appears, not only from the main drift of the article, but in particular from those words of it, "The grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after baptism." Hence this article, 5. Expressly condemns the severity of the old Novatians, who held that such baptized persons as had fallen away in persecuting times were forever to be excluded from the communion of the Church. 6. It follows from the article that they are no less to be condemned who would set up for sinless perfection; and that, 7. Baptized persons and professing Christians are liable to fall into sin, and may, by grace, recover and rise again. All which is very true, and doubted of by no Calvinist within the sphere of my acquaintance. Bishop Burnet would gladly enough have caught at this article in proof of the saints' apostacy, had the article itself looked at all that way. But he saw it did not, and therefore explains it in a manner very different from the glosses and perversions with which Dr. Nowell would darken it. Surely the cause must be very weak which, in so able a hand as your's, is so feebly and so unfairly supported! Why should you labour so ardently to make the Church contradict herself? In the 17th article, as I observed before, the elect are expressly said to be "Justified, called, conformed to the image of Christ, to walk religiously in good works, and at length to attain to everlasting felicity:" but how could they be said to actually attain to everlasting felicity if all or any of them might perish by the way?

Nor do our homilies run counter to our articles. Your citations from the former only prove these five things: 1. That the regenerate are not, in this life, impeccable. 2. That, without carefulness and circumspection, the most advanced in grace may not only sin, but even sin grievously. 3. That the spiritual life of the soul must be cherished and kept up by a diligent and humble attendance on the several means of grace. 4. That good works and holy obedience are the inseparable effects of true faith; and 5. That all hope of interest in Christ, and expectation of salvation by him, are vain and groundless, unless we prove ourselves his children by walking as he walked.

Lastly, we come to the doctrine of justification by faith. On this important subject you deliver your judgment as follows, p. 123: "We all hold that we are justified freely by God's grace: that there is no merit in good works: that we are not to place our dependance or rest our plea on any works, that we have done or can do; but only on the mercy of God and the merits of our Redeemer." And again, p. 124: "We hold, as well as you, that justification is the act of God alone, conferred on us freely by his grace: that our own good works have no proper efficiency in the act of our justification; have no worth or merit in them: that we have all sinned and come short of the glory of God, and can be justified and saved only by faith," which faith you immediately define to be "a reliance on the mercies and merits of Christ." After giving us such a confession of your faith, who could have imagined that you would, almost in the same breath, blow down the whole fabric? by saying, p. 123, "On the other hand I should hope that all who believe the gospel would agree that good works are the necessary condition both of our justification and salvation." How! justified and saved only by faith, and yet good works the necessary condition both of our justification and salvation! which soever of these two propositions is right, one of them must be wrong, because two contradictory assertions cannot be both true. If faith be, as you say it is, neither more nor less than a reliance on the mercies and merits of Christ; and we are justified and saved by faith only, it follows that good works cannot possibly be the necessary condition of our justification and salvation.

To tell you plainly, Sir, the doctrine of the Scriptures and of our Church is that justification itself consists in God's esteeming and counting us righteous: that he thus esteems and counts us righteous neither for our faith, nor for our works, nor for both of them together, but solely and entirely on account of Christ's sacrifice and obedience imputed to us freely and fully: that the sacrifice and obedience of Christ, as the alone matter of our justification, are to be received, embraced, and rested upon by faith only, which faith is the gift of God: and that this faith, thus divinely given and wrought in the soul by the Holy Ghost, is lively, active, and purifying, having its fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. Sanctification, then, and good works are not conditions of, but consequences resulting from, interest in Christ and acceptance with God; not antecedent requisites, à priori, in order to our being justified, but subsequent evidences, à posteriori, of our being so. Hence our excellent Church puts justification before good works, and makes good works follow justification. In her 11th article she treats of justification, and then in the 12th considers good works.

ARTICLE XI.

"Of the Justification of Man.

"We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the homily of justification."

If works, if all works of our own, of every sort and in every point of view, are not here totally excluded from having any thing to do with justification, à parte ante, there is no such thing as meaning in language. Yet our reformers, in the next article, speak, if possible, clearer still; and, as if they thought it not enough simply to exclude works from having the least hand in any part of our justification, go on to acquaint us that, until men actually are justified, they cannot so much as do a good work; good works being the effect and fruits of which justification, previously received, is itself the source and cause. And if justification itself is the cause of good works, then good works cannot possibly be either the cause or condition of justification; because causes and conditions necessarily precede that which they are the causes and conditions of.

ARTICLE XII.

"Of Good Works.

"Albeit that good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins and endure the severity of God's judgment, yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith; insomuch that, by them, a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit."

Hence I conclude that if we are justified or accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ received by faith, and if good works themselves are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, then good works cannot, in the very nature of things, go before justification, any more than fruit can exist prior to the tree that bears it, or an effect can be wrought antecedently to the cause that produces it. Has the determination of our own Church any weight with her members? If it has, they must and will acknowledge that good works do not precede justification, and consequently cannot be (as Papists and Arminians pretend) a condition, without which God will not justify. The good works which he has ordained for us to walk in succeed and follow upon justification ex post facto, as marks and evidences of our being already in a justified state. But our reformers foresaw that some would probably ask, "Since justification is not, in any sense whatever, founded upon good works, but, on the contrary, all good works flow from justification; and these, flowing from it, can never be the source of that from which themselves issue as the stream; what are we to think of those works which are done prior to this justification by faith?" To an enquiry of this sort, the next article returns such an answer as effectually clinches the nail, and lays the axe to the very root of legal, conditional justification; declaring that no works whatever done by us before justification are pleasing to God, and by consequence that no man can, directly or indirectly, be justified by works of his own. I being, of all absurdities, the absurdest to imagine that those sinful works with which God is actually displeased should be conditions of obtaining his favour, or recommend us to his acceptance.

ARTICLE XIII.

"Of Works done before Justification.

"Works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are not pleasant to God; forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, &c."

With these decisions our homilies are perfect unisons. Witness the following citation, which being extremely important, most judiciously worded, and as pertinent to the subject, as if it had been purposely drawn up against Dr. Nowell, I request the reader to peruse it slowly, and to weigh it with the most careful attention. "These works" [namely, such as are becoming of "new creatures in Christ"] "the apostle calleth good works; saying, we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to good works, which God hath ordained that we should walk in them. And yet his meaning is not by these words to induce us to have any affiance, or to put any confidence in our works, as by the merit and deserving of them to purchase to ourselves and others remission of sin, and so consequently everlasting life; for that were mere blasphemy against God's mercy, and great derogation to the blood-shedding of our Saviour Jesus Christ. For it is of the free grace and mercy of God, by the mediation of the blood of his Son Jesus Christ, without merit or deserving on our part, that we are reconciled and brought again into his favour, and are made heirs of his heavenly kingdom. Grace, saith St. Augustine, belonging to God, who doth call us; and then hath he good works whosoever received grace. Good works, then, bring not forth grace, but are brought forth by grace. The wheel, saith he, turneth round, not to the end that it may be made round, but because it is first made round, therefore it turneth round. So no man doeth good works to receive grace by his good works, but because he hath first received grace, therefore, consequently, he doeth good works. And in another place he (St. Austin) saith: good works go not before in him which shall afterwards be justified, but good works do follow after when a man is first justified. (2) St. Paul therefore teacheth that we must do good works for divers respects:

(2) Hence it appears that St. Austin's famous adage, bona opera non precedunt justificandum, sed sequuntur justificatum, is, by its insertion into the above homily, become an article of our faith, which every son of the Church professes to hold, and to which every minister of it has subscribed with his own hand.

1. To shew ourselves obedient children to our heavenly Father, &c. 2. For that they are good declarations and testimonials of our justification. 3. That others, seeing our good works, may the rather by them be stirred up and excited, &c." Homily of Fasting. Part 1.

Good works, therefore, being the effects of justification, cannot be the cause of it, any more than the volubility of a wheel is the cause of its rotundity. A wheel rolls not in order to be made round, but in consequence of being already so: in like manner men do good works not in order to be justified, but in consequence of being justified already. On this grand, fundamental Church of England principle, the doctrine of conditional justification is the grossest of contradictions. For (suffer me to repeat the important remark) if no good works whatever can be done before justification, it is absolutely impossible that justification should be at all suspended on good works; for then justification would be suspended on a non-entity. How, sir, can those good works be the condition of my justification, not one of which can have any existence until I am justified! Your assertion, therefore, p. 124, "That good works, though imperfect and worthless, are yet required by God as necessary terms, qualifications, and conditions, both of our justification and salvation," is flatly giving the lie not only to Scripture, but to every article and homily of our Church upon the subject. Let me likewise observe, by the way, that as, on the one hand, you extol good works too high, in representing them as conditions of justification, so, on the other, you sink them as much too low in presuming to call them worthless. Works resulting from grace, and wrought with a view to glorify God, deserve a better epithet than that of worthless. Had a Calvinist stiled them so, you would have set him down at once for an Antinomian; and not without reason. Good works, though imperfect, are yet very far from being worthless things. Seeing, as the above homily justly observes, they are proofs of our obedience to God, testimonies of our justification, and conducive to the edification of our fellow Christians. We Calvinists value sanctification and good works as the writings of our heavenly estate; which, though they have no hand in procuring the estate itself (for that is already done by the precious merits of the sole Mediator between God and man), yet prove that the estate is our's through the free grace of God and the alone righteousness of Christ. Good works, therefore, though no part of our dependence, nor any condition of our present or everlasting acceptance, are still by no means worthless, as you have contemptuously, and inconsistently with your own plan, ventured to style them. However worthless you may affect to deem them, woe be to you and me if we are eventually found without them.

I have now, so far as the Church of England is properly concerned, touched on the most material parts of your pamphlet; and am of opinion, for my own part, that your design is not very happily executed, nor your objections very solidly founded. I really think, upon a review of the whole, that you have no reason to sing Te Deum for your imaginary triumph over the doctrines of the reformation. Yet is it matter of lamentation that you should even have attempted to subvert them; and that the Church should receive any blow, how slight soever, from so respectable a hand. You have been fighting against those very truths which, when you received ordination, you, on your knees, were solemnly commissioned to defend, and which, previous to that solemnity, you had ratified as your own belief by the deliberate subscription of your name. Form to yourself the idea of an English officer who, false to the cause and service of his Britannic Majesty, should ungratefully and perfidiously endeavour to promote the interest of the French king, at the very time that he wears the regimentals and receives the pay of his own lawful sovereign. Very pertinent to the present argument is that expostulation of the great Dr. South: "To be impugned from without and betrayed from within is certainly the worst condition that either Church or state can fall into; and the best of Churches, the Church of England, has had experience of both. It had been to be wished, and one would think might very reasonably have been expected, that when Providence had took the work of destroying the Church of England out of the Papists' hands, some would have been contented with her preferences, without either attempting to give up her rites and liturgy, or deserting her doctrine; but it has proved much otherwise." (o) It has indeed. How much farther God will suffer us to fall is best known to him that knows all things. I only wish that "we may not part with one thing after another till we have nothing left." How wide a difference there is between the doctrine of the Church and that of some churchmen (as Dr. South well distinguishes) will appear yet plainer by the following extracts from a book which, I fear, is subscribed by too many who have never read it; I mean the homilies of our established Church. Let these decide whether Calvinists or Arminians best deserve the name of churchmen.

(o) Preface to his Animadversions on Sherlock, 1693.

I. Concerning predestination, as it respects Christ the Mediator, our Church delivers herself thus: "When the fulness of time was come, that is, the perfection and course of years appointed from the beginning, then God, according to his former covenant and promise, sent a Messias." Hom. on the Nativity, p. 243. (p)

Again: "Remember that ye be bought from your vain conversation, and that your freedom is purchased neither with gold nor silver, but with the price of the precious blood of that innocent Lamb, Jesus Christ, which was ordained to the same purpose before the world was made." Hom. on the Resurrection, p. 266.

Of predestination, as it respects mankind, I find as follows:

"When God had chosen to himself a peculiar and special people from amongst all other nations that knew not God, he gave unto them certain ordinances, &c." Hom. against Idolatry, p. 104. This refers to the ancient Jews. Let us now hear what is said concerning the Christian Church: "The true Church is a universal congregation or fellowship of God's faithful and elect people, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner-stone." Hom. for Whitsunday, p. 283.

"Let us only trust to be saved by his death and passion, and to have our sins clean washed away through his most precious blood, that in the end of the world, when he shall come again to judge both the quick and the dead, he may receive us into his heavenly kingdom, and place us in the number of his elect and chosen people." Hom. ii. on the Passion, p. 261.

Once more: "God of his mercy and special favour, towards them whom he hath appointed to everlasting salvation, hath so offered his grace especially, and they have so received it fruitfully, that although, by reason of their sinful living outwardly, they seemed before to have been the children of wrath and perdition, yet now, the Spirit of God mightily working in them, they declare, by their outward deeds and life, in the shewing of mercy and charity (which cannot come but of the Spirit of God and his especial grace), that they are the undoubted children of God appointed to everlasting life. And so as, by their wickedness and ungodly living, they shewed themselves according to the judgment of men, which follow the outward appearance, to be reprobates and castaways, so now, by their obedience unto God's holy will, and by their merciful and tender pity (wherein they shew themselves to be like unto God, who is the fountain and spring of all mercy) they declare openly and manifestly to the sight of men that they are the sons of God, and elect of him unto salvation." Hom. ii. on Alms-deeds, p. 235, 203. Hence it is clearly the doctrine of our Church, 1. That there are some persons elect, chosen, and appointed of God to everlasting life. 2. That this his choice of them, and their subsequent regeneration, are founded on his own mercy and special favour towards them. 3. That the elect, even before they are converted and sanctified, are not, in reality, objects of God's hatred, but only seem to be such in the judgment of men. 4. That the conversion of the elect is wrought by God's especial grace, and by his Spirit mightily working in them. 5. That sanctification and good works are (not the causes and conditions of election, but) the marks, proofs, evidences, and consequences of it, whereby the regenerate declare openly and manifestly that they are the undoubted children of God, appointed to everlasting life, and elect of him unto salvation.

Nor is our Church silent as to that other branch of God's decree, commonly called reprobation. "Christ himself, the prophets before him, the apostles after him, all the true ministers of God's holy word, yea, every word in God's book, is unto the reprobate the savour of death unto death" Hom. ii. on certain places of Scripture, p. 228. And elsewhere, more roundly still: God "will have none in council with him, nor any to ask the reason of his doing; for he may do what liketh him, and none can resist him. For he worketh all things in his secret judgment to his own pleasure; yea, even the wicked to damnation, saith Solomon." Rogation, i. Hom. p. 289.

Intimately connected with (and, indeed, solely founded upon) predestination is the doctrine of absolute Providence; concerning which latter the Church thus speaks:—"Epicures they be that imagine that he (God) walketh about the coasts of the heavens, and hath no respect of these inferior things, but that all these things should proceed either by chance, or at adventure, or else by disposition of fortune, and God to have no stroke in them. What other thing is this to say, than, as the fool supposeth in his heart, there is no God?" Rogation, ii. Hom. p. 293.

II. With regard to the extent of redemption, our Church expressly declares that Christ "is the high and everlasting priest who hath offered himself once for all upon the altar of the cross, and. with that one oblation, hath made perfect for evermore them that are sanctified" Hom. i. of Salvation, p. 10. More minutely still: "The end of his coming was to save and deliver his people." Hom. on the Nativity, p. 247. Again: "Christ put himself between God's deserved wrath and our sin, and rent that obligation wherein we were in danger to God, and paid our debt. Our debt was a great deal too great for us to have paid; and without payment God the Father could never be at one with us. Neither was it possible to be loosed from this debt by our own ability. It pleased, him, therefore, to be the payer thereof, and to discharge us quite." Hom. i. on the Passion, p. 249, 250. Hence it appears that, in the opinion of our Church, Christ did not lay down his life, to put men into a salvable state, and render their salvation barely possible; but, actually and absolutely secured the discharge of those he redeemed, and, indeed, it would have been no redemption without this. Christ is here said to have positively paid our debt; and to have so paid it as to discharge us quite. Seems it not, therefore, to flow from these premises that the spiritual debts of those who shall be condemned in the last day, were not paid by him? for, if they were, how can it come to pass that some of those very persons shall be thrown into prison, and there tormented, whose debts have been really paid to the uttermost farthing? Will not the Judge of the whole earth do right? Is it consistent with our ideas of justice, that God the Father should demand double payment of the self-same debts, by charging sin first to the Surety's account and then the sinner's afterwards? Christ, says our homily, discharged us quite: but can such persons be said to be quite discharged on whom divine justice hath still an unsatisfied claim, and against whom the debt-book is yet uncrossed, and for whom penal vengeance is laid up in store? Upon these two correlative suppositions, 1. That the death of Christ was a vicarious punishment; and 2. that it was a proper, real, adequate atonement for sin (both which are the avowed doctrines of our Church); either universal salvation, or a limited redemption, must necessarily follow. But the church does not hold universal salvation; therefore, you must either grant that she contradicts her own fundamental principles, or, that she believes redemption to be only co-extensive with election.—There is, I apprehend, but one way to elude the force of this argument; and that is, fairly and above-board, to take refuge in (g) Socinianism, (as the great Grotius at length unhappily did) by denying that Christ died as our substitute, and in our room and stead. But this refuge is attended with ten thousand times worse consequences than either the doctrine of unlimited salvation, or that of partial redemption. The Arminian salvo, that "Christ died for us, only to put us into a capacity of being saved if we are willing to close in with certain terms offered," leaves the matter every jot as embarrassed as it found it. Since it can never, with any colour of reason, be supposed, that he would ascertain the end, without securing the means; for that would be doing just nothing at all. He cannot be said to have purchased salvation for any, for whom he did not likewise obtain those influences of saving grace without which final salvation cannot be had; nor am I able to conceive how a Being of infinite wisdom would actually pay down a price of infinite value, and yet leave it quite uncertain whether the purchased blessing should be enjoyed by those for whom he bought them. This will still appear more unlikely (or rather impossible), if we take his foreknowledge into the account. Would he (with the deepest reverence be it asked) shed his inestimably precious blood for those persons who, as himself knew at that very time he did it, would certainly reject the redemption wrought? If he did not foreknow this, what becomes of his deity? If he did foreknow it, and yet died for such, it was, in effect, redeeming them unto greater condemnation: and then redemption (so far as these persons are concerned) can hardly be considered as an act of mercy. For my own part, these and similar considerations strike me so strongly that I find myself obliged, by dint both of rational and scripture evidence, to believe that Christ actually and infallibly secured the salvation of every individual for whom he died: that repentance, faith and holiness are wrought in those he hath ransomed; and that God giveth grace and glory to all them for whom he gave his Son.—This train of reasoning is not a little countenanced by the following passage in another of our homilies. "Now it followeth to have, with this knowledge, a sure and constant faith, not only that the death of Christ is available (r) for the redemption of all the world, for the remission of sins, and reconciliation with God the Father; but also that he hath made, upon the cross, a full and sufficient sacrifice for thee, a perfect cleansing of thy sins: So that thou

(g) The alliance between Socinianism and Arianism is evident from the confession of an Arminian divine; Tindal; Cont. of Rap. vol. 15. p. 237. note a. Also Biogr. Dict. vol. 10. p. 404.

(r) That is, of sufficient value: which it most certainly is. But availableness, or intrinsic sufficiency, is one thing; intentional and actual efficacy is another. The argument à Potentia ad Actum concludes nothing.

mayest say, with the apostle, that he loved thee, and gave himself for thee." Hom. on the sacrament, p. 272. But, if Christ loved all men, and gave himself for every individual of mankind, he must of course have loved me and gave himself for me: consequently, this assured faith of his being my lover, my sacrifice, and my Saviour in particular, could not, upon the principle of universal redemption, be so high and distinguishing a privilege as the homily here represents it. Upon the whole, when the homilies appear to speak of redemption, as general, it seems but fair to understand them rather in an indefinite, than in a strictly unlimited sense. Such a declaration as this that follows should be looked upon as explanatory of the Church's meaning in other places, where the restriction is not so expressly laid down. Christ "was obedient even to the very death, the death of the cross. And this he did for us all that believe." First homily on the passion, p. 250.

III. Man's exceeding depravation by nature and total inability as to spiritual good are largely and strongly asserted in our homilies. "The Holy Ghost, in writing the holy Scriptures, is in nothing more diligent than to pull down man's vain glory and pride; which of all vices is most universally grafted in all mankind, even from the first infection of our first father Adam." First homily on the misery of man, p. 6.

"St. Paul, in many places, painteth us out in our colours, calling us the children of the wrath of God when we be born: saying also, that we cannot think a good thought of ourselves; much less can we say well, or do well ourselves." Ibid. p. 8.

"We be, of ourselves, of such earth as can bring forth but weeds, nettles, brambles, briars, cockles, and darnel. Our fruits be declared in the 5th chapter to the Galatians. We have neither faith, charity, hope, patience, chastity, nor any thing else that good is, but of God; and therefore these virtues be called there, the fruits of the Holy Ghost, and not the fruits of man. Second homily on ditto, p. 9.

"Of ourselves, and by ourselves, we have no goodness, help, nor salvation: but, contrariwise, sin, damnation, and death everlasting. Which, if we deeply weigh and consider, we shall the better understand the great mercy of God, and how our salvation cometh only by Christ; for, in ourselves (as of ourselves), we find nothing whereby we may be delivered from this miserable captivity, into the which we were cast, through the envy of the Devil, by breaking of God's commandment in our first parent Adam. We are all become unclean, but we all are not able to cleanse ourselves, nor to make one another of us clean. We are by nature the children of God's wrath, but we are not able to make ourselves the children and inheritors of God's glory. We are sheep that run astray, but we cannot of our own power come again to the sheep-fold; so great is our imperfection and weakness." Ibid. p. 10.

"St. Ambrose concludeth in a few words, saying, he that by nature would withstand vice, either by natural will, or reason, he doth in vain garnish the time of this life, and attaineth not the very true virtues." First homily on good works, p. 28.

"These sentences (good people), unto a natural man, seem mere absurdities, contrary to all reason. For a natural man, as St. Paul saith, understandeth not the things that belong to God: neither can he, so long as old Adam dwelleth in him." Second homily on certain places of Scripture, p. 225.

"God therefore, for his mercy's sake, vouchsafe to purify our minds, through faith in his Son Jesus Christ, and to instil the heavenly drops of his grace into our hard stony hearts to supple the same." Ibid. p. 229.

"Let us, throughout our whole lives, confess all good things to come of God, of what name or nature soever they be: not of these corruptible things only, but much more of all spiritual graces behovable for our soul." Second rogation homily, p. 226.

"If any gift we have, wherewith we may work to the glory of God, and profit to our neighbour, all is wrought by his own and self-same spirit, which maketh his distributions peculiarly to every man as he will." Third rogation homily, p. 299.

"We have, of our own selves, nothing to present us to God." First homily on repentance, p. 326.

Such are the ideas inculcated by the Church of England, concerning man's free-will, and the powers of nature.

IV. Equally careful she is to assert the absolute energy, independence, and efficacy of divine grace. "As the good fruit is not the cause that the tree is good, but the tree must first be good, before it can bring forth good fruit; so the good deeds of men are not the cause that maketh man good, but he is first made good by the spirit and grace of God, that effectually worketh in him, and afterward he bringeth forth good fruits." And a little lower we meet with this expression, "The grace of God, which worketh all in all." Second homily, on almsdeeds, p. 236.

"Where the Holy Ghost worketh there nothing is impossible: as may further also appear by the inward regeneration and sanctification of mankind." Whence, taking occasion to speak of Nicodemus, the homily adds, "Behold a lively pattern of a fleshly and carnal man. He had little or no intelligence of the Holy Ghost, and therefore he goeth bluntly to work, and asketh how this thing" [namely inward regeneration by the Spirit of God] "were possible to be true? Whereas otherwise, if he had known the great power of the Holy Ghost in this behalf, that it is he which inwardly worketh the regeneration and new birth of mankind; he would never have marvelled at Christ's words, but would rather take occasion thereby to praise and glorify God. First homily for Whitsunday, p. 279.

"Man, of his own nature, is fleshly and carnal, corrupt and nought, sinful and disobedient to God, without any spark of goodness in him, without any virtuous or godly motion, only given to evil thoughts and wicked deeds. As for the works of the Spirit, the fruits of faith, charitable and godly motions; if he have any at all in him, they proceed only of the Holy Ghost, who is the only worker of our sanctification, and maketh us new men in Christ Jesus. Such is the power of the Holy Ghost to regenerate men, and, as it were, to bring them forth anew, so that they shall be nothing like the men that they were before." Ibid. p. 280.

"Let them all come together that be now glorified in heaven, and let us hear what answer they will make in these points before rehearsed, whether their first creation was in God's goodness, or of themselves. Forsooth, David would make answer for them all and say, Know ye for a surety, even the Lord is God; he hath made us, and not we ourselves. If they were asked again, who shall be thanked for their regeneration? for their justification? and for their salvation? whether their deserts, or God's goodness only? Let David answer by the mouth of them all at this time, who cannot choose but say, Not to us, O Lord, not to us, but to thy name give all the thanks, for thy loving mercy and for thy truth's sake. If we should ask again, whence came their glorious works and deeds, which they wrought in their lives, wherewith God was so highly pleased and worshipped by them? Let some other witness be brought in to testify this matter, that in the mouth of two or three may the truth be known. Verily, that holy prophet Esay beareth record, and saith, O Lord, it is thou, of thy goodness, that hast wrought all our works in us, not we ourselves. And to uphold the truth of this matter against all justiciaries and hypocrites, which rob Almighty God of his honour, and ascribe it to themselves, St. Paul bringeth in his belief: We be not (saith he) sufficient of ourselves once to think any thing: but all our ability is of God's goodness. For he it is, in whom we have all our being, and living, and moving. If ye will know, furthermore, where they had their gifts and sacrifices, which they offered continually in their lives to Almighty God; they cannot but agree with David, where he saith, Of thy liberal hand, O Lord, we have received that we gave unto thee. If this holy company, therefore, contest so constantly, that all the goods and graces wherewith they were endued in soul, came of the goodness of God only; what more can be said, to prove that all that is good cometh from Almighty God? To justify a sinner, to new create him from a wicked person to a righteous man, is a greater act (saith St. Augustine) than to make such a new heaven and earth as is already made." First rogation homily, p. 289, 290.

"All spiritual gifts and graces come especially from God. Let us consider the truth of this matter, and hear what is testified; first of the gift of faith, the first entry into the Christian life, without the which, no man can please God. For St. Paul confesses it plainly to be God's gift; saying, Faith is the gift of God. It is verily God's work in us, the charity wherewith we love our brethren. If any will we have to rise, it is he that preventeth our will, and disposeth us thereto. Who worketh these great miracles in us? our worthiness, our deservings and endeavours, our wits and virtue? Nay, verily, St. Paul will not suffer flesh and clay to presume to such arrogance; and, therefore saith, All is of God, who hath reconciled us unto himself by Jesus Christ." Third rogation homily, page 297.

We must "Beware and take heed, that we do in no wise think in our hearts, imagine, or believe, that we are able to repent aright, or to turn effectually unto the Lord, by our own might and strength. For this must be verified in all men, Without me ye can do nothing. Again, Of ourselves we are not able as much as to think a good thought. And in another place, It is God that worketh in us both the will and the deed. For this cause, though Hieremie had said before, Turn unto me, saith the Lord; yet afterwards he saith, Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, for thou art the Lord my God. And, therefore that ancient writer and holy Father, Ambrose, doth plainly affirm that the turning of the heart unto God is of God; as the Lord himself doth testify by his prophet, saying, And I will give thee a heart to know me, that I am the Lord; and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, for they shall return unto me with their whole heart." First homily on repentance, p. 330, 331. So far is the Church of England from making the grace of God strike to the free-will of his creatures!

Next, for the doctrine of justification.

V. "Let us know our own works, of what imperfection they be, and then we shall not stand foolishly and arrogantly in our own conceits, nor challenge any part of justification by our merits or works." Second homily on Man's Misery, p. 9.

"All the good works that we can do be imperfect, and, therefore, not able to deserve our justification; but our justification doth come freely, by the mere mercy of God. First homily of Salvation, (s) page 13.

"By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; for it is the gift of God, and not of works, lest any man should glory. And, to be short, the sum of all Paul's disputation is this: That if justice" [i. e. justification] "come of works, then it cometh not of grace; and, if it come of grace, then it cometh not of works. And to this end tend all the prophets, as St. Peter saith in the xth of the Acts. 'Of Christ all the prophets,' saith Saint Peter, 'do witness, that, through his name, all they that do believe in him shall receive the remission of sins.' St. Hilary speaketh these words plainly, in the ixth canon upon Matthew, 'Faith only justifieth.' And St. Basil, a Greek author, writeth thus; 'This is a perfect and whole rejoicing in God, when a man advanceth not himself for his own righteousness, but acknowledgeth himself to lack true justice and righteousness, and to be justified by the only faith in Christ. And Paul,' saith he, 'doth glory in the contempt of his own righteousness, and that he looketh for the righteousness of God by faith.' These be the very words of St. Basil. And St. Ambrose, a Latin author, saith these words: 'This is the ordinance of God, that they which believe in Christ should be saved without works, by faith only, freely receiving remission of their sins.' Consider diligently [adds the Homily] these words, without works—by faith only—freely—we receive remission of our sins.' What can be spoken more plainly, than to say, freely, without works, by faith only, we obtain remission of our sins?" Second part of the Homily of Salvation, pp. 14, 15.

"Man cannot make himself righteous by his own works, neither in part, nor in the whole. For that were the greatest arrogancy and presumption of man that Anti-christ could set up against God, to affirm that a man might, by his own works, take away and purge his own sins, and so justify himself. But justification is the office of God only, and is not a thing which we render unto him, but which we receive of him; not which we give to him, but which we take of him, by his free mercy, and by the only merits of his most dearly beloved Son, our only Redeemer, Saviour, and Justifier." Ibid. pp. 15, 16.

"It is of the free grace and mercy of God, by the mediation of the blood of his Son Jesus Christ, without merit or deserving on our part, that our sins are forgiven us, that we are reconciled and brought again into his favour, and are made heirs of his heavenly kingdom." First homily on Fasting, p. 165.

"To fast, with this persuasion of mind, that our fasting and our good works can make us perfect and just men; and, finally, bring us to heaven; this is a devilish persuasion." Ibid. p. 168.

"It [namely, the parable of the pharisee and publican] is spoken to them that trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others. Now, because the pharisee directeth his works to an evil end, seeking by them justification, which indeed is the proper work of God, without our merits; his fasting twice in the week, and all his other works, though they were never so many, and seemed to the world never so good and holy, yet, in very deed, before God, they are altogether evil and abominable." Ibid. p. 169.

He must have piercing eyes, indeed, who can discover any thing in our homilies, whence to infer the conditionality of justification. What Arminians call conditions our Church calls gifts of God; and those graces, which are the gifts of his own free favour, can never be the conditions of obtaining it. "Two things," says the Church, "are chiefly to be respected, in every good and godly man's prayer: his own necessity, and the glory of Almighty God. Necessity belongeth either outwardly to the body, or inwardly to the soul; which part of man" [i. e. the soul,] "because it is much more precious and excellent than the other, therefore we ought, first of all, to crave such things as properly belong to the salvation thereof; as the gift of repentance; the gift of faith; the gift of charity and good works; remission and forgiveness of sins, &c. and such other like fruits of the Spirit." Third Homily on Prayer, p. 198.

Some Arminians, of more subtilty and refinement than the rest of their sect, ac-

(s) Mr. Strype has an observation which deserves to be noticed here. "In the first framing of this Homily," says he, viz. the Homily of Salvation, "there was a great controversy between Archbishop Cranmer, the chief composer thereof, and Bishop Gardiner, concerning that branch of it that asserted justification by faith: as may be seen in the memorials of that great archbishop, under the year 1517."

(Annals of the reformation under Queen Elizabeth, p. 296.) And well there might; since nothing plunges the dagger deeper into the very heart of Popery than that great fundamental doctrine of the gospel, free, unconditional justification by faith in the imputed righteousness of Christ. This admirable Homily is itself a standing demonstration that not Gardiner, but Cranmer, prevailed.

knowledge, indeed, that we are not justified by moral works and performances of our own, but by the Tò credere, or the act of believing; which faith itself, say they, is imputed to the believer, in lieu of that perfect righteousness which the law demands. This opinion is as totally unscriptural, and anti-scriptural, as the doctrine of justification by works. It is equally absurd in itself, and derogatory to the merits of Christ I shall, however, in this place, content myself with proving that this imaginary imputation of faith for righteousness is not the doctrine of the Church of England. "The true understanding of this doctrine we be justified freely by faith without works, or that we be justified by faith in Christ only; is not, that this our own act, to believe in Christ, or this our faith in Christ, which is within us, doth justify us and deserve our justification unto us (for that were to count ourselves to be justified by some act or virtue that is within ourselves). So that, as St. John the Baptist, although he were never so virtuous and godly a man, yet in this matter of forgiving sin, he did put the people from him, and appointed them unto Christ, saying thus unto them: Behold, yonder is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world; even so, as great and as godly a virtue as faith is yet it putteth us from itself, and remitteth or appointeth us unto Christ, for to have only by him remission of our sins, or justification. So that our faith in Christ (as it were) saith unto us thus: It is not I that take away your sins, but it is Christ only, and to him only I send you for that purpose; forsaking therein all your good virtues, words, thoughts and works, and only putting your trust in Christ." Homily of Salvation, part II. p. 16.

Once more. "God, of his own mercy, through the only merits and deservings of his Son Jesus Christ, doth justify us. Nevertheless, because faith doth directly send us to Christ, for remission of our sins; and that by faith, given us of God. We embrace the promise of God's mercy, and of the remission of our sins (which thing none other of our virtues or works properly doth); therefore, Scripture useth to say that faith without works doth justify. And, forasmuch that it is all one sentence in effect to say, faith without works, and only faith doth justify us; therefore, the old ancient fathers of the Church, from time to time, have uttered our justification with this speech, only faith justifieth us; meaning none other thing than St. Paul meant, when he said, faith without works justifieth us. And because all this is brought to pass, through the only merits and deservings of our Saviour Christ, and not through our merits, or through the merit of any virtue that we have within us, or of any work that cometh from us; therefore, in that respect of merit and deserving, we forsake (as it were) all together again, faith, works, and all other virtues. For our own imperfection is so great, through the corruption of original sin, that all is imperfect that is within us; faith, charity, hope, dread, thoughts, words, and works; and, therefore, not apt to merit and discern any part of our justification for us. And this form of speaking use we in the humbling of ourselves to God; and to give all the glory to our Saviour Christ, who is best worthy to have it." Ibid. part III. p. 17.

It is plain, from these testimonies, that, according to the judgment of the Church, God does not dishonour his law, nor compromise and patch up matters with justice, by accepting of faith, in the room of perfect obedience, and imputing that for righteousness, which is not such; the office of faith in the affair of justification, being to send us directly, or transmit us through and from itself, to Christ; and to embrace God's promises of mercy in him.

It may here be enquired, since neither faith nor works are the matter of justification; what is it, for the sake of which God does justify? Our Church answers with Scripture, the righteousness and bloodshedding of Christ alone. "God sent his only Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, into this world to fulfil the law for us; and, by shedding of his most precious blood, to make a sacrifice and satisfaction, or (as it may be called) amends to his Father for our sins. Homily of Salvation, part I. page 12.

"With his endless mercy he joined his most upright and equal justice. His great mercy he shewed unto us, in delivering from our former captivity, without requiring of any ransom to be paid, or amends to be made upon our parts; which thing by us had been impossible to be done. And whereas it lay not in us that to do, he provided a ransom for us, that was the most precious body and blood of his own most dear and best beloved Son Jesus Christ; who, besides this ransom, fulfilled the law for us perfectly. And so the justice of God and his mercy did embrace together, and fulfilled the mystery of our redemption. Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness, to every one that believeth." Ibid. p. 13.

The apostle toucheth three things specially, which must go together in our justification. Upon God's part his great mercy and grace. Upon Christ's part, justice; that is the satisfaction of God's justice, or the price of our redemption, by the offering of his body, and the shedding of his blood; together with fulfilling of the law perfectly and thoroughly. And, upon our part, true and lively faith in the merits of Jesus Christ, which yet is not ours, but by God's working in us." Ibid.

"It pleased our heavenly Father, of his infinite mercy, without any our desert or deserving, to prepare for us the most precious jewels of Christ's body and blood, whereby our ransom might be fully paid, the law fulfilled, and his justice fully satisfied. So that Christ is now the righteousness of all them that truly do believe in him. He for them paid their ransom by his death. He for them fulfilled the law in his life. So that now in him and by him every true Christian man may be called a fulfiller of the law." Ibid. page. 14. (s)

VI. I shall now proceed to remind you, sir, of what our Church asserts, concerning the influence and in-dwelling of the Holy Spirit.

"In reading of God's word, he most profiteth not always that is most ready in turning of the book: or in saying of it without the book: but he that is most turned into it; that is most inspired with the Holy Ghost; most in his heart and life altered and changed into the thing which he readeth." First Homily on the knowledge of Scripture, p. 3.

"He" [Christ] "speaketh presently unto us in the holy Scriptures, to the great and endless comfort of all them that have any feeling of God in them." First Homily on certain places of Scripture, p. 221.

"Such is the power of the Holy Ghost to regenerate men, and as it were to bring them forth anew; so that they shall be nothing like the men that they were before. Neither doth he think it sufficient inwardly to work the spiritual and new birth of man, unless he do also dwell and abide in him." First Homily for Whitsunday, p. 280.

"Unless the Holy Ghost had been always present governing and preserving the Church from the beginning; it could never have sustained so many and great brunts of affliction and persecution, with so little damage and harm, as it hath. And the words of Christ are most plain in this behalf, saying, that the Spirit of truth should abide with them for ever; that he would be with them always (he meaneth by grace, virtue and power), even to the world's end. Also in the prayer that he made to his Father, a little before his death, he maketh intercession, not only for himself and his apostles, but indifferently for all them that should believe in him, through their words; that is to wit, for his whole Church. Again, St. Paul saith, If any man have not the spirit of Christ, the same is not his. Also, in the words following, we have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father. Hereby then, it is evident and plain to all men that the Holy Ghost was given, not only to the apostles, but also to the whole body of Christ's congregation; although not in like form and majesty as he came down at the feast of Pentecost." Second Homily for Whitsunday, p. 282.

"God give us grace (good people) to know these things, and to feel them in our hearts. This knowledge and feeling is not in ourself. By ourself it is not possible to come by it.—Let us, therefore meekly call upon that bountiful spirit the Holy Ghost, which proceedeth from our Father of mercy, and from our mediator Christ, that he would assist us and inspire us with his presence; that in him we may be able to hear the goodness of God declared unto us to our salvation. For, without his lively and secret inspiration, can we not once so much as speak the name of our Mediator, as St. Paul plainly testifieth: no man can once name our Lord Jesus Christ, but in the Holy Ghost (t)—St. Paul saith, that no man can know what is of God but the spirit of God. As for us, saith he, we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; for this purpose, that we might know the things that be given us by Christ. This leads me

VII. To consider the sense of our Church, with relation to the doctrine of assurance. She tells us that "The right and true Christian faith is not only to believe that Holy Scripture and all the aforesaid articles of our faith are true; but also to have a sure trust and confidence in God's merciful promises, to be saved from everlasting damnation by Christ; whereof doth follow a loving heart to obey his commandments.—For, how can a man have this true faith, this sure trust and confidence in God, that by the merits of Christ, his sins be forgiven, and he reconciled to the favour of God, and to be partaker of the kingdom of heaven by Christ, when he liveth ungodly, and denieth Christ in his deeds?" Third Homily of salvation, p. 18.

"A quick, or lively faith—is not only the common belief of the articles of our faith, but it is also a true trust and confidence of the mercy of God through our Lord Jesus Christ,

(s) "Whose mediation," [i. e. the mediation of Christ] "was so acceptable to God the Father, through his absolute and perfect obedience, that he took his act for a full satisfaction of all our disobedience and rebellion; whose righteousness he took, to inveigh against of sins; whose redemption he would have stand against our damnation." Third Rogation Homily, page 207.

(t) 1 Cor. xii. 3. No man can, for himself in particular, with an assured and appropriating faith, and from a real principle of experimental love, call Jesus his Lord, but by the Holy Ghost; whose gracious office it is to bring Christ and the soul together, in a way of spiritual intercourse and communion.

and a steadfast hope of all good things to be received at God's hand." First Homily on faith, p. 20.

"They" [the Old Testament saints] "did not only know God to be the Lord, Maker, and Governor of all men in the world; but also they had a special confidence and trust that he was and (u) would be their God, their comforter, aider, helper, maintainer, and defender. This is the Christian faith which these holy men had, and we also ought to have." Second Homily on faith, p. 23.

"Finally he (St. John) concludeth, and sheweth the cause why he wrote this epistle; saying, For this cause have I written unto you, that you may know that you have everlasting life which do believe in the Son of God. Ibid. p. 24.

"He that doth consider all these things, and believeth them assuredly as they are to be believed, even from the bottom of his heart, being established in God in this true faith, having a quiet conscience in Christ, a firm hope, and assured trust in God's mercy, through the merits of Jesus Christ, to obtain this quietness, rest, and everlasting joy; shall not only be without fear of bodily death &c." Third Homily against fear of death, p. 61, 62.

This is meant by what the Church calls the "effectuous presence of his heavenly grace." First Homily of the right use of the Church, p. 94.

"Then we shall be assured, after this life, to rest in his holy hill, and to dwell in his tabernacle." Second Homily of the right use of the Church, p. 102.

"By this then, you may well perceive that the only mean and instrument of salvation, required of our parts is faith: that is to say a sure trust and confidence in the mercies of God, whereby we persuade ourselves that God both hath and will forgive our sins." Second Homily on the passion, p. 260.

"Thou hast received his body to endow thee with everlasting righteousness; to assure thee of everlasting bliss and life of thy soul." Homily on the resurrection, p. 265.

"The faithful see, hear, and know the favourable mercies of God sealed, the satisfaction by Christ towards us confirmed, and the remission of sin established. Here they may feel wrought the tranquillity of conscience; the increase of faith; the strengthening of hope; the large spreading abroad of brotherly kindness; with many other sundry graces of God.—Whence you may perceive and know both the spiritual food of this costly supper, and the happy trustings and effects that the same doth bring with it. Now it followeth to have with this knowledge a sure and constant faith, that he hath made upon his cross a full and sufficient sacrifice for thee; a perfect cleansing of thy sins."—First Homily on the sacrament, p. 271, 272.

"If, after contrition, we feel our consciences at peace with God, through remission of our sin, &c." Third Rogation Homily, p. 297.

Intimately connected with the privilege of assurance, is,

VIII. The blessing of final perseverance. Noah, Lot, Abraham, Jacob, David, and Solomon, though they committed very flagrant and atrocious offences, things (as the homily expresses it) "plainly forbidden by the law of God, and now repugnant to all public honesty:" yet, the opinion of our Church seems to be that, even under such shocking circumstances as these, those Jewish saints were not totally fallen from grace. Her words are as follow; "We ought then to learn by them this profitable lesson, that if, so godly men as they were, which otherwise felt inwardly God's Holy Spirit flaming in their hearts with the fear and love of God, could not by their own strength keep themselves from committing horrible sin, but did so griveously fall, that without God's great mercy they had perished everlastingly; how much more then ought we miserable wretches, who have no feeling of God in us at all, continually to fear, not only that we may fall as they did, but also be overcome and drowned in sin which they were not?" First Homily on certain places of Scripture, p. 224, 225.

Perseverance, in another homily, is represented as the gift of God. "Let us, throughout our whole lives confess all good things to come of God, of what name or nature soever they be; not of these corruptible things only, whereof I have now last spoken, but much more of all spiritual graces be-hovable for our soul: without whose goodness no man is called to faith, or stayed therein." Second Rogation Hom. p. 296.

Again, "St. Peter saith, it is of God's power that ye be kept through faith to salvation. It is of the goodness of God, that we falter not in our hope unto him." Third Rogation Hom. p. 297.

The following passages, I should imagine, seem scarcely reconcilable with the doctrine

(u) Hence it appears, that in the judgment of our Church, the assurance of faith looks forward to what shall be, as well as regards the present. The saints, even under the Jewish dispensation, had, according to this homily, not only a special confidence and trust that God was then their God; but likewise that he would be so still, and be their maintainer in the grace he had given them. But how is this consistent with the new Arminian doctrine of finally falling from grace?

of the total and final amissibility of real grace. "True faith will shew forth itself, and cannot long be idle: for, as it is written, the just man doth live by his faith; he never sleepeth nor is idle when he would wake and be well occupied. And God, by his prophet Jeremy, saith, That he is a happy and blessed man which hath faith and confidence in God: for he is like a tree set by the water side, and spreadeth his roots abroad towards the moisture, and feareth not heat when it cometh: his leaf will be green and will not cease to bring forth his fruit: even so faithful men (putting away all fear of adversity) will shew forth the fruit of their good works as occasion is offered to do them." First Homily on Faith, p. 21.

"All those, therefore, have great cause to be full of joy that be joined to Christ with true faith, steadfast hope, and perfect charity; and not to fear death nor everlasting damnation. For death cannot deprive them of Jesus Christ, nor any sin can condemn them that are grafted surely in him who is their only joy, treasure, and life." Second Homily against Fear of Death, p. 56.

"The just man falleth seven times, and riseth again. Though the godly do fall, yet they walk not on purposely in sin; they stand not still, to continue and tarry in sin; they sit not down like careless men, without all fear of God's just punishment for sin: but, defying sin, through God's great grace and infinite mercy, they rise again and fight against sin." Second Homily on certain places of Scripture, p. 226.

"Christ Jesus, the prophets, the apostles, and all the true ministers of his word; yea, every jot and tittle in the Holy Scripture, have been, is, and shall be for evermore, the savour of life unto eternal life unto all those whose hearts God hath purified by true faith." Ibid. p. 228.

"After the loving kindness of God our Saviour appeared towards mankind, not according to the righteousness that we had done, but according to his great mercy, he saved us by the fountain of the new-birth, and by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he poured upon us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that we, being once justified by his grace, should be heirs of eternal life, through hope and faith in his blood." Homily on the Nativity, p. 247.

"St. Peter thanketh God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, for his abundant mercy; because he hath begotten us (saith he) unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from death, to enjoy an inheritance immortal, that never shall perish, which is laid up in heaven for them that be kept by the power of God through faith." Homily on the resurrection, p. 264.

"He hath ransomed sin, overcome the devil, death and hell, and hath victoriously gotten the better hand of them all, to make us free and safe from them. And knowing that we be, by this benefit of his resurrection, risen with him by our faith, unto life everlasting; being in full surety of our hope, that we shall have our bodies likewise raised from death, to have them glorified in immortality, and joined to his glorious body: having, in the mean while, this Holy Spirit within our hearts, as a seal and pledge of our everlasting inheritance. By whose assistance we are replenished with all righteousness; by whose power we shall be able to subdue all our evil affections, rising against the pleasure of God." Ibid. p. 265, 266.

"The faithful have their life, their abiding in him; their union, and, as it were, their incorporation with him." First Homily on the Sacrament, p. 272.

"Neither doth he," [the Holy Ghost] "think it sufficient inwardly to work the spiritual and new-birth of a man, unless he do also dwell and abide in him." First homily for Whitsunday, p. 280.

"Very liberal and gentle is the spirit of wisdom. In his power shall we have sufficient ability to know our duty to God. In him shall we be comforted and encouraged to walk in our duty. In him shall we be meet vessels to receive the grace of Almighty God: for it is he that purgeth and purifieth the mind by his secret working. And he only is present every where by his invisible power, and containeth all things in his dominion. He lighteneth the heart, to conceive worthy thoughts of Almighty God: he sitteth in the tongue of man, to stir him to speak his honour. He only ministereth spiritual strength to the powers of our soul and body. To hold the way which God had prepared for us, to walk rightly in our journey, we must acknowledge that it is in the power of his Spirit, which helpeth our infirmity." Third Homily for Rogation week, p. 299.

So speaks the Church of England; and so will she ever speak while her liturgy, her articles, and homilies stand as they do. These are the doctrines which she holds; these the truths to which all her clergy have subscribed; (x) truths these which have no more to do with Methodism (properly so called) than they have with Mahometanism. To our departure from the above principles of the Reformation are chiefly owing, 1. That the Church and churchmen are the scorn of infidels. 2.

(x) Well, therefore, might the House of Commons pass a condemnatory vote concerning Montague's Book, written in favour of Arminianism: see Life of Laud, p. 148 and 180, with Laud's Anim. p. 181.

That so great a part of the common people of this land are sunk into such deplorable ignorance of divine things as is unparalleled in any other Protestant country. 3. That our churches are, in many places, so empty, while dissenting meetings are generally as full as they can hold. The plain but melancholy truth is, that in various parts of this kingdom multitudes of persons, who are churchmen upon principle, are forced to go to meeting in order to hear the doctrines of their own Church preached. And as to the totally ignorant and openly profane, they care not whether they attend on any public worship or not. To the same deviation from our established doctrines we may, 4. Impute, in great measure, the vast and still increasing spread of infidelity amongst us. Christianity, shorn of its peculiar and distinguishing principles, and reduced to little more than a dry system of Ethics, can take but small hold of men's hearts, and is itself but a better species of Deism. Many graceless persons are yet men of good sense; and when such consider the present state of religion in this country, how is it possible for them not to reason in a manner similar to this? (y) "There is a book called the Bible, in which such and such doctrines are written as with a sun-beam. There is also an establishment, called the Church, which teaches the self-same doctrines, and is the very echo of that book. This Bible is said by the clergy to be of divine authority, and a revelation from God. And for the Church, they tell us, it is the best and purest in the world; and, indeed, unless they thought it so, nothing could justify their solemn subscription to its decisions. Yet how many of them open their mouths and draw their pens against those very decisions to which they have set their hands! Can those of them who do this really believe the Scriptures to be divine, and their Church to be in the right? Does it not rather look as if religion was no more than a state-engine on one hand, and a genteel trade on the other?" Such I more than fear is the conclusion unhappily inferred by thousands from the conduct of some who lift up their heel against the Church while they eat her bread, or, as Dr. Young expresses it, "Pluck down the vine, and get drunk with the grapes." To the same source may be traced the rapid and alarming progress of Popery in this kingdom. Would we lay the axe to the root of this evil? Let us forsake our Arminianism, and come back to the doctrines of the Reformation. That these are Calvinistic has, I think, been fully proved; and should these proofs be deemed insufficient, there are more in reserve. A man must draw up a prodigiously large index expurgatorius to our articles, homilies, and liturgy, before he can divest the Church of her Calvinism. As long as these, in their present form, remain the standards of her faith, so long will predestination be an eminent part of it. We might more plausibly, with the philosopher of old, deny that there is any such thing as motion, than deny this glaring, palpable, stare-face truth. Whilst the Calvinistic doctrines were the language of our pulpits as well as of our articles, the Reformation made a swift and extensive progress. But ever since our articles and our pulpits have been at variance, the Reformation has been at a stand. At a stand, did I say? I said too little. Protestantism has ever since been visibly on the decline. Look round England; look round London. Is not Popery gaining ground upon us every day? And no wonder. Arminianism is the basis of it. Figuratively speaking, the Arminian points are five of the seven hills on which the mystic Babylon is built. It gives a true Papist less pain to hear of pope Joan than of predestination. That I do not affirm things at random, in calling Arminianism the very essence of Popery, will appear from the following short antithesis, wherein the doctrines of our own Church and those of Rome, respecting some of the articles under debate, are contrasted together in the very words of each Church.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

I. The godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons.

ART. XVII.

II. The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith and calling upon God.

ART. X.

III. We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and not for our own works or deservings.

ART. XI.

IV. That we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort.

ART. XII.

V. ART. XIII. Of works done before justification.

CHURCH OF ROME.

I. No man, so long as he liveth in this mortal life, ought so far to presume concerning the hidden mystery of divine predestination as positively to conclude that he is actually in the number of the predestinate.

Concil. Trid. Sess. 6. c. xii.

II. If any person shall say that since the fall of Adam man's free-will is lost and extinct, &c. Let him be accursed.

Ibid. Sess. 6. can. v.

III. If any person shall say that men are justified, either by the alone righteousness of Christ, or by a bare forgiveness of sins, Let him be accursed.

Ibid. can. xi.

IV. If any one shall say that the ungodly is justified by faith only, so as to mean that nothing else is required, &c. Let him be accursed.

Ibid. can. ix.

V. If any one shall say that all the works done be-

Works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are not pleasant to God; yea, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin.

fore justification, in that way soever they are done, are actually sins, and deserving of God's displeasure, &c. Let him be accursed.

VI. Good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification.

ART. XII.

VI. If any man shall say that justification [justitiam] received is not preserved, and even increased before God by good works, but that those good works themselves are no more than the fruits and evidences [fructus et signa] of justification already obtained, &c. Let him be accursed.

Even from this slight survey, must not a man be blind not to discern that Calvinism is the religion of England, and that Arminianism is the heresy of Rome; (2) yet far be it from me to think that all among us who espouse the Arminian tenets are intentional Papists, or have any affection for Popery, as such. But this I cannot help believing, that Arminianism is the forerunner which prepares the way for Romanism, and, if not discarded in time, will one day open the door to it.

To close all, our doctrines are the precious depositum committed in a particular manner to the guardianship of us who have the honour to minister in holy things. How those who make no scruple to betray this inestimable trust, which they have so solemnly and repeatedly engaged to preserve, can answer it in conscience, must be submitted to God and themselves. For a clergyman to subscribe to our articles in the presence of his bishop, and after his admission to a benefice, to read over those articles in his Church deliberately and word by word, and there, in the presence of God, and in the hearing of his own parishioners, publicly to testify his unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing therein contained, while he disbelieves, and, it may be, the same day contradicts in the pulpit what he had so lately assented to from the desk, is, I believe, a species of guilt unknown to any Protestant nation but this. I fear such a clergyman, if such a clergyman is to be found, may take home those awful words to himself, Thou hast not only lied unto men, but unto God.

We have had long experience of the sad effects that have attended that mere ethical way of preaching which has been in fashion ever since the restoration. When that happy event took place, the generality of the clergy ran so fast and so far from Puritanism, that they out-ran the thirty-nine articles, (a) and lost sight of the Church itself. "Good works, good works," was the cry of that age, and is the cry of the present. I heartily wish good works abounded more among us than they do; but I am certain they never will until they are enforced on Christian principles, even the doctrines of grace. Under a pretence of magnifying good works, we have almost kicked faith out of doors; whereas they will always stand or fall together. There can be no good works which do not flow from faith; and no true faith but what is productive of good works. I appeal to demonstration, the life of argument. Faith is banished, and good works are posting after it as fast as they can. Contempt of gospel doctrines and neglect of gospel morals are inseparable. That morality which does not result from faith is (as Luther says of free-will) no more than titulus et nomen sine re. Faith, according to the united determinations of Scripture and our own Church, is the root and source of all true obedience. And shall we idly think to render the tree more fruitful by severing it from its root? or to enlarge the stream by cutting off its communication with the fountain? When the genuine doctrines of the Church of England are restored to her sons, then, and not till then, will good works flourish and abound.

Veneration and affection for the Church of England gave birth to the preceding pages. I have endeavoured to rub off the extraneous varnish with which you, Sir, have disguised her, and to restore her complexion to its native beauty and simplicity. The doctrines which she avows cannot but appear amiable in the eyes of all her genuine sons; and, upon a nearer view, Calvinism, I would hope, is not found to be that horrid, hideous thing which they would make it who first dress up the dove in raven's plumes, and then cry out "How black she looks!"

I shall conclude with apologizing for this freedom; which, however, I should not have taken, had not you first made so free with the Church. I have no interest abstracted from her's to promote, no resentment to gratify, no party to serve. I never had, to my knowledge, the pleasure of so much as seeing the author of Pietas Oxoniensis, nor have I the least acquaintance with any one of the expelled students. So far, at least, as the doctrines of the Church are concerned, it seems incumbent on you to retract what you have done. The ablest lawyers, when they find themselves embarked in an absolutely indefensible cause, think it no disparagement, but a point of honour, to throw up their briefs. However, as I am addressing myself to a clergyman, I shall remind you of a very great man, an ornament to his country as well as to the Church, who, after having long been a zealous Arminian, sacrificed his prejudices, submitted to superior evidence, and boldly avowed those Calvinistic doctrines which once he laboured to destroy. You will readily guess that I mean the justly famous Dr. South, who, moreover, was, like you, public orator of Oxford. After the mention of such a name, it can be no insult to Dr. Nowell to wish that he may go and do likewise. The doctrines of the Church have not been changed since she happily emerged at the reformation. Religious truths are not, like lead, or any other fusible metal, to be melted down and thrown into what form we please, but, like their adorable author, are the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Nor until the Church changes should we.

(2) So Heylin expressly owns; Life of Laud, p. 33. After which he adds, impudently, "so near, &c.,"

You will excuse my not subjoining my name. Where truth is sought, names are of little account. An arrow from an unknown hand may do as much execution as if the contending parties were acquainted. I shall therefore only subscribe myself, with undisssembled respect,

Rev. Sir,

Your most obedient and most humble Servant,
CLERUS.

PREFACE.

WHEN I consider the absolute independency of God, and the necessary total dependence of all created things on him their first cause, I cannot help standing astonished at the pride of impotent, degenerate man, who is so prone to consider himself as a being possessed of sovereign freedom, and invested with a power of self-salvation, able, he imagines, to counteract the designs even of infinite wisdom, and to defeat the agency of Omnipotence itself. Ye shall be as gods, said the tempter to Eve in Paradise; and ye are as gods, says the same tempter, now, to her apostate sons. One would be apt to think that a suggestion so demonstrably false and flattering; a suggestion the very reverse of what we feel to be our state; a suggestion alike contrary to Scripture and reason, to fact and experience, could never meet with the smallest degree of credit. And yet, because it so exactly coincides with the natural haughtiness of the human heart, men not only admit, but even relish the deception, and fondly incline to believe that the father of lies does, in this instance at least, speak truth.

The Scripture doctrine of predetermination lays the axe to the very root of this potent delusion. It assures us that all things are of God; that all our times and all events are in his hand. Consequently, that man's business below is to fill up the departments and to discharge the several offices assigned him in God's purpose from everlasting; and that, having lived his appointed time, and finished his allotted course of action and suffering, he that moment quits the stage of terrestrial life, and removes to the invisible state.

The late deservedly celebrated Dr Young, though he affected great opposition to some of the doctrines called Calvinistic, was compelled, by the force of truth, to acknowledge that "there is not a fly but has had infinite wisdom concerned, not only in its structure, but in its destination." (b) Nor did the late learned and excellent bishop Hopkins go a jot too far in asserting as follows: "A sparrow, whose price is but mean, two of them valued at a farthing (which some make to be the tenth part of a Roman penny, and was certainly one of their least coins), and whose life, therefore, is but contemptible, and whose flight seems giddy and at random, yet it falls not to the ground, neither lights any where, without your Father. His all-wise providence hath before appointed what bough it shall pitch on, what grains it shall pick up, where it shall lodge and where it shall build, on what it shall live and when it shall die. Our Saviour adds, the very hairs of your head are all numbered. God keeps an account even of that stringy excrescence. Do you see a thousand little motes and atoms wandering up and down in a sun-beam? It is God that so peoples it, and he guides their innumerable and irregular strayings. Not a dust flies in a beaten road but God raiseth it, conducts its uncertain motion, and by his particular care conveys it to the certain place he had before appointed for it; nor shall the most fierce and tempestuous wind hurry it any farther. Nothing comes to pass but God hath his ends in it, and will certainly make his own ends out of it. Though the world seem to run at random, and affairs to be huddled together in blind confusion and rude disorder, yet God sees and knows the concatenation of all causes and effects, and so governs them that he makes a perfect harmony out of all those seeming jarrings and discords. It is most necessary that we should have our hearts well established in the firm and unwavering belief of this truth, that whatsoever comes to pass, be it good or evil, we may look up to the hand and disposal of all, to God. In respect of God there is nothing casual nor contingent in the world. If a master should send a servant to a certain place, and command him to stay there till such a time, and presently after should send another servant to the same [place], the meeting of these two is wholly casual in respect of themselves, but ordained and foreseen by the master who sent them. So it is in all fortuitous events here below. They fall out unexpectedly as to us, but not so as to God. He foresees and he appoints all the vicissitudes of things." (c)

To illustrate this momentous doctrine, especially so far as God's sovereign distribution of grace and glory is concerned, was the chief motive that determined me to the present publication. In perusing the works of that most learned and evangelical divine, one of whose performances now appears in an English dress, I was particularly taken with that part of his confession of faith (presented A. D. 1562, to the senate of Strasburgh), which relates to predestination. It is, from beginning to end, a regular chain of solid argument, deduced from the unerring word of divine revelation, and confirmed by the coincident testimonies of some of the greatest lights that ever shone in the Christian Church. Such were Austin, Luther, Bucer. Names that will be precious and venerable as long as true religion has a friend remaining upon earth.

Excellent as Zanchy's original piece is, I yet have occasionally ventured both to retrench and to enlarge it in the translation. To this liberty I was induced by a desire of rendering it as complete a treatise on the subject as the allotted compass would allow. I have endeavoured rather to enter into the spirit of the admirable author than, with a scrupulous exactness, to retail his very words. By which means the performance will prove, I humbly trust, the more satisfactory to the English reader; and for the learned one, he can at any time, if he pleases, by comparing the following version with the original Latin, both perceive wherein I have presumed to vary from it, and judge for himself whether my omissions, variations, and enlargements are useful and just.

The Arminians (I know not whether through ignorance or to serve a turn) affect at present to give out that Luther and Calvin were not agreed in the article of predestination. A more palpable mistake was never advanced. So far is it from being true, that Luther (as I can easily prove, if called to it) went as heartily into that doctrine as Calvin himself. He even asserted it with much more warmth, and proceeded to much harsher lengths in defending it, than Calvin ever did, or any other writer I have met with of that age. In the following performance I have, for the most part, carefully retained Zanchy's quotations from Luther, that the reader, from the sample there given, might form a just idea of Luther's real sentiments concerning the points in question.

Never was a publication of this kind more seasonable than at present. Arminianism is the grand religious evil of this age and country. It has, more or less, infected every Protestant denomination amongst us, and bids fair for leaving us in a short time not so much as the very profession of godliness. The power of Christianity has, for the most part, taken its flight long ago, and even the form of it seems to be on the point of bidding us farewell. Time has been when the Calvinistic doctrines were considered and defended as the palladium of our established Church by her bishops and clergy, by the universities and the whole body of the laity. It was during the reigns of Edward VI., queen Elizabeth, James I., and the greater part of Charles I.; as difficult to meet with a clergyman who did not preach the doctrines of the Church of England, as it is now to find one who does. We have generally forsaken the principles of the reformation, and Ichabod, or thy glory is departed, has been written on most of our pulpits and church-doors ever since.

Thou, O God, has brought a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it.

Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root; and it filled the land.

The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars.

She sent out her boughs to the sea, and her branches unto the river.

Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they who pass by the way do pluck her?

The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it.

Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts! Look down from heaven, and behold and visit this vine;

And the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted; and the branch that thou madest strong for thyself!

So will we not go back from thee: quicken us, and we shall call upon thy name.

Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts! Cause thy face to shine, and we shall yet be saved. Psalm lxxx.

Never was description more strikingly expressive of the state our national Church is at present in! Never was supplication more pertinently adapted to the lips of her genuine sons!

In vain do we lament the progress of Popery; in vain do we shut up a few private mass-houses, while our presses teem and our pulpits ring with the Romish doctrines of merit and free-will; doctrines whose native and inevitable tendency is to smooth the passage for our fuller coalition with antichrist. If we are really desirous to shun committing spiritual adultery with the mother of harlots and abominations, we must withdraw our feet from the way that leadeth to her house.

Blessed be God, the doctrines of grace are again beginning to lift up their heads amongst us; a sign, it is to be hoped, that the Holy Spirit hath not quite forsaken us, and that our redemption from the prevailing errors of the day draweth near. Now, if ever, is the time for all who love our Church and nation in sincerity to lend a helping hand to the ark, and contribute, though ever so little, to its return.

The grand objection usually made to this important truth, which is the main subject of the ensuing sheets, proceeds on a supposition of partiality in God, should the Calvinistic doctrine be admitted. If this consequence did really follow, I see not how it would authorize man to arraign the conduct of Deity. Should an earthly friend make me a present of 10,000*l.*, would it not be unreasonable, ungrateful, and presumptuous in me to refuse the gift and revile the giver only because it might not be his pleasure to confer the same favour on my next-door neighbour? In other cases the value of a privilege or of a possession is enhanced by its scarceness. A virtuoso sets but little esteem on a medal, a statue, or a vase, so common that every man who pleases may have one of the same kind; he prizes that alone as a rarity which really is such, and which is not only intrinsically valuable, but which lies in few hands. Were all men here upon earth qualified and enabled to appear as kings, the crown, the sceptre, the robe of state, and other ensigns of majesty, would presently sink into things hardly noticeable. The distinguishing grandeurs of royalty, by ceasing to be uncommon, would quickly cease to be august and striking. Upon this principle it was that Henry IV. of France, said on his birth-day, "I was born as on this day; and no doubt, taking the world through, thousands were born on the same day with me; yet, out of all those thousands, I am, perhaps, the only one whom God hath made a king. How signally am I indebted to the peculiar bounty of his providence!" Similar are the reflections and the acknowledgments of such persons as are favoured with the sense of their election in Christ to holiness and heaven.

"But what becomes of the non-elect?" You have nothing to do with such a question, if you find yourself embarrassed and distressed by the consideration of it. Bless God for his electing love, and leave him to act as he pleases by them that are without. Simply acquiesce in the plain Scripture account; and wish to see no farther than revelation holds the lamp. It is enough for you to know that the Judge of the whole earth will do right. Yet will you reap much improvement from the view of predestination, in its full extent, if your eyes are able stedfastly to look at all which God hath made known concerning it. But if your spiritual sight is weak, forego the enquiry, so far as reprobation is concerned, and be content to know but in part, till death transmits you to that perfect state where you shall know even as you are known. Say not, therefore, as the opposers of these doctrines did in St. Paul's days, "Why doth God find fault with the wicked? For who hath resisted his will? If he who only can convert them refrains from doing it, what room is there for blaming them that perish, seeing it is impossible to resist the will of the Almighty?" Be satisfied with St. Paul's answer: Nay, but who art thou, O man, that repliest against God? The apostle hinges the matter entirely on God's absolute sovereignty. There he rests it; and there we ought to leave it. (e)

Were the whole of mankind equally loved of God and promiscuously redeemed by Christ, the song which believers are directed to sing would hardly run in these admired strains: To him that hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God, &c. Rev. i. 5, 6. A hymn of praise like this seems evidently to proceed on the hypothesis of peculiar election on the part of God, and of a limited redemption on the part of Christ; which we find still more explicitly declared, Rev. v. 9, where we have a transcript of that song which the spirits of just men made perfect are now singing before the throne and before the Lamb: Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us unto God, by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation. Whence the elect are said to have been redeemed from among men. Rev. xiv. 4.

In short there is no such thing as casualty or accident even in things of temporal concern, much less in matters spiritual and everlasting. If the universe had a maker, it must have a governor; and if it has a governor, his will and providence must extend to all things, without exception.

(e) Some of the more considerate heathens treated God's hidden will with an adoring reverence which many of our modern Arminians would do well to imitate. Thus Bion (Κλησθ. και Μυσερ. 10.): It is not for man to sit in judgment on the actions of God.

So Theognis (γρως. 141, 142): We men are foolish in our imaginations, and know nothing; but the gods accomplish all things according to their own mind.

And again (Lin. 687, 688): It is not lawful for mortals to enter the lists with the gods, nor to bring in an accusation against them.

(f) Since the above was written, I have met with the fine passage to which it refers: "Providence delights to conceal its wonders under the veil of human operations." Rollin's Ant. and Sciences of the Ancients, vol. iii. p. 480

Mr. Hervey has likewise a most beautiful and judicious paragraph to the same effect; where, speaking of what is commonly termed accidental death, this admirable writer asks: Was it then a random stroke? doubtless the blow came from an aiming, though invisible, hand. God presideth over the armies of heaven. God ruleth among the inhabi-

For my own part I can discern no medium between absolute predestination and blank Atheism.

Mr. Rollin, (f) if I mistake not, has somewhere a fine observation to this effect: that "it is usual with God so carefully to conceal himself, and to hide the agency of his providence behind second causes, as to render that very often undiscernable and indistinguishable from these." Which wisdom of conduct and gentleness of operation (not less efficacious because gentle and invisible), instead of exciting the admiration they deserve, have, on the contrary, given occasion to the setting up of that unreal idol of the brain called chance. Whereas, to use the lovely lines of our great moral poet,

All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see.

Words are only so far valuable as they are the vehicles of meaning. And meaning, or ideas, derive their whole value from their having some foundation in reason, reality, and fact. Was I, therefore, to be concerned in drawing up an expurgatory index to language, I would, without mercy, cashier and proscribe such words as chance, fortune, luck, casualty, contingency, and mishap. Nor unjustly. For they are voces et prateria nihil. Mere terms without ideas. Absolute expletives, which import nothing. Unmeaning cyphers, either proudly invented to hide man's ignorance of real causes, or sacrilegiously designed to rob the Deity of the honours due to his wisdom, providence, and power.

Reason and revelation are perfect unisons in assuring us that God is the supreme, independent first cause, of whom all secondary and inferior causes are no more the effects. Else proper originality and absolute wisdom, unlimited supremacy and almighty power, cease to be attributes of Deity. I remember to have heard an interesting anecdote of king William and bishop Burnet. The Arminian prelate af-tants of the earth. And God conducteth what men call chance. Nothing, nothing comes to pass through a blind and undiscerning fatality. If accidents happen, they happen according to the exact foreknowledge, and conformably to the determinate counsels of eternal wisdom. The Lord, with whom are the issues of death, signs the warrant, and gives the high commission. The seemingly fortuitous disaster is only the agent or instrument appointed to execute the supreme decree. When the king of Israel was mortally wounded, it seemed to be a casual shot. A certain man drew a bow at a venture, (1 Kings xxii. 34.) At a venture, as he thought. But his hand was strengthened by an omnipotent aid, and the shaft levelled by an unerring eye. So that what we term casualty is really providence, accomplishing deliberate designs, but concealing its own interposition. How comforting this reflection! Admirably adapted to soothe the throbbing anguish of the mourners, and compose their spirits into a quiet submission! Excellently suited to dissipate the fears of godly survivors, and create a calm intrepidity even amidst innumerable perils! Hervey's Meditations, vol. i. p. 27, 28.

fecto to wonder "How a person of his majesty's piety and good sense could so rootedly believe the doctrine of absolute predestination." The royal Calvinist replied: Did I not believe absolute predestination, I could not believe a providence. For it would be most absurd to suppose that a being of infinite wisdom would act without a plan; for which plan predestination is only another name.

What, indeed, is predestination, but God's determinate plan of action? and what is providence but the evolution of that plan? In his decree God resolved within himself what he would do, and what he would permit to be done: by his providence, this effective and permissive will passes into external act, and has its positive accomplishment. So that the purpose of God, as it were, draws the outlines; and providence lays on the colours. What that designed this completes: what that ordained this executes. Predestination is analogous to the mind and intention, providence to the hand and agency of the artificer. Hence, we are told that God worketh [there's his providence] all things after the counsel of his own will [there's his decree], Eph. i. 11. And again, he doth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand [i. e. his will, and the execution of it, are irresistible], nor say unto him, what dost thou? i. e. his purpose and providence are sovereign, and for which he will not be accountable to his creatures. Dan. iv. 35.

According, therefore, to the Scripture representation, Providence neither acts vaguely and at random, like a blind archer, who shoots uncertainly in the dark, as well as he can; nor yet pro re natâ, or as the unforeseen exigence of affairs may require; like some blundering statesman, who plunges (it may be) his country and himself into difficulties, and then is forced to unravel his cobweb, and reverse his plan of operations, as the best remedy for those disasters, which the court-spider had not the wisdom to foresee. But shall we say this of God? It were blasphemy. He that dwelleth in heaven laugheth all these miserable afterthoughts to scorn. God, who can neither be over-reached, nor overpowered, has all these wretched post-expedients in derision. He is incapable of mistake. He knows no levity of will. He cannot be surprised with any unforeseen inconveniencies. His throne is in heaven, and his kingdom ruleth over all. Whatever, therefore, comes to pass, comes to pass as a part of the original plan: and is the offspring of that prolific series of causes and effects which owes its birth to the ordaining and permissive will of Him, in whom we all live, and are moved, (g) and have our being. Providence, in time, is the hand that delivers God's purpose of those beings and events with which that purpose was pregnant from everlasting. The doctrine of equivocal generation is not more absurd in philosophy than the doctrine of un-predestinated events is in theology.

Thus the long train of things is, though

A mighty maze, yet not without a plan.

God's sovereign will is the first link; his unalterable decree is the second; and his all-active providence the third; in the great chain of causes. What his will determined that his decree established, and his providence, either mediately or immediately effects. His will was the adorable spring of all; his decree marked out the channel; and his providence directs the stream.

"If so," it may be objected, "it will follow that whatever is is right." Consequences cannot be helped. No doubt God, who does nothing in vain; who cannot do any thing to no purpose, and still less to a bad one; who both acts and permits with design; and who weighs the paths of men; has, in the unfathomable abyss of his counsel, very important (though to us secret) reasons, for permitting the first entrance of moral evil, and for suffering both (h) moral and natural evil still to reign over so great a part of the creation. Unsearchable are his judgments [κρυπτα, decrees] and his ways [the methods and dispensations of his providence] past finding out. Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things. Rom. ii. 33, 34, 36. As to myself, I can, through grace, most heartily adopt the maxim of Bengelius, non plus sumere, non minus accipere: (i) I neither wish to know more than God has revealed, nor remain ignorant of what he has revealed. I desire to advance, and to halt, just when and where the pillar of God's written word stays or goes forward. I am content that the impenetrable veil, divinely interposed between his purposes and my comprehension, be not drawn aside, until faith is lost in sight, and my spirit return to him who gave it. But of this I am assured, that echo does not reverberate sound so punctually as the actual disposal of things answers to God's predetermination concerning

(g) Κινουμεθα, Acts xvii. 28.

(h) Grotius himself is forced to own, "quæ verò permittuntur Scelera, non carent interim suo fructu," i. e. even the crimes which God permits the perpetration of are not without their good consequences. (De Veritat. Rel. I. 1, sect. 19.) A bold saying, this! But the sayer was an Arminian; and, therefore, we hear no outcry on the occasion.

(i) Ordo Temporum, cap. viii. p. 302.

them. This cannot be denied, without dethroning providence, as far as in us lies, and setting up fortune in its room. There is no alternative. I defy all the sophistry of man to strike out a middle way. He that made all things either directs all things he has made, or has consigned them over to chance. But, what is chance? a name for (k) nothing. Arminianism, therefore, is Atheism.

I grant that the twin doctrines of predestination and providence are not without their difficulties. But the denial of them is attended with ten thousand times more and greater. The difficulties, on one side, are but as dust upon the balance: those on the other, as mountains in the scale. To imagine that a being of boundless wisdom, power, and goodness, would create the universe, and not sit at the helm afterwards, but turn us adrift to shift for ourselves, like a huge vessel without a pilot, is a supposition that subverts every notion of Deity, gives the lie to every page in the Bible, contradicts our daily experience, and insults the common reason of mankind.

Say'st thou, the course of nature governs all?
The course of nature is the art of God.

The whole creation, from the seraph down to the indivisible atom, ministers to the supreme will, and is under the special observation, government, and direction, of the Omnipotent Mind—who sees all, himself unseen; who upholds all, himself unsustained; who guides all, himself guided by none; and who changes all, himself unchanged.

“But does not this doctrine tend to the establishment of fatality?” Supposing it even did, were it not better to be a Christian fatalist, than to avow a set of loose Arminian principles, which, if pushed to their natural extent, inevitably terminate in the rankest Atheism? For without predestination there can be no providence; and without providence, no God.

After all, what do you mean by fate? If you mean a regular succession of determined events, from the beginning to the end of time; an uninterrupted chain without a single chasm; all depending on the eternal will and continued influence of the great First Cause: if this is fate, it must be owned that it and the Scripture predestination are at most very thinly divided; or rather, entirely coalesce. But if, by fate is meant either a constitution of things antecedent to the will of God, by which he himself was bound, ab origine; and which goes on of itself, to multiply causes and effects, to the exclusion of the all-pervading power and unintermitting agency of an intelligent, perpetual, and particular providence; neither reason nor Christianity allows of any such fate as this. Fate thus considered is just such an extreme on the one hand as chance is on the other. Both are alike unexistible.

It having been not unusual with the Arminian writers to tax us with adopting the fate of the ancient Stoics, I thought it might not be unacceptable to the English reader to subjoin a brief view of what those philosophers generally held (for they were not all exactly of a mind) as to this particular. It will appear to every competent reader, from what is there given, how far the doctrine of fate, as believed and taught by the Stoics, may be admitted upon Christian principles. Having large materials by me for such a work, it would have been very easy for me to have annexed a dissertation of my own, upon the subject; but I chose to confine myself to a small extract from the citations and remarks of the learned Lipsius; who seems, in his Physiologia Stoicorum, to have almost exhausted the substance of the argument, with a penetration and precision which leave little room either for addition or amendment. In a cause, therefore, where the interest of truth is so eminently concerned, I would rather retain the ablest counsel, when it can be had, than venture to be myself her sole advocate.

For my own particular part, I frankly confess that, as far as the coincidence of the Stoical fate with the Bible-predestination (l) holds good; I see no reason why we should be ashamed to acknowledge it. St. Austin, and many other great and excellent men, have not scrupled to admit both (k) The late learned and indefatigable Mr. Chambers has in his valuable Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, under the word Chance, two or three observations, so pertinent and full to this remark, (viz. of chance being a name for nothing) that I cannot help transcribing them. “Our ignorance and precipitancy lead us to attribute effects to chance which have a necessary and determinate cause.

“When we say a thing happens by chance, we really mean no more than that its cause is unknown to us: and not, as some vainly imagine, that chance itself can be the cause of any thing. From this consideration Dr. Bentley takes occasion to expose the folly of that old tenet, The World was made by Chance.

“The case of the painter, who unable to express the foam at the mouth of the horse he had painted, threw his sponge in despair at the piece, and by chance did that which he could not before do by design, is an eminent instance of the force of chance. Yet it is obvious all we here mean by chance is, that the painter was not aware of the effect; or that he did not throw the sponge with such a view. Not but that he actually did every thing necessary to produce the effect. Inasmuch that, considering the direction wherein he threw the sponge, together with its form and specific gravity; the colours wherewith it was smeared, and the distance of the hand from the piece; it was impossible, on the present system of things, that the effect should not follow.”

(l) “Now I am in some measure enlightened” (says the Rev. Mr. Newton, of Olney), “I can easily perceive, it is in the adjustment and concurrence of seemingly fortuitous circumstances, that the ruling power and wisdom of God are most evidently dis-

the word [viz. the word fate] and the thing properly understood (m). I am quite of Lipsius's mind: "et verò non aversabor Stoici nomen; sed Stoici Christiani." I have no objection to be called a Stoic, so you but prefix the word Christian to it (n).

Here ended the first lesson: i. e. here ended the preface to the former edition of this tract. A tract, whose publication has raised the indignant quills of more than one Arminian porcupine.

Among those enraged porcupines, none has hitherto bristled up so fiercely as the high and mighty Mr. John Wesley. He even dipt his quills in the ink of forgery, on the occasion; as Indians tinge the points of their arrows with poison, in hope of their doing more effectual execution. The quills, however, have reverberated, and with ample interest, on poor Mr. John's own pate. He felt the unexpected pain, and he has squeaked accordingly. I will not here add to the well-deserved chastisement he has received: which, from more than one quarter, has been such as will probably keep him sore while his surname begins with W. Let him for his own sake learn, as becomes a very sore man, to lie still. Rest may do him good: motion will but add to his fever, by irritating his humours already too peccant. Predestination is a stone, by rashly falling on which he has more than once been lamentably broken. I wish him to take heed, in due season, lest that stone at length fall on him. For, notwithstanding all his delinquencies, I would still have him avoid, if possible, the catastrophe of being ground to powder.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE LIFE OF JEROM ZANCHIUS.

It has been asserted (o) that this great divine was born at Alzano, a town of Italy, situate in the valley of Seri, or Serio. But the learned John Sturmius, who was not only Zanchy's contemporary, but one of his most intimate friends, expressly affirms, in a (p) speech delivered on a public and important occasion, that he was nobilis natus familia Bergomi; born of an illustrious family, at Bergamo, the capital of a little province, in the north-west of Italy: anciently a part of Gallia Cispadana; but, A.D. 1428, made a parcel of the Venetian territory; as it still continues (q). I look upon Sturmius's testimony as decisive: it being hardly credible that he could mistake the native place of a colleague whom he so highly valued, who was living at the very time, and with whom he had opportunity of conversing daily. Sturmius adds that there was then remaining, at Bergamo, a fortress (built by some of Zanchy's ancestors) known by the name of the Zanchian Tower.

In this city was our author born, Feb. 2 1516. At the time of his birth, part of the public service then performing was, A light to lighten the Gentiles, &c. And, by God's good providence the Reformation broke forth the very next year in Germany, under the auspices of Luther; and began to spread far and wide.

At the age of twelve years Zanchy lost his father, (r) who died of the plague, A.D. 1528. His (s) mother survived her husband but three years. Deprived thus of both his parents, Zanchy resolved on a monastic life; and accordingly joined himself to a society of canons regular (t). He did this partly to improve himself in literature, and partly for the sake of being with some of his relations, who had before entered themselves of that house. Here he continued nineteen years: chiefly devoting his studies to Aristotle, the languages, and school-divinity.

It was his happiness to become acquainted, very early in life, with Celsus Maximian, count of Martinengo; who, from plete salvation of his people! And that he is wise, and strong, and faithful, to make even those things, which seem contrary to this design, subservient to promote it!" being, like Zanchy, a bigotted papist, by education, became, afterwards a burning and shining light in the reformed Church. Of our author's intimacy with this excellent nobleman, and its blessed effects, himself gives us the following account (u): "I left Italy for the Gospel's sake; to which I was not a little animated by the example of count Maximian, a learned and pious personage, and my most dear brother in the Lord. We had lived together under one roof, and in a state of the strictest religious friendship for the greater part of sixteen years; being both of us canons regular of nearly the same age and standing; unisons in temper and disposition; pursuing the same course of studies; and, which was better still, joint hearers of Peter Martyr, when that apostolic man publicly expounded St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and gave private lectures on the Psalms to us his monks." From this memorable period we are evidently to date the æra of Zanchy's awakening to a true sight and experimental sense of divine things. His friend the count, and the learned Tremellius were also converted about the same time under the ministry of Martyr.

This happy change being effected, our author's studies began to run in a new channel. "The count," says he, "and myself betook ourselves to a diligent reading of the Holy Scriptures: to which we joined a perusal of the best of the fathers, and particularly St. Austin. For some years we went on thus in private; and in public we preached the gospel as far as we were able in its purity. The count, whose gifts and graces were abundantly superior to mine, preached with much greater enlargement of spirit and freedom of utterance than I could ever pretend to: it was therefore no wonder that he found himself constrained to fly his country before I was. The territory of the Grisons was his immediate place of retreat: whence, removing soon after, he settled at Geneva, where he commenced the first pastor of the Protestant Italian Church in that city. Having faithfully executed this sacred office for some years, he at length comfortably fell asleep in Christ, (x)" A.D. 1558, after having, on his death-bed, commended the oversight of his flock to the Great Calvin.

It was in the year 1550, that Peter Martyr himself was obliged to quit Italy; where he could no longer preach, nor even stay, with safety. Toward the latter end of the same year, eighteen of his disciples were forced to follow their master from their native land: of which number Zanchy was one. Being thus a refugee, or, as himself used to express it, "delivered from his Babylonish captivity," he went into Grisony, where he continued upwards of eight months: and then to Geneva, where, after a stay of near a twelvemonth, he received an invitation to England (upon the recommendation of Peter Martyr, then in this kingdom), to fill a divinity professorship here; I suppose at Oxford, where Martyr had been for some time settled. Zanchy embraced the offer and began his journey: but was detained on his way by a counter invitation to Strasburgh; where the divinity chair had been lately vacated by the death of the excellent Caspar Hedio.

Zanchy was fixed at Strasburgh A.D. 1553, and taught there almost eleven years: but not without some uneasiness to himself, occasioned by the malicious opposition of several who persecuted him for much the same reason that Cain hated righteous Abel, 1 John iii. 12. Matters, however, went on tolerably, during the life-time of Sturmius; who was then at the head of the university, and Zanchy's fast friend. At Strasburgh it was that he presented the famous declaration of his faith concerning predestination, final perseverance, and the Lord's Supper. He gave it in to the senate, October 22, 1562. Of this admirable performance (i. e. of that part of it which respects the first of these points) the reader may form some judgment by the following translation.

In proportion as the old senators and divines died off one by one, Zanchy's situation at Strasburgh grew more and more uncomfortable. Matters at length came to that height that he was required to subscribe to the Augsburg confession on pain of losing his professorship. After mature deliberation, he did indeed subscribe: but with this declared restriction modo orthodoxè intelligatur. Notwithstanding the express limitation with which he fettered his subscription, still this great and good man seems, for peace's sake, to have granted too much concerning the manner of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper: as appears, by the first of the three theses, maintained by him at this time: 1. Verum Christi corpus, pro nobis traditum; et verum ejus sanguinem, in peccatorum nostrorum remissionem effusum, in Cœnâ vere manducari et bibi. Though the other two positions do effectually explain his meaning: 2. Verum id, non ore, et dentibus corporis, sed verâ fide. 3. Ideoque, à solis fidelibus. I shall here beg leave to interpose one question, naturally arising from the subject. What good purpose do the imposition and the multiplication of unnecessary subscriptions to forms of human composition, tend to promote? It is a fence far too low to keep out men of little or no principle; and too high sometimes for men of real integrity to surmount. It often opens a door of ready admission to the abandoned; who, ostrich like, care not what they swallow, so they can but make subscription a bridge to secular interest: and for the truly honest, it frequently either quite excludes them from a sphere of action, wherein they might be eminently useful, or obliges them to testify their assent in such terms, and with such open, professed restrictions, as render subscription a mere nothing.

Not content with Zanchy's concessions, several of the Strasburgh bigots (y) persisted in raising a controversial dust. They tendered accusations against him, of errors in point of doctrine: particularly, for his supposed heterodoxy concerning the nature of the Lord's supper; his denial of the ubiquity of Christ's natural body, and his protesting against the lawfulness of images, &c. Nay, they even went so far as to charge him with unsound opinions concerning predestination and the perseverance of the truly regenerate: so early did some of Luther's pretended disciples, after the death of that glorious reformer (and he had not been dead at this time above fifteen years), begin to fall off from the doctrines he taught, though they still had the effrontery to call themselves by his name!

A grand occasion of this dissension was a book concerning the eucharist, and in defence of consubstantiation, written by one Heshusius; a fierce, invidious preacher, who lavished the opprobrious names of heretic and atheist on all, without distinction, whose religious system went a hair's breadth above or below his own standard. In his preface he grossly reflected (z) on the elector Palatine (Frederic III.), Peter Martyr, Bullinger, Calvin, Zuinglius, Cœcolampadius, and other great divines of that age. Zanchy, in mere respect to these venerable names, did, in concert with the learned Sturmius, prevail with the magistrates of Strasburgh to prohibit the impression. Mr. Bayle is so candid as to acknowledge that "Zanchy caused this book to be suppressed, not on account of its doctrine, which he left to the judgment of the Church; but for the calumnies of the preface." Zanchy was a zealous friend to religious liberty. He had too great a share of good sense and real religion to pursue any measures, which simply tended either to restrain men from declaring their principles with safety, or to shackle the human mind in its inquiries after truth. But he ardently wished to see the contending parties of every denomination carry on their debates with Christian meekness, modesty and benevolence: and, where these amiable ingredients were wanting he looked upon disputation as a malignant fever, endangering the health, peace, and safety of the Church. When candour is lost, truth is rarely found. Zanchy's own observations (a) subjoined below exhibit a striking picture of that moderation, detachment from bigotry, and liberality of sentiment, which strongly characterize the Christian and the Protestant.

Notwithstanding the precautions taken by the magistrates, Heshusius's incendiary piece stole through the press: and Zanchy's efforts to stifle its publication were looked upon by the author's party as an injury never to be forgiven. They left no methods unessayed to remove him from his professorship. Many compromising expedients were proposed by the moderate of both parties. The chapter of St. Thomas (of which Zanchy himself was a canon) met to consider what course should be pursued. By them it was referred to a select committee of thirteen. Zanchy offered to debate the agitated points in a friendly and peaceable manner with his opponents: which offer not being accepted, he made several journies to other churches and universities in different parts of Germany, and requested their opinions: which he brought with him in writing. Things, however could not be settled until the senate of Strasburgh convened an assembly from other districts, consisting partly of divines, and partly of persons learned in the laws. These referees, after hearing both sides, recurred to the old fruitless expedient of agreeing on certain articles, to which they advised each party to subscribe. Zanchy, desirous of laying these unchristian heats, and, at the same time, no less determined to preserve integrity and a good conscience, subscribed in these cautious terms: Hanc doctrinæ formulam ut piam agnosco, ità etiam recipio: "I acknowledge this summary of doctrine to be pious, and so I admit it." This condescension on Zanchy's part was not followed by those peaceful effects which were expected. The peace was too loosely patched up to be of any long duration. His adversaries began to worry him afresh; and, just as measures were bringing on the carpet for a new and more lasting compromise, our divine received an invitation to the Church of Chiavenna, situate on the borders of Italy, and in the territory of the Grisons.

He was, among the rest of his good qualities, excessively loquacious: which made Luther say of him, on a very public occasion, Ori, hujus Sævi nunquam araneæ poerunt telas texere; "This talkative Swabian need not be afraid of spiders: for he keeps his lips in such constant motion that no spider will ever be able to weave a cobweb on his mouth."

Augustin Mainard, pastor of that place, was lately dead; and a messenger arrived to let Zanchy know that he was chosen to succeed him. Having very slender prospects of peace at Strasburgh, he obtained the consent of the Senate to resign his canoury of St. Thomas and professorship of divinity. Whilst the above debates were depending, he had received separate invitations to Zurich, Geneva, Leyden, Heidelberg, Marpurg, and Lausanne; but, until he had seen the result of things at Strasburgh, he did not judge any of these calls sufficiently providential to determine his removal.

He left Strasburgh (b) in November, 1563, and entered on his pastoral charge at Chiavenna the beginning of January following. But he had not long been there before the town was visited with a dismal pestilence, which, within the space of seven months, carried off twelve hundred of the inhabitants. Zanchy, however, continued to exercise his ministry as long as there was an assembly to preach to. At length, the far greater part of the townsmen being swept away, he retreated for awhile, with his family, to an adjoining mountain. His own account is this (tom. vii. part 1. col. 36, 37): "Mainard, my pious predecessor, had often foretold the calamity with which the town of Chiavenna has been since visited. All the inhabitants have been too well convinced that that holy man of God did not prophecy at random. When the plague actually began to make havock, I enforced repentance and faith while I had a place to preach in, or any congregation to hear. Many being dead, and others having fled the town (like ship-wrecked mariners, who, to avoid instant destruction, make towards what coast they can), but very few remained; and of these remaining few some were almost terrified to death, others were solely employed in taking care of the sick, and others in guarding the walls. They concurred in advising me to consult my own safety by withdrawing, for a time, until the indignation should be overpassed. I betook myself, therefore, with all my family, to a high mountain, not a vast way from the town, yet remote from human converse, and peculiarly formed for contemplation and unmolested retirement. Here we led a solitary life for three months and a half. I devoted my time chiefly to meditation and writing; to prayer and reading the Scriptures. I never was happier in my own soul, nor enjoyed a better share of health." Afterwards, the plague beginning to abate, he quitted his retreat, and resumed the public exercise of his function.

After four years' continuance at Chiavenna, Frederick III. elector palatine, prevailed with him to accept a divinity professorship in the university of Heidelberg, upon the decease of the famous Zachary Ursin. In the beginning of the year 1568 Zanchy entered on his new situation, and shortly after opened the chair with an admirable oration, De conservando in ecclesiâ puro puro verbo Dei. In the same year he received his doctor's degree; the elector palatine and his son, Prince Cassimir, honouring the ceremony with their presence.

He had not been long settled in the palatinate, when the elector (one of the most amiable and religious princes of that age) strongly solicited him to confirm and elucidate the doctrine of the Trinity, by writing a professed treatise on that most important subject; desiring him, moreover, to be very particular and explicit in canvassing the arguments made use of by the Socinians, who had then fixed their headquarters in Poland and Transylvania, and were exhausting every artifice of sophistry and subterfuge to degrade the Son and Spirit of God to the level of mere creatures. Zanchy accordingly employed his leisure hours in obeying this pious command. His masterly and elaborate treatise, De Dei naturâ, and that De tribus Elohim uno eodemque Jehovahâ, were written on this occasion; treatises fraught with the most solid learning and argument, breathing, at the same time, the amiable spirit of genuine candour and transparent piety. Among a variety of interesting particulars, he does not omit to inform his readers that Lælius Socinus, and other favourers of the Servetian hypothesis, had spared neither pains nor art to pervert his judgment and win him over to their party; but that, finding him inflexible, they had broke off all intercourse with him, and from arful adulators, commenced his determined enemies. An event this which he even looked upon as a blessing, and for which he conceived himself bound to render his best thanks to the supreme head of the Church, Christ Jesus. He retained his professorship at

(b) Attended by his servant, Frederic Syllæburg, a native of Hesse, concerning whom Zanchy writes thus: "Discessi argentinâ, unâ cum fido, non tam famulo, quam amico et fratre, Frederico Syllæburgio, Hesso; juvenem bonorum literarum studioso, et sanæ doctrinæ amanti." A learned youth, and a lover of the gospel; whom I look upon not so much in the light of a domestic as of a faithful friend and a Christian brother.—Oper. T. vii. part 1. col. 36.

I hardly know which were most extraordinary; the good qualities of the servant, or the gratitude and humility of the master.

Heidelberg ten years, when, the elector Frederic being dead, he removed to Newstadt, the residence of Prince John Casimir, count palatine. Here he chose to fix his station for the present, in preference to two invitations he had just received; one from the university of Leyden, then lately opened; the other from the Protestant Church at Antwerp. The conduct of divine Providence respecting Zanchy's frequent removals is very observable. He was a lover of peace, and passionately fond of retirement. But he was too bright a luminary to be always continued in one place. The salt of the earth must be sprinkled here and there in order to be extensively useful, and to season the Church throughout. Hence God's faithful ministers, like the officers in a monarch's army, are quartered in various places; stationed and remanded hither and thither as may most conduce to their Master's service.

The Church of Newstadt enjoyed our author upwards of seven years. Being by that time far advanced in life, and the infirmities of age coming on him very fast, he found himself obliged to cease from that constant series of labour and intenseness of application which he had so long and so indefatigably undergone. He was, at his own request, dismissed from public service at Newstadt, by the elector Casimir; receiving, at the same time, very substantial marks of respect and favour from that religious and generous prince.

From Newstadt he repaired once more to Heidelberg, chiefly with a view to see some of his old friends. This proved his last removal on earth; for shortly after his soul, now ripe for glory, dropt the body, and ascended to heaven, about six in the morning of Nov. 19, 1590, æt. 75. His remains were interred at Heidelberg, in the college chapel of St. Peter, where a small monumental stone was set up to his memory, with this inscription:

*Hieronymi hic sunt condita ossa Zanchii,
Itali; exulantis, Christi amore, à patriâ:
Qui theologus quantus fuerit et philosophus,
Testantur hoc, libri editi ab eo plurimi;
Testantur hoc, quos vobis docuit in scholis;
Quique audière eum doctentur ecclesias.
Nunc ergò, quamvis hinc migrârit spiritus,
Claro tamen nobis remansit nomine. (c)*

Decessit A. MDXC. Die 19. Novemb.

I cannot help lamenting that no more is to be collected concerning this incomparable man than a few outlines of his life, comprising little else but a dry detail of dates and removals.

As to his person, I can find no description of it, except from some very old and scarce prints, most of which were struck from engravings on wood. These represent him as extremely corpulent, even to unwieldiness. And yet, from the astonishing extent, profoundness, and exquisite activity of his learning, judgment, and genius, one might well nigh be induced to imagine that he consisted entirely of soul, without any dead weight of body at all. For of his mind, his writings present us with the loveliest image. He seems to have been possessed, and in a very superior degree, of those graces, virtues, and abilities, which ennoble and exalt human nature to the highest elevation it is capable of below. His clear insight into the truths of the gospel is wonderful; especially, considering that the Church of God was but just emerging from the long and dismal night of Popish darkness, and himself, previous to his conversion, as deeply plunged in the shades as any. It is a blessing which but few are favoured with to step, almost at once, out of midnight into meridian day. He was thoroughly experienced in the divine life of the soul, and a happy subject of that internal kingdom of God which lies in righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. This enabled him to sustain that impetus of opposition which he almost constantly met with. Few persons have, ordinarily, borne a larger share of the cross; and, perhaps, none ever sustained it better. In him were happily centred all the meek benevolence of charity, and all the adamantine firmness of intrepidity; qualities, alas! not constantly united in men of orthodoxy and learning.

He was intimately conversant with the writings of the fathers, and of the philosophers of that and the preceding times. His modesty and humility were singular. No man was ever more studious to preserve peace in the Church of Christ, nor more highly relished the pleasures of learned and religious friendship. For some time before his decease it pleased God to deprive him of his eye-sight; for this I take to be the meaning of the excellent Melchior Adamus, (d) to whom I am indebted for much of the preceding account. His works, which, with his letters, and some other small pieces included, are divided into nine tomes, were collected and published by his executors some years after his death, and are usually bound together in 3 vols. folio. He was twice married, and had several children, none of which, so far as I can find, appear to have survived him

(c) Here Zanchy rests, whom love of truth constrain'd
To quit his own, and seek a foreign land.
How good and great he was, how form'd to shine,
How fraught with science, human and divine;
Sufficient proof his numerous writings give,
And those who heard him teach and saw him live.

Earth still enjoys him, tho' his soul is fled:
His name is deathless, tho' his dust is dead.
(d) His words concerning Zanchy are: "In senectâ, que nunquam sola venit, fato Isaacii obnoxius."

He is said by Mr. Leigh (e) to have been one "of the most scholastical among the Protestants:" which, however, may be questioned, his style and manner of treating an argument being rather plain and solid, than subtle and metaphysical. If scholism be an excellence in a writer, it is certain that the elder Spanhemius, and the great Francis Turretin, have since much exceeded Zanchy in that respect. Our learned countryman, Mr. Matthew Poole, terms him (f) Theologus non à multis; cujus commentaria, singulari eruditione atque acumine composita, auctorem suum doctissimum referunt. "A divine of the first class; whose expositions, written with extraordinary learning and ability, prove him to have been a most accomplished scholar." Even Mr. Bayle, who never seems to have been better pleased than when he could pick a hole in the gown of an ecclesiastic, though himself was the son of one, yet allows our author to have been "one of the most celebrated Protestant divines, and that few ministers have been so moderate as he."

Nor must I omit the honour put upon him by our university of Cambridge within five years after his death. One William Barrett, (g) fellow of Gonville and Caius college, ventured, April 29, 1595, to preach an Arminian sermon, in the face of the university, at St. Mary's. I say ventured, for it was a bold and dangerous attempt at that time, when the Church of England was in her purity, for any man to propagate Arminianism; (h) and, indeed, Barrett himself paid dear for his innovating rashness, which ended in his ruin. The university were so highly offended, both at his presumption in daring to avow his novel, heterodox opinions, and for mentioning some great divines, among whom Zanchy was one, in terms of the highest rancour and disrespect, that he was enjoined to make a public recantation in that very pulpit whence he had so lately vented his errors. This he did the 5th of May following. Part of his recantation ran (i) thus: "Lastly, I rashly uttered these words against John Calvin (a person than whom none has deserved better of the Church), namely, that he had presumed to exalt himself above the Son of God; in saying which I acknowledge that I greatly injured that most learned and truly pious man, and I do most humbly intreat that you will all forgive this my rashness. I also threw out, in a most rancorous manner, some reflections against P. Martyr, Theodore Beza, Jerom Zanchy, Francis Junius, and others of the same religion, who were the lights and ornaments of our Church, calling them by the malicious name of Calvinists, and branding them with other reproachful terms. I did wrong in assailing the reputation of these persons, and in endeavouring to lessen the estimation in which they are held, and in dissuading any from reading their most learned works, seeing our Church holds these divines in deserved reverence."

I would hope, as our articles of religion have not been changed, but stand just as

(h) As every reader may not have a clear, determinate idea of what Arminianism precisely is, it may to such be satisfactory to know that it consists chiefly of five particulars. 1. The Arminians will not allow election to be an eternal, peculiar, unconditional, and irreversible act of God. 2. They assert that Christ died equally and indiscriminately for every individual of mankind; for them that perish no less than for them that are saved. 3. That saving grace is tendered to the acceptance of every man, which he may or may not receive just as he pleases. Consequently, 4. That the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit is not invincible, but is suspended, for its efficacy, on the will of man. 5. That saving grace is not an abiding principle; but that those who are loved of God, ransomed by Christ, and born again of the Spirit, may (let God wish and strive ever so much to the contrary) throw all away, and perish eternally at last.

To these many Arminians tack a variety of errors beside. But the above may be considered as a general skeleton of the leading mistakes which characterize the sect.

Appendix, P. 186.

I cannot help observing one more particular respecting this famous recantation, wherein the recanter thus expressed himself: Secundo, Petri fidem deficere non potuisse, asserui; at aliorum posse, &c. i. e. "I asserted that Peter's faith, indeed, could not fail, but that the faith of other believers might; whereas now, being, by Christ's own word, brought to a better and sounder mind, I acknowledge that Christ prays for the faith of each believer in particular; and that, by the efficacy of Christ's prayer, all true believers are so supported that their faith cannot fail." Barrett asserted, rank Arminian as he was, that Peter's faith did not actually fail. But we have had a recent instance of an Arminian preacher who avers, without ceremony, that Peter's faith did fail. The passage, verbatim, without adding a jot, or diminishing a tittle, stands thus: "Peter's faith failed, though Christ himself prayed it might not." See a sermon on 1 Cor. ix. 27, preached before the university of Oxford, Feb. 19, 1769, by John Allen, M.A., vice-principal of Magdalen Hall, p. 17.

This is Arminianism double-distilled. The common, simple Arminianism that served Barrett, and Laud, and Heylin, will not do now for our more enlightened divines. Whether Peter's faith failed, or not; that Mr. Allen's modesty has failed him is, I believe, what nobody can deny.

they did at that very time, that the Church of England, in the year 1769, still considers the above great men (and Zanchy among the rest) as some of her ancient lights and ornaments; and that she holds them and their writings in the same deserved reverence as did the Church of England in the year 1595.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES;

NECESSARY TO BE PREMISED, IN ORDER TO OUR BETTER UNDERSTANDING THE DOCTRINE OF PREDESTINATION.

ALTHOUGH the great and ever blessed God is a Being absolutely simple, and infinitely remote from all shadow of composition; he is, nevertheless, in condescension to our weak and contracted faculties, represented in Scripture as possessed of divers properties, or attributes, which, though seemingly different from his essence, are in reality, essential to him, and constitutive of his very nature.

Of these attributes, those on which we shall now particularly descant (as being more immediately concerned in the ensuing subject), are the following ones; 1. His eternal wisdom and foreknowledge. 2. The absolute freedom and liberty of his will. 3. The perpetuity and unchangeableness both of himself and his decrees. 4. His omnipotence. 5. His justice. 6. His mercy.

Without an explication of these, the doctrine of predestination cannot be so well understood: we shall, therefore, briefly consider them, by way of preliminary to the main subject.

I. With respect to the divine wisdom and foreknowledge, I shall lay down the following positions:

Pos. 1. God is, and always was, so perfectly wise that nothing ever did, or does, or can, elude his knowledge. He knew, from all eternity, not only what he himself intended to do, but also what he would incline and permit others to do, (k) "Known unto God are all his works, απ αιωνος, from eternity."

Pos. 2. Consequently, God knows nothing now, nor will know any thing hereafter, which he did not know and foresee from everlasting: his foreknowledge being co-eternal with himself, and extending to every thing that is or shall be done. (l) All things, which comprise past, present, and future, are naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do.

Pos. 3. This foreknowledge of God is not conjectural and uncertain, (for then it would not be foreknowledge) but most sure and infallible; so that whatever he foreknows to be future shall necessarily and undoubtedly come to pass. For his knowledge can be no more frustrated, or his wisdom be deceived, than he can cease to be God. Nay, could either of these be the case, he actually would cease to be God; all mistake and disappointment being absolutely incompatible with the divine nature.

Pos. 4. The influence which the divine foreknowledge has on the certain futurity of the things foreknown does not render the intervention of second causes needless, nor destroy the nature of the things themselves.

My meaning is that the prescience of God does not lay any coercive necessity on the wills of beings naturally free. For instance, man, even in his fallen state, is endued with a natural freedom of will; yet he acts, from the first to the last moment of his life, in absolute subserviency (though, perhaps, he does not know it, nor design it) to the purposes and decrees of God concerning him; notwithstanding which he is sensible of no compulsion, but acts as freely and voluntarily as if he was, sui juris, subject to no controul, and absolutely lord of himself. This made Luther, (m) after he had shewn how all things necessary and inevitably come to pass, in consequence of the sovereign will and infallible foreknowledge of God, say that "We should carefully distinguish between a necessity of infallibility and a necessity of co-action; since both good and evil men, though by their actions they fulfil the decree and appointment of God, yet are not forcibly constrained to do any thing but act willingly."

Pos. 5. God's foreknowledge, taken abstractedly, is not the sole cause of beings and events; but his will and foreknowledge together. Hence we find, Acts ii. 23, that his determinate counsel and foreknowledge act in concert; the latter resulting from, and being founded on, the former.

We pass on,

II. To consider the will of God; with regard to which we assert as follows:

Pos. 1. The Deity is possessed not only of infinite knowledge, but likewise of absolute liberty of will; so that whatever he does, or permits to be done, he does and permits freely, and of his own good pleasure.

Consequently, it is his free pleasure to permit sin; since, without his permission, neither men nor devils can do any thing.

(k) Acts xv. 18.

(l) Heb. iv. 13.

(m) De Serv. Arb. cap. 44.

Now, to permit is, at least, the same as not to hinder, though it be in our power to hinder if we please : and this permission or non hindrance, is certainly an act of the divine will. Hence, Austin (n) says, "Those things which seemingly thwart the divine will are, nevertheless, agreeable to it; for if God did not permit them, they could not be done : and whatever God permits, he permits freely and willingly. He does nothing, neither suffers any thing to be done, against his own will." And Luther (o) observes that "God permitted Adam to fall into sin, because he willed that he should so fall."

Pos. 2. Although the will of God, considered in itself, is simply one and the same; yet, in condescension to the present capacities of men, the divine will is very properly distinguished into secret and revealed. Thus it was his revealed will that Pharaoh should let the Israelites go; that Abraham should sacrifice his son; and that Peter should not deny Christ: but as was proved by the event, it was his secret will that Pharaoh should not let Israel go, Ex. iv. 21, that Abraham should not sacrifice Isaac, Gen. xxii. 12, and that Peter should deny his Lord, Matt. xxvi. 34.

Pos. 3. The will of God, respecting the salvation and condemnation of men, is never contrary to itself; he immutably wills the salvation of the elect, and vice versa: nor can he ever vary or deviate from his own will in any instance whatever, so as that should be done which he willeth not; or that not be brought to pass which he willeth. Isaiah xlvi. 10. My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.—Psalm xxxiii. 11. The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, and the thoughts of his heart to all generations. Job xxiii. 13, 14. He is in one mind, who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doth; for he performeth the thing that is appointed for me; and many such things are with him. Eph. i. 11. Being predestinated, according to the purpose of him, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.

Thus, for instance, Hophni and Phineas hearkened not to the voice of their father, who reproved them for their wickedness, because the Lord would slay them, 1 Sam. ii. 25. And Sihon, king of Heshbon, would not receive the peaceable message sent him by Moses, because the Lord God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into the hand of Israel, Deut. ii. 26, 30. Thus also, to add no more, we find that there have been, and ever will be some, whose eyes God blindeth, and whose hearts he hardeneth, i. e. whom God permits to continue blind and hardened, on purpose to prevent their seeing with their eyes, and understanding with their hearts, and to hinder their conversion to God, and spiritual healing by him, Isa. vi. 9. John xii. 39, 40.

Pos. 4. Because God's will of precept may, in some instances, appear to thwart his will of determination, it does not follow either, 1. That he mocks his creatures, or 2. That they are excusable for neglecting to observe his will of command.

1. He does not hereby mock his creatures; for if men do not believe his word, nor observe his precepts, the fault is not in him, but in themselves: their unbelief and disobedience are not owing to any ill infused into them by God, but to the vitiosity of their depraved nature, and the perverseness of their own wills. Now, if God invited all men to come to him, and then shut the door of mercy against any who were desirous of entering; his invitation would be a mockery, and unworthy of himself; but we insist on it, that he does not invite all men to come to him in a saving way; and that every individual person, who is, through his gracious influence on his heart, made willing to come to him shall, sooner or later, be surely saved by him, and that with an everlasting salvation. 2. Man is not excusable for neglecting God's will of command. Pharaoh was faulty, and therefore justly punishable, for not obeying God's revealed will, though God's secret will rendered that obedience impossible. Abraham would have committed sin, had he refused to sacrifice Isaac; and, in looking to God's secret will, would have acted counter to his revealed one. So Herod, Pontius Pilate, and the reprobate Jews, were justly condemned for putting Christ to death, inasmuch as it was a most notorious breach of God's revealed will. "Thou shalt do no murder;" yet, in slaying the Messiah, they did no more than God's hand and his counsel, i. e. his secret ordaining will, determined before should be done, Acts iv. 27, 28; and Judas is justly punished for perfidiously and wickedly betraying Christ, though his perfidy and wickedness were (but not with his design) subservient to the accomplishment of the decree and word of God.

The brief of the matter is this; secret things belong to God, and those that are revealed belong to us; therefore, when we meet with a plain precept, we should simply endeavour to obey it, without tarrying to inquire into God's hidden purpose. Venerable Bucer, after taking notice how God hardened Pharaoh's heart, and making some observations on the apostle's simile of a potter and his clay, adds (p) that, "though God has at least the same right over his creatures, and is at liberty to make them what he will, and direct them to the end that pleaseth himself, according to his sovereign and secret determination, yet it by no means follows that they do not act freely and spontaneously, or that the evil they commit is to be charged on God."

(n) Enchir. cap. 100.

(o) De Serv. Arb. c. 153.

Pos. 5. God's hidden will is peremptory and absolute; and, therefore, cannot be hindered from taking effect.

God's will is nothing else than God himself willing: consequently it is omnipotent and unfrustrable. Hence we find it termed by Austin and the schoolmen, voluntas omnipotentissima; because, whatever God wills cannot fail of being effected. This made Austin say, (q) "Evil men do many things contrary to God's revealed will; but so great is his wisdom, and so inviolable his truth, that he directs all things into those channels which he foreknew." And again (r) "No free-will of the creature can resist the will of God; for man cannot so will, or nill, as to obstruct the divine determination, or overcome the divine power." Once more (s) "It cannot be questioned, but God does all things, and ever did, according to his own purpose: the human will cannot resist him, so as to make him do more or less than it is his pleasure to do; quandoquidem etiam de ipsis hominum voluntatibus quod vult facit, since he does what he pleases even with the wills of men."

Pos. 6. Whatever comes to pass comes to pass by virtue of this absolute, omnipotent will of God, which is the primary and supreme cause of all things. Rev. ix. 11. Thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and were created. Psalm cxv. 3. Our God is in the heavens; he hath done whatsoever he pleased. Dan. iv. 35. He doth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What dost thou? Psalm cxxxv. 6. Whatsoever the Lord pleased that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places. Mat. x. 29. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father. To all which, Austin subscribes, when he says, (t) "Nothing is done but what the Almighty wills should be done, either efficiently or permissively." As does Luther, whose words are these, (u) "This, therefore, must stand; to wit, the unsearchable will of God, and again, which nothing exists or acts." And again, c. 160.

"God would not be such, if he was not almighty, and if any thing could be done without him." And elsewhere, c. 158, he quotes these words of Erasmus: "Supposing there was an earthly prince who could do whatever he would, and none were able to resist him, we might safely say of such a one, that he would certainly fulfil his own desire; in like manner, the will of God, which is the first cause of all things, should seem to lay a kind of necessity upon our wills." This Luther approves of, and subjoins, "Thanks be to God, for this orthodox passage in Erasmus's discourse! but, if this be true, what becomes of his doctrine of free-will, which he at other times so strenuously contends for?"

Pos. 7. The will of God is so the cause of all things as to be itself without cause; for nothing can be the cause of that which is the cause of every thing.

So that the divine will is the ne plus ultra of all our inquiries: when we ascend to that, we can go no farther. Hence, we find every matter resolved ultimately into the mere sovereign pleasure of God, as the spring and occasion of whatsoever is done in heaven and earth. Matt. xi. 25. Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. Luke xii. 32. It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Matt. viii. 3. I will: be thou clean. Mark iii. 13. He went up into a mountain, and called unto him whom he would. Jam. i. 18. Of his own will begat he us, with the word of truth. John i. 13. Which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. Rom. ix. 15, 18. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. Therefore, he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. And no wonder that the will of God should be the main spring that sets all inferior wheels in motion, and should likewise be the rule by which he goes in all his dealings with his creatures; since nothing out of God, i. e. exterior to himself can possibly induce him to will or nill one thing rather than another. Deny this, and you, at one stroke, destroy his immutability and independency; since he can never be independent who acts pro re nata, as emergency requires, and whose will is suspended on that of others; nor unchangeable, whose purposes vary and take all shapes, according as the persons or things vary who are the objects of those purposes. The only reason, then, that can be assigned why the Deity does this, or omits that, is because it is his own free pleasure. Luther, (x) in answer to that question, "Whence it was that Adam was permitted to fall, and corrupt his whole posterity; when God could have prevented his falling, &c., says, "God is a being whose will acknowledges no cause: neither is it for us to prescribe rules to his sovereign pleasure, or call him to account for what he does. He has neither superior nor equal; and his will is the rule of all things. He did not, therefore, will such and such things because they were in themselves right, and he was bound to will them; but they are therefore equitable and right because he wills them. The will of man, indeed, may be influenced and moved; but God's will never can. To assert the contrary is to undeviate him." Bucer likewise observes, (y) "God has no other motive for what he does than ipsa voluntas, his own mere will; which will is so far from being unrighteous, that it is justice itself."

Pos. 8. Since, as was lately observed, the determining will of God, being omnipotent, cannot be obstructed or made void; it follows that he never did, nor does he now, will that every individual of mankind should be saved.

If this was his will, not one single soul could ever be lost; (for who hath resisted his will?) and he would surely afford all men those effectual means of salvation without which it cannot be had. Now, God could afford these means as easily to all mankind, as to some only; but experience proves that he does not; and the reason is equally plain, namely, that he will not; for whatsoever the Lord pleaseth, that does he in heaven and on earth. It is said, indeed, by the apostle, that God would have all men saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth; i. e. as Austin, (z) consistently with other Scriptures, explains the passage, "God will save some out of the whole race of mankind," that is, persons of all nations, kindreds and tongues. Nay, he will save all men, i. e. as the same father observes, "every kind of men, or men of every kind," namely, the whole election of grace, be they bond or free, noble or ignoble, rich or poor, male or female. Add to this, that it evidently militates against the majesty, omnipotence, and supremacy of God, to suppose that he can either will any thing in vain, or that any thing can take effect against his will; therefore, Bucer observes very rightly, ad Rom. ix. "God doth not will the salvation of reprobates, seeing he hath not chosen them, neither created them to that end." Consonant to which are those words of Luther, (a)

"This mightily offends our rational nature, that God should, of his own mere unbiassed will, leave some men to themselves, harden them, and then condemn them; but he has given abundant demonstration, and does continually, that this is really the case; namely, that the sole cause why some are saved, and others perish, proceeds from his willing the salvation of the former, and the perdition of the latter, according to that of Paul, He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth."

Pos. 9. As God doth not will that each individual of mankind should be saved, so neither did he will that Christ should properly and immediately die for each individual of mankind; whence it follows that, though the blood of Christ, from its own intrinsic dignity, was sufficient for the redemption of all men; yet, in consequence of his Father's appointment, he shed it intentionally, and, therefore, effectually and immediately, for the elect only.

This is self evident. God, as we have before proved, wills not the salvation of every man; but he gave his Son to die for them whose salvation he willed; therefore, his Son did not die for every man. All those for whom Christ died are saved; and the divine justice indispensably requires that to them the benefits of his death should be imparted; but only the elect are saved; they only partake of those benefits; consequently, for them only he died and intercedes. The apostle, Rom. viii. asks, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? it is God that justifies, i. e. his elect, exclusively of others; who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died for them, exclusively of others. The plain meaning of the passage is that those whom God justifies, and for whom Christ died (justification and redemption being of exactly the same extent), cannot be condemned. These privileges are expressly restrained to the elect; therefore, God justifies and Christ died for them alone.

In the same chapter Paul asks; "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, [i. e. for all us elect persons] how shall he not, with him, also freely give us all things? i. e. salvation, and all things necessary to it. Now, it is certain that these are not given to every individual; and yet, if Paul says true, they are given to all those for whom Christ was delivered to death; consequently, he was not delivered to death for every individual. To the same purpose St. Austin argues, in Johan. tract. 45. col. 335. Hence that saying of Ambrose, (b) "si non credis, non tibi passus est, i. e. if you are an unbeliever, Christ did not die for you." Meaning, that whoever is left under the power of final unbelief, is thereby evidenced to be one of those for whom Christ did not die; but that all for whom he suffered shall be, in this life, sooner or later, endued with faith. The Church of Smyrna, in their letter to the diocese of Pontus, insist every where on the doctrine of special redemption. (c) Bucer, in all parts of his works, observes, that "Christ died restrictively for the elect only; but for them universally."

Pos. 10. From what has been laid down it follows that Austin, Luther, Bucer, the scholastic divines, and other learned writers, are not to be blamed for asserting that "God may, in some sense, be said to will the being and commission of sin." For was this contrary to his determining will of permission, either he would not be omnipotent, or sin could have no place in the world; but he is omnipotent, and sin has place in the world; which it could not have, if God willed otherwise; for who hath resisted his will? Rom. ix. No one can deny that God permits sin; but he neither permits it ignorantly, nor unwillingly; therefore, knowingly and willingly. Vid. Aust. Enchir. c. 96. Luther steadfastly maintains this in his book De Serv. Arbitr. and Bucer in Rom. i. However, it should be carefully noticed, 1. That God's permission of sin does not arise from his taking delight in it; on the contrary, sin, as sin, is the abominable thing that his soul hateth; and his efficacious permission of it is for wise and good purposes. Whence that observation of Austin, (d) "God, who is no less omnipotent than he is supremely and perfectly holy, would never have permitted evil to enter among his works, but in order that he might do good even with that evil," i. e. over-rule it for good in the end. 2. That God's free and voluntary permission of sin lays no man under any forcible or compulsive necessity of committing it; consequently, the Deity can by no means be termed the author of moral evil; to which he is not, in the proper sense of the word, accessory, but only remotely or negatively so, inasmuch as he could, if he pleased, absolutely prevent it.

We should, therefore, be careful not to give up the omnipotence of God, under a pretence of exalting his holiness; he is infinite in both, and, therefore, neither should be set aside nor obscured. To say that God absolutely nills the being and commission of sin, while experience convinces us that sin is acted every day, is to represent the Deity as a weak, impotent being, who would fain have things go otherwise than they do, but cannot accomplish his desire. On the other hand, to say that he willeth sin doth not in the least detract from the holiness and rectitude of his nature; because, whatever God wills, as well as whatever he does, cannot be eventually evil: materially evil it may be; but, as was just said, it must ultimately be directed to some wise and just end, otherwise he could not will it; for his will is righteous and good, and the sole rule of right and wrong, as is often observed by Austin, Luther, and others.

Pos. 11. In consequence of God's immutable will and infallible foreknowledge, whatever things come to pass come to pass necessarily; though, with respect to second causes, and us men, many things are contingent: i. e. unexpected, and seemingly accidental.

That this was the doctrine of Luther, none can deny, who are in any measure acquainted with his works: particularly with his treatise De Servo Arbitrio, or free-will a slave; the main drift of which book is to prove that the will of man is by nature enslaved to evil only, and, because it is fond of that slavery, is therefore said to be free. Among other matters, he proves there that "whatever man does he does necessarily, though not with any sensible compulsion; and that we can only do what God from eternity willed and foreknew we should; which will of God must be effectual, and his foresight must be certain." Hence we find him saying, (e) "It is most necessary and salutary for a Christian to be assured that God foreknows nothing uncertainly; but that he determines, and foresees, and acts, in all things, according to his own eternal, immutable, and infallible will; adding, "Hereby, as with a thunderbolt, is man's freewill thrown down and destroyed." A little after, he shews in what sense he took the word necessity; "by it," says he, "I do not mean that the will suffers any forcible constraint, or co-action; but the infallible accomplishment of those things which the immutable God decreed and foreknew concerning us." He goes on: "Neither the divine nor human will does any thing by constraint; but, whatever man does, be it good or bad, he does with as much appetite and willingness as if his will was really free. But, after all, the will of God is certain and unalterable, and is the governess of ours." Exactly consonant to all which are those words of Luther's friend and fellow-labourer, Melancthon: (f) "All things turn out according to divine predestination; not only the works we do outwardly, but even the thoughts we think inwardly:" adding, in the same place, "There is no such a thing as chance, or fortune; nor is there a readier way to gain the fear of God, and to put our whole trust in Him, than to be thoroughly versed in the doctrine of predestination." I could cite, to the same purpose, Austin, Aquinas, and many other learned men; but, for brevity's sake, forbear. That this is the doctrine of Scripture every adept in those sacred books cannot but acknowledge.— See, particularly, Psalm cxxxv. 6. Matt. x. 29. Prov. xvi. 1. Matt. xxvi. 54. Luke xxii. 22. Acts iv. 28. Eph. i. 11. Isa. xlvi. 10.

(c) Vid. Euseb. His. l. 4. c. 10. (d) Enchir. c. 11.

(e) Cap. 11. in Resp. ad pref. (f) In Eph. i.

Pos. 12. As God knows nothing now which he did not know from all eternity; so he wills nothing now which he did not will from everlasting.

This position needs no explanation nor enforcement; it being self-evident that, if any thing can accede to God de novo, i. e. if he can at any time be wiser than he always was, or will that at one time which he did not will from all eternity, these dreadful consequences must ensue: 1. That the knowledge of God is not perfect, since what is absolutely perfect, non recipit magis et minus, cannot admit either of addition or detracton. If I add to any thing, it is from a supposal that that thing was not complete before; if I detract from it, it is supposed that that detracton renders it less perfect than it was. But the knowledge of God, being infinitely perfect, cannot, consistently with that perfection, be either increased or lessened. 2. That the will of God is fluctuating, mutable, and unsteady; consequently that God himself is so, his will coinciding with his essence, contrary to the avowed assurances of Scripture and the strongest dictates of reason, as we shall presently shew, when we come to treat of the divine immutability.

Pos. 13. The absolute will of God is the original spring and efficient cause of his people's salvation.

I say the original and efficient; for, sensu complexo, there are other intermediate causes of their salvation, which, however, all result from, and are subservient to, this primary one, the will of God. Such are his everlasting choice of them to eternal life: the eternal covenant of grace entered into by the Trinity on behalf of the elect; the incarnation, obedience, death, and intercession of Christ for them; all which are so many links in the great chain of causes; and not one of these can be taken away without marring and subverting the whole gospel plan of salvation by Jesus Christ. We see, then, that the free, unbiassed, sovereign will of God is the root of this tree of life, which bears so many glorious branches, and yields such salutary fruits: he therefore loved the elect, and ordained them to life, because he would; according to that of the apostle, having predestinated us according to the good pleasure of his will; Eph. i. 5. Then, next after God's covenant for his people and promises to them, comes in the infinite merit of Christ's righteousness and atonement; for we were chosen to salvation in him as members of his mystic body, and through him, as our Surety and substitute, by whose vicarious obedience to the moral law, and submission to its curse and penalty, all we, whose names are in the book of life, should never incur the divine hatred or be punished for our sins, but continue to eternity as we were from eternity, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ. But still the divine grace and favour (and God extends these to whom he will) must be considered as what gave birth to the glorious scheme of redemption, according to what our Lord himself teaches us, John iii. 16. God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, &c.; and that of the apostle, 1 John iv. 9. In this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that he sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him.

Pos. 14. Since this absolute will of God is both immutable and omnipotent, we infer that the salvation of every one of the elect is most infallibly certain, and can by no means be prevented. This necessarily follows from what we have already asserted and proved concerning the divine will, which, as it cannot be disappointed or made void, must undoubtedly secure the salvation of all whom God wills should be saved.

From the whole of what has been delivered under this second head, I would observe that the genuine tendency of these truths is, not to make men indolent and careless, or lull them to sleep on the lap of presumption and carnal security, but, 1. To fortify the people of Christ against the attacks of unbelief and the insults of their spiritual enemies. And what is so fit to guard them against these as the comfortable persuasion of God's unalterable will to save them, and of their unalienable interest in the sure mercies of David? 2. To withdraw them entirely from all dependance, whether on themselves or any creature whatever; to make them renounce their own righteousness no less than their sins, in point of reliance, and to acquiesce sweetly and safely in the certain perpetuity of his rich favour. 3. To excite them, from a trust of his goodwill towards them, to love that God who hath given such great and numberless proofs of his love to men; and in all their thoughts, words, and works, to aim, as much as possible, at his honour and glory. We were to consider,

III. The unchangeableness which is essential to himself and his decrees.

Pos. 1. God is essentially unchangeable in himself. Were he otherwise, he would be confessedly imperfect; since whoever changes must change either for the better or for the worse; whatever alteration any being undergoes, that being must, ipso facto, either become more excellent than it was, or lose some of the excellency which it had. But neither of these can be the case with the Deity: he cannot change for the better, for that would necessarily imply that he was not perfectly good before; he cannot change for the worse, for then he could not be perfectly good after that change. Ergo, God is unchangeable. And this is the uniform voice of Scripture. Mal. iii. 6. I am the Lord: I change not. James i. 17. With him is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. Psalm cii. 27. Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end.

Pos. 2. God is likewise absolutely unchangeable with regard to his purposes and promises. Numb. xxiii. 19. God is not a man that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it; or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? 1 Sam. xv. 29. The strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; for he is not a man that he should repent. Job xxiii. 13. He is in one mind, and who can turn him? Ezek. xxiv. 14. I, the Lord, have spoken it; it shall come to pass, and I will do it: I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I repent. Rom. xi. 29. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. 2 Tim. ii. 13. He abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

By the purpose or decree of God we mean his determinate counsel, whereby he did from all eternity pre-ordain whatever he should do, or would permit to be done, in time. In particular, it signifies his everlasting appointment of some men to life and of others to death; which appointment flows entirely from his own free and sovereign will. Rom. ix. The children not yet being born, neither having done any good or evil (that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth), it was said, the elder shall serve the younger; as it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.

The apostle then, in the very next words, anticipates an objection which he foresaw men of corrupt minds would make to this: What shall we say, then? is there unrighteousness with God? which he answers with, God forbid! and resolves the whole of God's procedure with his creatures into his own sovereign and independent will: for he said to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion.

We assert that the decrees of God are not only immutable as to himself, it being inconsistent with his nature to alter in his purposes or change his mind, but that they are immutable likewise with respect to the objects of those decrees; so that whatsoever God hath determined concerning every individual person or thing shall surely and infallibly be accomplished in and upon them. Hence we find that he actually sheweth mercy on whom he decreed to shew mercy, and hardeneth whom he resolved to harden: Rom. ix. 18. For his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure: Isa. xlv. 10. Consequently his eternal predestination of men and things must be immutable as himself, and, so far from being reversible, can never admit of the least variation.

Pos. 3. "Although," to use the words of Gregory, "God never swerves from his decree, yet he often varies in his declarations:" that is always sure and immovable; these are sometimes seemingly discordant. So when he gave sentence against the Ninevites by Jonah, saying, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown, the meaning of the words is, not that God absolutely intended, at the end of that space, to destroy the city, but that, should God deal with those people according to their deserts, they would be totally extirpated from the earth; and should be so extirpated unless they repented speedily.

Likewise when he told king Hezekiah, by the prophet Isaiah, Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live; the meaning was that, with respect to second causes, and considering the king's bad state of health and emaciated constitution, he could not, humanly speaking, live much longer. But still the event shewed that God had immutably determined that he should live fifteen years more; and, in order to that, had put it into his heart to pray for the blessing decreed: just as in the case of Nineveh lately mentioned, God had resolved not to overthrow that city then; and, in order to the accomplishment of his own purpose in a way worthy of himself, made the ministry of Jonah the means of leading that people to repentance. All which, as it shews that God's absolute predestination does not set aside the use of means, so does it likewise prove that, however various the declarations of God may appear (to wit, when they proceed on a regard had to natural causes), his counsels and designs stand firm and immovable, and can neither admit of alteration in themselves, nor of hindrance in their execution. See this further explained by Bucer, in Rom. ix., where you will find the certainty of the divine appointments solidly asserted and unanswerably vindicated. We now come,

IV. To consider the omnipotence of God.

Pos. 1. God is, in the most unlimited and absolute sense of the word, Almighty. Jer. xxxii. 17. Behold, thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee. Mat. xix. 26. With God all things are possible. The schoolmen very properly distinguish the omnipotence of God into absolute and actual: by the former, God might do many things which he does not; by the latter, he actually does whatever he will. For instance, God might, by virtue of his absolute power, have made more worlds than he has. He might have eternally saved every individual of mankind, without reprobating any: on the other hand he might, and that with the strictest justice, have condemned all men, and saved none. He could, had it been his pleasure, have prevented the fall of angels and men, and thereby have hindered sin from having footing in and among his creatures. By virtue of his actual power he made the universe; executes the whole counsel of his will both in heaven and earth; governs and influences both men and things, according to his own pleasure; fixes the bounds which they shall not pass; and, in a word, worketh all in all: Isa. xlv. 7. Amos iii. 6. John v. 17. Acts xvii. 26. 1 Cor. xii. 6.

Pos. 2. Hence it follows that, since all things are subject to the divine controul, God not only works efficaciously on his elect, in order that they may will and do that which is pleasing in his sight; but does likewise frequently and powerfully suffer the wicked to fill up the measure of their iniquities by committing fresh sins. Nay, he sometimes, but for wise and gracious ends, permits his own people to transgress: for he has the hearts and wills of all men in his own hand, and inclines them to good, or delivers them up to evil, as he sees fit: yet without being the author of sin; as Luther Bucer, Austin, and others have piously and scripturally taught.

This position consists of two parts: (1.) That God efficaciously operates on the hearts of his elect, and is thereby the sole author of all the good they do. See Eph. iii. 20. Phil. ii. 13. 1 Thes. ii. 13. Heb. xiii. 21. St. Austin (g) takes up no fewer than nineteen chapters in proving that whatever good is in men, and whatever good they are enabled to do is solely and entirely of God; who, says he, “works in holy persons, all their good desires, their pious thoughts, and their righteous actions; and yet these holy persons, though thus wrought upon by God, will and do all these things freely: for it is he who rectifies their wills which, being originally evil, are made good by him; and which wills, after he hath set them right and made them good, he directs to good actions and to eternal life; wherein he does not force their wills but makes them willing.” (2.) That God often lets the wicked go on to more ungodliness: which he does, 1. Negatively, by withholding that grace which alone can restrain them from evil. 2. Remotely, by the providential concurrence and mediation of second causes; which second causes, meeting and acting in concert with the corruption of the reprobate’s unregenerate nature, produce sinful effects. 3. Judicially, or in a way of judgment. Prov. xxi. 1. The king’s heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of waters; he turneth it whithersoever he will: and if the king’s heart, why not the hearts of all men? Lam. iii. 38. Out of the mouth of the Most High proceeded not evil and good? Hence we find that the Lord bid Shimei curse David, 2 Sam. xvi. 10. That he moved David himself to number the people, compare 1 Chron. xxi. 1. with 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. Stirred up Joseph’s brethren to sell him into Egypt, Gen. l. 20. Positively and immediately hardened the heart of Pharaoh, Ex. iv. 21. Delivered up David’s wives to be defiled by Absalom, 2 Sam. xii. 11. and xvi. 22. Sent a lying spirit to deceive Ahab, 1 Kings xxii. 20—23. And mingled a perverse spirit in the midst of Egypt, i. e. made that nation perverse, obdurate and stiff-necked, Isa. xix. 14. To cite other instances would be almost endless, and, after these, quite unnecessary; all being summed up in that express passage, Isaiah xlv. 7. I make peace and create evil; I the Lord do all these things. See farther 1 Sam. xvi. 14. Psalm cv. 25. Jer. xiii. 12, 13. Acts ii. 23. and iv. 28. Rom. xi. 8. 2 Thess. ii. 11. Every one of which implies more (h) than a bare permission of sin. Bucer asserts this, not only in the place referred to below, but continually throughout his works: particularly on Matt. vi. s. 2. where this is the sense of his comments on that petition, Lead us not into temptation; “It is abundantly evident, from most express testimonies of Scripture, that God, occasionally in the course of his providence, puts both elect and reprobate persons into circumstances of temptation: by which temptations are meant, not only those trials that are of an outward, afflictive nature; but those also that are inward and spiritual; even such as shall cause the persons so tempted actually to turn aside from the path of duty, to commit sin, and involve both themselves and others in evil. Hence we find the elect complaining, Isa. lxiii. 17. O Lord, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways,

(g) De Grat. et lib. Arb. à c. 1. usque ad c. 20.

(h) Vid. Augustine, de Grat. et lib. Arbitr. c. 20 and 21. And Bucer in Rom. 1 sect. 7.

and hardened our hearts from thy fear? But there is also a kind of temptation which is peculiar to the non-elect; whereby God, in a way of just judgment, makes them totally blind and obdurate: inasmuch as they are vessels of wrath fitted to destruction." See also his exposition of Rom. ix.

Luther (i) reasons to the very same effect; some of his words are these; "It may seem absurd to human wisdom that God should harden, blind, and deliver up some men to a reprobate sense; that he should first deliver them over to evil, and then condemn them for that evil: but the believing spiritual man sees no absurdity at all in this; knowing that God would be never a whit less good, even though he should destroy all men." And again; "God worketh all things in all men; even wickedness in the wicked: for this is one branch of his own omnipotence." He very properly explains how God may be said to harden men, &c. and yet not be the author of their sin: "It is not to be understood," says he, "as if God found men good, wise and tractable, and then made them wicked, foolish and obdurate; but God, finding them depraved, judicially and powerfully excites them just as they are (unless it is his will to regenerate any of them) and, by thus exciting them, they become more blind and obstinate than they were before." See this whole subject debated at large in the places last referred to.

Pos. 3. God, as the primary and efficient cause of all things, is not only the author of those actions done by his elect as actions, but also as they are good actions; whereas, on the other hand, though he may be said to be the author of all the actions done by the wicked, yet he is not the author of them in a moral and compound sense, as they are sinful; but physically, simply, and sensu diviso, as they are mere actions, abstractedly from all consideration of the goodness or badness of them.

Although there is no action whatever which is not in some sense either good or bad, yet we can easily conceive of an action purely as such without adverting to the quality of it; so that the distinction between an action itself, and its denomination of good or evil, is very obvious and natural.

In and by the elect, therefore, God not only produces works and actions through his almighty power, but likewise through the salutary influences of his Spirit, first makes their persons good, and then their actions so too; but in and by the reprobate he produces actions by his power alone; which actions, as neither issuing from faith, nor being wrought with a view to the divine glory, nor done in the manner prescribed by the divine word, are, on these accounts, properly denominated evil. Hence we see that God does not immediately and per se, infuse iniquity into the wicked; but, as Luther expresses it, powerfully excites them to action, and withholds those gracious influences of his Spirit, without which every action is necessarily evil. That God, either directly or remotely, excites bad men as well as good ones to action, cannot be denied by any but atheists, or by those who carry their notions of free-will and human independency so high as to exclude the Deity from all actual operation in and among his creatures, which is little short of atheism. Every work performed, whether good or evil, is done in strength and by the power derived immediately from God himself, in whom all men live, move, and have their being, Acts xvii. 28. As at first without him was not any thing made which was made; so now without him is not any thing done which is done. We have no power or faculty, whether corporeal or intellectual, but what we received from God, subsists by him, and is exercised in subserviency to his will and appointment. It is he who created, preserves, actuates and directs all things. But it by no means follows from these premises that God is therefore the cause of sin; for sin is nothing but ανομία, illegality, want of conformity to the divine law, 1 John iii. 4. a mere privation of rectitude: consequently, being itself a thing purely negative, it can have no positive or efficient cause, but only a negative and deficient one, as several learned men have observed.

Every action, as such, is undoubtedly good; it being an actual exertion of those operative powers given us by God for that very end: God therefore may be the author of all actions (as he undoubtedly is), and yet not be the author of evil. An action is constituted evil three ways; by proceeding from a wrong principle, by being directed to a wrong end, and by being done in a wrong manner. Now, though God, as we have said, is the efficient cause of our actions, as actions, yet if these actions commence sinful, that sinfulness arises from ourselves. Suppose a boy who knows not how to write has his hand guided by his master, and nevertheless makes false letters, quite unlike the copy set him; though his preceptor who guides his hand is the cause of his writing at all, yet his own ignorance and unskilfulness are the cause of his writing so badly. Just so, God is the supreme author of our action, abstractedly taken; but our own vitiqisity is the cause of our acting amiss.

I shall conclude this article with two or three observations. And, (1). I would infer that if we would maintain the doctrine of God's omnipotence we must insist upon that of his universal agency: the latter cannot be denied without giving up the former. Disprove that he is almighty, and then we will grant that his influence and operations are limited and circumscribed. Luther says (k) "God would not be a respectable being, if he were not almighty, and the doer of all things that are done; or if any thing could come to pass in which he had no hand." God has at least a physical influence on whatsoever is done by his creatures, whether trivial or important, good or evil. Judas as truly lived, moved, and had his being from God as Peter; and Satan himself as much as Gabriel; for to say that sin exempts the sinner from the divine government and jurisdiction is abridging the power of God with a witness; nay, is rasing it from its very foundation.

(i) De Serv. Arb. c. 8. and 116 and 147. usq. ad. c. 165.

(2.) This doctrine of God's omnipotence has a native tendency to awaken in our hearts that reverence for, and fear of, the divine majesty which none can either receive or retain but those who believe him to be infinitely powerful, and to work all things after the counsel of his own will. This godly fear is a sovereign antidote against sin; for if I really believe that God by his unintermitted operation upon my soul produces actions in me, which, being simply good, receive their malignancy from the corruption of my nature (and even those works that stand opposed to sins are more or less infected with this moral leprosy); and if I consider that, should I yield myself a slave to actual iniquity, God can, and justly might, as he has frequently done by others, give me up to a reprobate mind and punish one sin by leaving me to the commission of another; surely such reflections as these must fill me with awful apprehensions of the divine purity, power and greatness, and make me watch continually, as well against the inward risings as the outward appearance of evil.

(3.) This doctrine is also useful as it tends to inspire us with true humility of soul; and to lay us as impotent dust and ashes at the feet of sovereign omnipotence. It teaches us, what too many are fatally ignorant of, the blessed lesson of self-despair; i. e. that in a state of unregeneracy our wisdom is folly, our strength weakness, and our righteousness nothing worth: that therefore we can do nothing either to the glory of God or the spiritual benefit of ourselves and others but through the ability which he giveth; that in him our strength lieth, and from him all our help must come. Supposing we believe that whatsoever is done below or above God doeth it himself; that all things depend, both as to their being and operation, upon his omnipotent arm and mighty support; that we cannot even sin, much less do any good thing, if he withdraw his aid; and that all men are in his hand, as clay in the hand of the potter; I say, did we really believe all these points, and see them in the light of the Divine Spirit, how can it be reasonably supposed that we could wax insolent against this great God, behave contemptuously and superciliously in the world, or boast of anything we have or do? Luther informs us (l), that he "used to be frequently much offended at this doctrine because it drove him to self-despair; but that he afterwards found that this sort of despair was salutary and profitable, and near akin to divine grace."

(4.) We are hereby taught not only humility before God, but likewise dependence on him, and resignation to him. For if we are thoroughly persuaded that of ourselves, and in our own strength, we cannot do either good or evil; but that being originally created by God we are incessantly supported, moved, influenced and directed by him, this way or that, as he pleases; the natural inference hence will be that with simple faith we cast ourselves entirely, as on the bosom of his providence, commit all our care and solicitude to his hand; praying without hesitation or reserve that his will may be done in us, on us, and by us, and that in all his dealings with us he may consult his own glory alone. This holy passiveness is the very apex of Christianity. All the desires of our great Redeemer himself were reducible to these two; that the will of God might be done, and that the glory of God might be displayed. These were the highest and supreme marks at which he aimed throughout the whole course of his spotless life and inconceivably tremendous sufferings. Happy, thrice happy that man, who hath thus far attained the mind that was in Christ.

(5.) The comfortable belief of this doctrine has a tendency to excite and keep alive within us that fortitude which is so ornamental to, and necessary for, us while we abide in this wilderness. For if I believe with the apostle that all things are of God, 2 Cor. v. 18, I shall be less liable to perturbation when afflicted, and learn more easily to possess my soul in patience. This was Job's support: he was not overcome with rage and despair when he received news that the Sabeans had carried off his cattle and slain his servants, and that the remainder of both were consumed with fire; that the Chaldeans had robbed him of his camels; and that his seven sons were crushed to death by the falling of the house where they were sitting: he resolved all these misfortunes into the agency of God, his power and sovereignty, and even thanked him for doing what he would with his own, Job. i. 21. If another should slander me in word, or injure me in deed, I shall not be prone to anger when, with David, I consider that the Lord hath bidden him, 2 Sam. xvi. 10.

(6.) This should stir us up to fervent and incessant prayer. For does God work powerfully and benignly in the hearts of his elect? and is he the sole cause of every action they do, which is truly and spiritually good? Then it should be our prayer that he would work in us likewise both to will and to do of his good pleasure: and if, on self-examination, we find reason to trust that some good thing is wrought in us, it should put us upon thankfulness unfeigned, and cause us to glory, not in ourselves, but in him. On the other hand, does God manifest his displeasure against the wicked by blinding, hardening, and giving them up to perpetrate iniquity with greediness? which judicial acts of God are both a punishment for their sin and also eventual additions to it: we should be the more incited to deprecate these tremendous evils, and to beseech the king of heaven that he would not thus lead us into temptation. So much concerning the omnipotence of God. I shall now,

V. Take notice of his justice.

Pos. 1. God is infinitely, absolutely and unchangeably just.

The justice of God may be considered either inmentally, as it is in himself, which is, properly speaking, the same with his holiness; or transiently and relatively, as it respects his right conduct towards his creatures, which is properly justice. By the former he is all that is holy, just and good; by the latter he is manifested to be so in all his dealings with angels and men. For the first see Deut. xxxii. 4. Psa. xcii. 15; for the second, Job viii. 3. Ps. cxlv. 17. Hence it follows that whatever God either wills or does, however it may at first sight seem to clash with our ideas of right and wrong, cannot really be unjust. It is certain that for a season he sorely afflicted his righteous servant Job; and on the other hand enriched the Sabeans, an infidel and lawless nation, with a profusion of wealth and a series of success: before Jacob and Esau were born, or had done either good or evil, he loved and chose the former and reprobated the latter: He gave repentance to Peter and left Judas to perish in his sin: and as in all ages, so to this day he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. In all which he acts most justly and righteously, and there is no iniquity with him.

Pos. 2. The Deity may be considered in a threefold view: as God of all, as Lord of all, and as Judge of all.

(1.) As God of all, he created, sustains, and exhilarates the whole universe; causes his sun to shine, and his rain to fall upon the evil and the good, Matt. v. and is Σωτηρ παντων ανθρωπων, the preserver of all men, 1 Tim. iv. 19. For as he is infinitely and supremely good, so also is he communicative of his goodness; as appears not only from his creation of all things, but especially from his providential benignity. Every thing has its being from him, as Creator; and its well-being from him as a bountiful preserver. (2.) As Lord or sovereign of all, he does as he will (and has a most unquestionable right to do so) with his own; and in particular fixes and determines the everlasting state of every individual person as he sees fit. It is essential to absolute sovereignty that the sovereign have it in his power to dispose of those over whom his jurisdiction extends just as he pleases, without being accountable to any: and God, whose authority is unbounded, none being exempt from it, may, with the strictest holiness and justice, love or hate, elect or reprobate, save or destroy any of his creatures, whether human or angelic, according to his own free pleasure and sovereign purpose. (3.) As Judge of all he ratifies what he does as Lord, by rendering to all according to their works; by punishing the wicked, and rewarding those whom it was his will to esteem righteous and to make holy.

Pos. 3. Whatever things God wills or does, are not willed and done by him because they were, in their own nature, and previously to his willing them, just and right; or because, from their intrinsic fitness, he ought to will and do them; but they are therefore just, right and proper, because He who is holiness itself wills and does them.

Hence Abraham looked upon it as a righteous action to slay his innocent son. Why did he so esteem it? because the law of God authorised murder? No; for on the contrary, both the law of God and the law of nature preempторily forbid it: but the holy patriarch well knew that the will of God is the only rule of justice, and that what he pleases to command is on that very account just and righteous. (m) It follows,

Pos. 4. That although our works are to be examined by the revealed will of God and be denominated materially good or evil, as they agree or disagree with it; yet the works of God himself cannot be brought to any test whatever: for his will being the grand universal law, he himself cannot be, properly speaking, subject to, or obliged by, any law superior to that. Many things are done by him (such as choosing and reprobating men) without any respect had to their works; suffering people to fall into sin, when if it so pleased him, he might prevent it; leaving many backsliding professors to go on and perish in their apostasy, when it is in the divine power to sanctify and set them right; drawing some by his grace, and permitting many others to continue in sin and unregeneracy; condemning those to future misery whom, if he pleased, he could undoubtedly save, with innumerable instances of the like nature (which might be mentioned), and which, if done by us, would be apparently unjust, inasmuch as they would not square with the revealed will of God, which is the great and only safe rule of our practice. But, when he does these and such like things, they cannot but be holy, equitable, and worthy of himself: for since his will is essentially and unchangeably just, whatever he does in consequence of that will must be just and good likewise. From what has been delivered under this fifth head I would infer, That they who deny the power God has of doing as he will with his creatures, and exclaim against unconditional decrees, as cruel, tyrannical, and unjust; either know not what they say nor whereof they affirm; or are wilful blasphemers of his name, and perverse rebels against his sovereignty: to which at last, however unwillingly, they will be forced to submit.

I shall conclude this introduction with briefly considering in the Sixth and last place, the mercy of God.

Pos. 1. The Deity is throughout the Scriptures represented as infinitely gracious and merciful, Exod. xxxiv. 6. Nehem. ix. 17. Psalm ciii. 8. 1 Pet. i. 3.

When we call the divine mercy infinite, we do not mean that it is in a way of grace extended to all men without exception (and supposing it was, even then it would be very improperly denominated infinite on that account, since the objects of it, though all men taken together, would not amount to a multitude strictly and properly infinite), but that his mercy towards his own elect, as it knew no beginning, so is it infinite in duration, and shall know neither period nor intermission.

Pos. 2. Mercy is not in the Deity as it is in us, a passion, or affection; every thing of that kind being incompatible with the purity, perfection, independency and unchangeableness of his nature: but, when this attribute is predicated of him, it only notes his free and eternal will or purpose of making some of the fallen race happy, by delivering them from the guilt and dominion of sin, and communicating himself to them in a way consistent with his own inviolable justice, truth and holiness. This seems to be the proper definition of mercy, as it relates to the spiritual and eternal good of those who are its objects. But it should be observed,

Pos. 3. That the mercy of God, taken in its more large and indefinite sense, may be considered, (1.) as general, (2.) as special.

His general mercy is no other than what we commonly call his bounty, by which he is more or less providentially good to all mankind, both elect and non-elect: Matt. v. 45. Luke vi. 35. Acts xiv. 17; and xvii. 25, 28. By his special mercy he, as Lord of all, hath in a spiritual sense compassion on as many of the fallen race as are the objects of his free and eternal favour: the effects of which special mercy are the redemption and justification of their persons, through the satisfaction of Christ; the effectual vocation, regeneration and sanctification of them by his Spirit; the infallible and final preservation of them in a state of grace on earth; and their everlasting glorification in heaven.

Pos. 4. There is no contradiction, whether real or seeming, between these two assertions, (1.) That the blessings of grace and glory are peculiar to those whom God hath in his decree of predestination set apart for himself; and (2.) That the gospel declaration runs that whosoever willethe may take of the water of life freely, Rev. xxii. 17. Since, in the first place, none can will or unfeignedly and spiritually desire a part in these privileges but those whom God previously makes willing and desirous; and secondly, that he gives this will to, and excites this desire in, none but his own elect.

Pos. 5. Since ungodly men, who are totally and finally destitute of divine grace, cannot know what this mercy is, nor form any proper apprehensions of it, much less by faith embrace and rely upon it for themselves; and since daily experience, as well as the Scriptures of truth, teaches us, that God doth not open the eyes of the reprobate as he doth the eyes of his elect, nor savingly enlighten their understandings; it evidently follows that his mercy was never, from the very first, designed for them, neither will it be applied to them: but, both in designation and application, is proper and peculiar to those only who are predestinated to life; as it is written, the election hath obtained, and the rest were blinded, Rom. xi. 7.

Pos. 6. The whole work of salvation, together with every thing that is in order to it, or stands in connection with it, is sometimes in scripture comprised under the single term mercy; to shew that mere love and absolute grace were the grand cause why the elect are saved, and that all merit, worthiness and good qualifications of theirs were entirely excluded from having any influence on the divine will, why they should be chosen, redeemed, and glorified, above all others. When it is said, Rom. ix. He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, it is as much as if the apostle had said, "God elected, ransomed, justified, regenerates, sanctifies and glorifies whom he pleases :” every one of these great privileges being briefly summed up, and virtually included in that comprehensive phrase, “He hath mercy.”

Pos. 7. It follows that whatever favour is bestowed on us ; whatever good thing is in us, or wrought by us ; whether in will, word, or deed ; and whatever blessings else we receive from God, from election quite home to glorification, all proceed, merely and entirely, from the good pleasure of his will, and his mercy towards us in Christ Jesus. To him, therefore, the praise is due, who putteth the difference between man and man, by having compassion on some and not on others.

THE DOCTRINE OF ABSOLUTE PREDESTINATION

STATED AND ASSERTED.

CHAP. I.

WHEREIN THE TERMS COMMONLY MADE USE OF IN TREATING OF THIS SUBJECT ARE DEFINED AND EXPLAINED.

HAVING considered the attributes of God, as laid down in Scripture, and so far cleared our way to the doctrine of predestination, I shall, before I enter further on the subject, explain the principal terms generally made use of when treating of it, and settle their true meaning. In discoursing on the divine decrees, mention is frequently made of God’s love and hatred ; of election and reprobation ; and of the divine purpose, foreknowledge, and predestination ; each of which we shall distinctly and briefly consider.

I. When love is predicated of God, we do not mean that he is possessed of it as a passion or affection. In us it is such ; but if, considered in that sense, it should be ascribed to the Deity, it would be utterly subservive of the simplicity, perfection, and independency of his being. Love, therefore, when attributed to him, signifies, 1. His eternal benevolence, i. e. his everlasting will, purpose, and determination to deliver, bless, and save his people. Of this no good works wrought by them are, in any sense, the cause. Neither are even the merits of Christ himself to be considered as any way moving or exciting this good will of God to his elect ; since the gift of Christ to be their Mediator and Redeemer is itself an effect of this free and eternal favour borne to them by God the Father. John iii. 16. His love towards them arises merely from the good pleasure of his own will, without the least regard to any thing ad extra, or out of himself. The term implies, 2. Complacency, delight, and approbation. With this love God cannot love even his elect as considered in themselves, because in that view they are guilty, polluted sinners ; but they were, from all eternity, objects of it, as they stood united to Christ and partakers of his righteousness. Love implies, 3. Actual benevolence, which, properly speaking, is nothing else than the effect or accomplishment of the other two : those are the cause of this. This actual benevolence respects all blessings, whether of a temporal, spiritual, or eternal nature. Temporal good things are, indeed, indiscriminately bestowed, in a greater or less degree, on all, whether elect or reprobate ; but they are given in a covenant way and as blessings to the elect only ; to whom also the other benefits, respecting grace and glory, are peculiar. And this love of benevolence, no less than that of benevolence and complacency, is absolutely free and irrespective of any worthiness in man.

II. When hatred is ascribed to God, it implies, 1. A negation of benevolence, or a resolution not to have mercy on such and such men, nor to endure them with any of those graces which stand connected with eternal life. So Rom. ix. Esau have I hated, i. e. I did, from all eternity, determine within myself not to have mercy on him. The sole cause of which awful negation is, not merely the unworthiness of the persons hated, but the sovereignty and freedom of the divine will. 2. It denotes displeasure and dislike ; for sinners who are not interested in Christ cannot but be infinitely displeasing to, and loathsome in, the sight of eternal purity. 3. It signifies a positive will to punish and destroy the reprobate for their sins ; of which will the infliction of misery upon them hereafter is but the necessary effect and actual execution.

III. The term election that so very frequently occurs in Scripture is there taken in a fourfold sense : 1. and most commonly signifies, “That eternal, sovereign, unconditional, particular, and immutable act of God, where he selected some from among all mankind, and of every nation under heaven, to be redeemed and everlastingly saved by Christ.” 2. It sometimes and more rarely signifies “That gracious and almighty act of the Divine Spirit whereby God actually and visibly separates his elect from the world by effectual calling.” This is nothing but the manifestation and partial fulfilment of the former election, and by it the objects of predestinating grace are sensibly led into the communion of saints, and visibly added to the number of God’s declared, professing people. Of this our Lord makes mention, John xv. 19. Because I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Where, it should seem, the choice spoken of does not refer so much to God's eternal, imminent act of election, as his open, manifest one, whereby he powerfully and efficaciously called the disciples forth from the world of the unconverted, and quickened them from above in conversion. 3. By election is sometimes meant, "God's taking a whole nation, community, or body of men, into external covenant with himself, by giving them the advantage of revelation or his written word as the rule of their belief and practice when other nations are without it." In this sense the whole body of the Jewish nation was indiscriminately called elect, Deut. vii. 6, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God. Now all that are thus elected are not therefore necessarily saved; but many of them may be, and are, reprobates; as those of whom our Lord says, Matt. xiii. 20, That they hear the word, and anon with joy receive it, &c. And the apostle John, 1 Epist. chap. ii. They went out from us, i. e. being favoured with the same gospel revelation we were, they professed themselves true believers no less than we; but they were not of us, i. e. they were not with us chosen of God unto everlasting life, nor did they ever, in reality, possess that faith of his operation which he gave to us; for if they had, in this sense, been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us; they would have manifested the sincerity of their professions and the truth of their conversion by enduring to the end and being saved. And even this external revelation, though it is not necessarily connected with eternal happiness, is nevertheless productive of very many and great advantages to the people and places where it is vouchsafed, and is made known to some nations and kept back (n) from others, according to the good pleasure of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. 4. And lastly, election sometimes signifies "The temporary designation of some person or persons to the filling up some particular station in the visible Church or office in civil life." So Judas was chosen to the apostleship, John vi. 70; and Saul to be the king of Israel, 1 Sam. x. 24. Thus much for the use of the word election. On the contrary, IV. Reprobation denotes either 1. God's eternal preterition of some men when he chose others to glory, and his predestination of them to fill up the measure of their iniquities, and then to receive the just punishment of their crimes, even destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. This is the primary, most obvious, and most frequent sense in which the word is used. It may likewise signify, 2. God's forbearing to call by his grace those whom he hath thus ordained to condemnation; but this is only a temporary preterition, and a consequence of that which was from eternity. 3. And lastly, The word may be taken in another sense, as denoting God's refusal to grant to some nations the light of the gospel revelation. This may be considered as a kind of national reprobation, which yet does not imply that every individual person who lives in such a country must therefore unavoidably perish for ever, any more than that every individual who lives in a land called Christian is therefore in a state of salvation. There are, no doubt, elect persons among the former, as well as reprobate ones among the latter. By a very little attention to the context, any reader may easily discover in which of these several senses the word elect and reprobate are used whenever they occur in Scripture.

V. Mention is frequently made in Scripture of the purpose (o) of God, which is no other than his gracious intention from eternity of making his elect everlastingly happy in Christ.

VI. When foreknowledge is ascribed to God, the word imports, 1. That general prescience whereby he knew, from all eternity, both what he himself would do, and what his creatures, in consequence of his efficacious and permissive decree, should do likewise. The divine foreknowledge, considered in this view, is absolutely universal; it extends to all beings that did, do, or ever shall exist; and to all actions that ever have been, that are, or shall be done, whether good or evil, natural, civil, or moral. 2. The word often denotes that special pre-

(n) See Psalm cxlvii. 19, 20.

(o) The purpose of God does not seem to differ at all from predestination, that being, as well as this, an eternal, free, and unchangeable act of his will. Besides, the word purpose, when predicated of God in the New Testament, always denotes his design of saving his elect, and that only; Rom. viii. 28, and ix. 11. Eph. i. 11, and iii. 11. 2 Tim. i. 9. As does the term predestination, which, throughout the whole New Testament, never signifies the appointment of the non-elect to wrath, but, singly and solely, the fore-appointment of the elect to grace and glory; though in common theological writings predestination is spoken of as extending to whatever God does, both in a way of permission and efficiency, as in the utmost sense of the term it does. It is worthy of the reader's notice that the original word, προβαις, which we render purpose, signifies not only an appointment, but a fore-appointment, and such a fore-appointment as is efficacious and cannot be obstructed, but shall most assuredly issue in a full accomplishment, which gave occasion to the following judicious remark of a late learned writer: "προβαις à Paulo sæpe usurpatur in electionis negotio, ad designandum, consilium hoc Dei non esse inane quodam et inefficacem velleitatem; sed constans, determinatum, et immutabile Dei propositum. Vox enim est efficacie summæ, ut notant grammatici veteres; et signatè vocatur à Paulo, προβαις του τα παντα ενεργουντος, consilium illius, qui efficaciter omnia operatur ex beneplacito suo." TURRETIN Institut. Tom. 1. loc. 4. quæst. 7. s. 12.

science which has for its objects his own elect, and them alone whom he is, in a peculiar sense, said to know and foreknow; Psal. i. 6. John x. 27. 2 Tim. ii. 19. Rom. viii. 29. 1 Peter i. 2.; and this knowledge is connected with, or rather the same with, love, favour, and approbation.

VII. We come now to consider the meaning of the word predestination, and how it is taken in Scripture. The verb predestinate is of Latin original, and signifies, in that tongue, to deliberate beforehand with one's self how one shall act, and, in consequence of such deliberation, to constitute, fore-ordain, and pre-determine where, when, how, and by whom, any thing shall be done, and to what end it shall be done. So the Greek verb, προορίζω, which exactly answers to the English word predestinate, and is rendered by it, signifies to resolve beforehand within one's self what to do; and, before the thing resolved on is actually effected, to appoint it to some certain use, and direct it to some determinate end. The Hebrew verb, habdel, has likewise much the same signification.

Now none but wise men are capable (especially in matters of great importance) of rightly determining what to do, and how to accomplish a proper end, by just, suitable, and effectual means; and if this is confessedly a very material part of true wisdom, who so fit to dispose of men, and assign each individual his sphere of action in this world, and his place in the world to come, as the all-wise God? And yet, alas! how many are there who cavil at those eternal decrees which, were we capable of fully and clearly understanding them, would appear to be as just as they are sovereign, and as wise as they are incomprehensible! Divine pre-ordination has for its objects all things that are created; no creature, whether rational or irrational, animate or inanimate, is exempted from its influence. All beings whatever, from the highest angel to the meanest reptile, and from the meanest reptile to the minutest atom, are the objects of God's eternal decrees and particular providence. However, the ancient fathers only make use of the word predestination as it refers to angels or men, whether good or evil; and it is used by the apostle Paul in a more limited sense still, so as by it to mean only that branch of it which respects God's election and designation of his people to eternal life. Rom. viii. 30. Eoh. i. 11.

But that we may more justly apprehend the import of this word, and the ideas intended to be conveyed by it, it may be proper to observe that the term predestination, theologically taken, admits of a fourfold definition: and may be considered as, (1.) "That eternal, most wise, and immutable decree of God, whereby he did, from before all time, determine and ordain to create, dispose of, and direct to some particular end, every person and thing to which he has given, or is yet to give, being; and to make the whole creation subservient to, and declarative of, his own glory." Of this decree, actual providence is the execution. (2.) Predestination may be considered as relating generally to mankind, and them only: and, in this view, we define it to be "The everlasting, sovereign and invariable purpose of God, whereby he did determine within himself to create Adam in his own image and likeness, and then to permit his fall; and to suffer him thereby to plunge himself and his whole posterity (inasmuch as they all sinned in him, not only virtually, but also federally and representatively) "into the dreadful abyss of sin, misery, and death." (3.) Consider predestination as relating to the elect only, and it is "that eternal, unconditional, particular, and irreversible act of the divine will, whereby, in matchless love and adorable sovereignty, God determined within himself to deliver a certain number of Adam's degenerate (p) offspring out of that sinful and miserable estate into which, by his primitive transgression, they were to fall; and in which sad condition they were equally involved with those who were not chosen: but being pitched upon, and singled out, by God the Father, to be vessels of grace and salvation (not for any thing in them that could recommend them to his favour, or entitle them to his notice, but merely because he would shew himself gracious to them), they were, in time, actually redeemed by Christ; are effectually called by his Spirit, justified, adopted, sanctified and preserved safe to his heavenly kingdom. The supreme end of this decree is the manifestation of his own infinitely glorious and amiably tremendous perfections: the inferior, or subordinate, end is the happiness and salvation of them who are thus freely elected. (4.) Predestination, as it regards the reprobate is, "That eternal, most holy, sovereign, and immu-

(p) When we say that the decree of predestination to life and death respects man as fallen, we do not mean that the fall was actually antecedent to that decree; for the decree is truly and properly eternal, as all God's immanent acts undoubtedly are, whereas the fall took place in time. What we intend, then, is only this, viz., that God (for reasons, without doubt, worthy of himself, and of which we are, by no means, in this life competent judges) having, from everlasting, peremptorily ordained to suffer the fall of Adam, did likewise from everlasting consider the human race as fallen; and out of the whole mass of mankind, thus viewed and foreknown as impure and obnoxious to condemnation, vouchsafed to select some particular persons (who collectively make up a very great, though precisely determinate, number) in and on whom he would make known the ineffable riches of his mercy.

table act of God's will, whereby he hath determined to leave some men to perish in their sins, and to be justly punished for them."

CHAP. II.

WHEREIN THE DOCTRINE OF PREDESTINATION IS EXPLAINED, AS IT RELATES IN GENERAL TO ALL MEN.

THUS much being premised, with relation to the Scripture terms commonly made use of in this controversy, we shall now proceed to take a nearer view of this high and mysterious article. And,

I. We, with the Scriptures, assert That there is a predestination of some particular persons to life, for the praise of the glory of divine grace; and a predestination of other particular persons to death: which death of punishment they shall inevitably undergo, and that, justly, on account of their sins. 1. There is a predestination of some particular persons to life. So Matt. xx. 15. Many are called, but few chosen; i. e. the gospel revelation comes indiscriminately to great multitudes; but few, comparatively speaking, are spiritually and eternally the better for it; and these few, to whom it is the savour of life unto life, are therefore savingly benefited by it, because they are the chosen or elect of God. To the same effect are the following passages among many others; Matt. xxiv. 22. For the elect's sake those days shall be shortened. Acts xiii. 48. As many as were ordained to eternal life believed, Rom. viii. 30. Whom he did predestinate, them he also called. And verse 33, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Eph. i. 4, 5. According as he hath chosen us in him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, &c. Having predestinated us to the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ, unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will. 2 Tim. i. 9. Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us, in Christ, before the world began. 2. This election of certain individuals unto eternal life was for the praise of the glory of divine grace. This is expressly asserted, in so many words, by the apostle, Eph. i. 5, 6. Grace, or mere favour, was the impulsive cause of all; it was the main spring which set all the inferior wheels in motion. It was an act of grace, in God, to choose any, when he might have passed by all: it was an act of sovereign grace to choose this man rather than that: when both were equally undone in themselves, and alike obnoxious to his displeasure. In a word, since election is not of works, and does not proceed on the least regard had to any worthiness in its objects; it must be of free, unbiassed grace; but election is not of works, Rom. xi. 5, 6; therefore it is solely of grace. 3. There is, on the other hand, a predestination of some particular persons to death. 2 Cor. iv. 3. If our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost. 1 Pet. ii. 8. Who stumble at the word, being disobedient; whereunto also they were appointed. 2 Pet. ii. 12. These, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed. Jude ver. 4. There are certain men, crept in unawares, who were before, of old, ordained to this condemnation. Rev. xvii. 8. Whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world. But of this we shall treat professedly, and more at large, in the fifth chapter. 4. This future death they shall inevitably undergo; for as God will certainly save all whom he wills should be saved, so he will as surely condemn all whom he wills shall be condemned; for he is the Judge of the whole earth, whose decree shall stand, and from whose sentence there is no appeal. Hath he said, and shall he not make it good? hath he spoken, and shall it not come to pass? And his decree is this; that these, i. e. the non-elect, who are left under the guilt of final impenitence, unbelief, and sin, shall go away into everlasting punishment; and the righteous, i. e. those who in consequence of their election in Christ, and union to him, are justly reputed, and really constituted such, shall enter into life eternal, Matt. xxv. 46. 5. The reprobate shall undergo this punishment justly, and on account of their sins. Sin is the meritorious and immediate cause of any man's damnation. God condemns and punishes the non-elect, not merely as men, but as sinners: and had it pleased the great Governor of the universe to have entirely prevented sin from having any entrance into the world, it should seem as if he could not, consistently with his known attributes, have condemned any man at all. But as all sin is properly meritorious of eternal death, and all men are sinners; they who are condemned are condemned most justly; and those who are saved are saved in a way of sovereign mercy, through the vicarious obedience and death of Christ for them.

Now this two-fold predestination of some to life and of others to death (if it may be called two-fold, both being constituent parts of the same decree), cannot be denied without likewise denying, 1. most express and frequent declarations of Scripture; and, 2. the very existence of God; for since God is a being perfectly simple, free from all accident and composition; and yet a will to save some and punish others is very often predicated of him in Scripture; and an immoveable decree to do this, in consequence of his will, is likewise ascribed to him; and a perfect foreknowledge of the sure and certain accomplishment of what he has thus willed and decreed is also attributed to him: it follows that whoever denies this will, decree, and foreknowledge of God, does, implicitly and virtually, deny God himself: since his will, decree, and foreknowledge, are no other than God himself willing and decreeing and foreknowing.

II. We assert that God did, from eternity, decree to make man in his own image; and also decreed to suffer him to fall from that image in which he should be created, and thereby to forfeit the happiness with which he was invested; which decree, and the consequences of it, were not limited to Adam only; but included, and extended to, all his natural posterity.

Something of this was hinted already in the preceding chapter: we shall now proceed to the proof of it. And, 1. That God did make man in his own image is evident from Scripture, Gen. i. 27. 2. That he decreed from eternity so to make man is as evident; since, for God to do any thing without having decreed it, or fixed a previous plan in his own mind, would be a manifest imputation on his wisdom; and if he decreed that now, or at any time, which he did not always decree, he could not be unchangeable. 3. That man actually did fall from the divine image, and his original happiness, is the undoubted voice of Scripture, Gen. iii. And 4. That he fell in consequence of the divine decree, (7) we prove thus: God was either willing that Adam should fall, or unwilling, or indifferent about it. If God was unwilling that Adam should transgress, how came it to pass that he did? Is man stronger, and is Satan wiser, than he that made them? Surely, no. Again; could not God, had it so pleased him, have hindered the tempter's access to paradise? or have created man, as he did the elect angels, with a will invariably determined to good only, and incapable of being biassed to evil? or at least have made the grace and strength, with which he indued Adam, actually effectual to the resisting of all solicitations to sin? None but Atheists would answer these questions in the negative. Surely, if God had not willed the fall, he could, and no doubt would, have prevented it; but he did not prevent it, ergo, he willed it. And if he willed it he certainly decreed it; for the decree of God is nothing else but the seal and ratification of his will. He does nothing but what he decreed; and he decreed nothing which he did not will, and both will and decree are absolutely eternal, though the execution of both be in time. The only way to evade the force of this reasoning is to say that "God was indifferent and unconcerned whether man stood or fell." But in what a shameful, unworthy light does this represent the Deity! Is it possible for us to imagine that God could be an idle, careless spectator of one of the most important events that ever came to pass? Are not the very hairs of our head all numbered? or does a sparrow fall to the ground without our heavenly Father? If, then, things the most trivial and worthless are subject to the appointment of his decree and the controul of his providence; how much more is man, the masterpiece of this lower creation? and, above all, that man Adam, who when recent from his Maker's hands was the living image of God himself, and very little inferior to angels! and on whose perseverance was suspended the welfare, not of himself only, but likewise that of the whole world. But so far was God from being indifferent in this matter; that there is nothing whatever about which he is so; for he worketh all things, without exception, after the counsel of his own will, Eph. i. 11; consequently, if he positively wills whatever is done, he cannot be indifferent with regard to any thing. On the whole, if God was not unwilling that Adam should fall, he must have been willing that he should; since between God's willing and nilling there is no medium. And is it not highly rational, as well as Scriptural, nay, is it not absolutely necessary, to suppose that the fall was not contrary to the will and determination of God? since, if it was, his will (which the apostle represents as being irresistible, Rom. ix. 19.) was apparently frustrated, and his determination rendered of worse than none effect. And how dishonourable to, how inconsistent with, and how notoriously subversive of, the dignity of God such a blasphemous supposition would be, and how irreconcilable with every one of his allowed attributes, is very easy to observe. 5. That man, by his fall, forfeited the happiness with which he was invested is evident, as well from Scripture as from experience, Gen. iii. 7, 10, 16, 17, 18, 19, 23, 24. Rom. v. 12. Gal. iii. 10. He first sinned (and the essence of sin lies in disobedience to the command of God), and then immediately became miserable; misery being, through the divine appointment, the natural and inseparable concomitant of sin.

(7) See this article judiciously stated and nervously asserted by Witsius, in his Oecon, l. 1. c. 8. s. 10—25.

6. That the fall, and its sad consequences, did not terminate solely in Adam, but affect his whole posterity, is the doctrine of the sacred oracles, Psalm li. 5. Rom. v. 12. 14, 15, 17, 18, 19. 1 Cor. xv. 22. Eph. ii. 3. Besides, not only spiritual and eternal, but likewise temporal, death, is the wages of sin, Rom. vi. 23. James i. 15. And yet, we see that millions of infants who never, in their own persons, either did or could commit sin die continually. It follows, that either God must be unjust in punishing the innocent, or that these infants are, some way or other, guilty creatures; if they are not so in themselves (I mean actually so, by their own commission of sin), they must be so in some other person; and who that person is let Scripture say, Rom. v. 12. 18. 1 Cor. xv. 22. And, I ask, how can these be, with equity, sharers in Adam's punishment, unless they are chargeable with his sin? and how can they be fairly chargeable with his sin, unless he was their federal head and representative, and acted in their name, and sustained their persons when he fell?

III. We assert that, as all men universally are not elected to salvation, so neither are all men universally ordained to condemnation. This follows from what has been proved already: however, I shall subjoin some farther demonstration of these two positions. 1. All men universally are not elected to salvation. And, first, this may be evinced à posteriori: it is undeniable, from Scripture, that God will not, in the last day, save every individual of mankind, Dan. xii. 2. Matt. xxv. 46. John v. 29. Therefore, say we, God never designed to save every individual; since, if he had, every individual would and must be saved, for his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. See what we have already advanced on this head in the first chapter, under the second article, Position 8. Secondly, this may be evinced also from God's foreknowledge. The Deity from all eternity, and, consequently, at the very time he gives life and being to a reprobate, certainly foreknew, and knows, in consequence of his own decree, that such an one would fall short of salvation; now, if God foreknew this, he must have pre-determined it; because his own will is the foundation of his decrees, and his decrees are the foundation of his prescience; he, therefore, fore-knowing futurities, because, by his predestination, he hath rendered their futurity certain and inevitable. Neither is it possible, in the very nature of the thing, that they should be elected to salvation, or ever obtain it, whom God foreknew should perish; for then the divine act of preterition would be changeable, wavering, and precarious; the divine foreknowledge would be deceived, and the divine will impeded. All which are utterly impossible. Lastly, That all men are not chosen to life, nor created to that end, is evident, in that there are some who were hated of God before they were born, Rom. ix. 11—13, are fitted for destruction, verse 22, and made for the day of evil, Prov. xvi. 1

But, 2. All men universally are not ordained to condemnation. There are some who are chosen, Mat. xx. 16. An election, or elect number, who obtain grace and salvation while the rest are blinded, Rom. xi. 7; a little flock, to whom it is the Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom, Luke xii. 32. A people whom the Lord hath reserved, Jer. l. 20, and formed for himself, Isa. xliii. 21. A peculiarly favoured race, to whom it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; while to others it is not given, Matt. xiii. 11. A remnant according to the election of grace, Rom. xi. 5, whom God hath not appointed to wrath, but to obtain salvation by Jesus Christ, 1 Thess. v. 9. In a word, who are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, that they should shew forth the praises of Him who hath called them out of darkness into his marvellous light, 1 Pet. ii. 9. And whose names, for that very end, are in the book of life, Phil. iv. 3, and written in heaven, Luke x. 20. Heb. xii. 23. Luther (r) observes, that in the 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of the epistle to the Romans, the apostle particularly insists on the doctrine of predestination; "Because," says he, "all things whatever arise from, and depend upon, the divine appointment? whereby it was pre-ordained who should receive the word of life, and who should disbelieve it; who should be delivered from their sins, and who should be hardened in them; who should be justified, and who condemned."

IV. We assert that the number of the elect, and also of the reprobate, is so fixt and determinate that neither can be augmented nor diminished.

It is written of God that he telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names; Psalm cxlvii. 4. Now it is incompatible with the infinite wisdom and knowledge of the all-comprehending God to be ignorant of the names and number of the rational creatures he has made, as that he should be ignorant of the stars and the other inanimate products of his almighty power; and if he knows all men in general, taken in the lump, he may well be said, in a more near and special sense, to know them that are his by election; 2 Tim. ii. 19. And if he knows who are his, he must consequently know who are not his, i. e. whom, and how many, he hath left in the corrupt mass to be justly punished for their sins. Grant this, (and who can help granting a truth so self-evident?) and it follows that the number, as well of the elect as of the reprobate, is fixed and certain; otherwise God would be said to know that which is not true, and his knowledge must be false and delusive, and so no knowledge at all; since that which is in itself, at best, but precarious, can never be the foundation of sure and infallible knowledge. But that God does indeed precisely know, to a man, who are and are not the objects of his electing favour, is evident from such Scriptures as these: Exod. xxxiii. 17. Thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name. Jer. i. 5. Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee. Luke x. 20. Your names are written in heaven. Luke xii. 7. The very hairs of your head are all numbered. John xiii. 18. I know whom I have chosen. John x. 14. I know my sheep, and am known of mine. 2 Tim. ii. 19. The Lord knoweth them that are his. And if the number of these is thus assuredly settled and exactly known, it follows that we are right in asserting,

V. That the decrees of election and reprobation are immutable and irreversible.

Were not this the case, 1. God's decree would be precarious, frustrable, and uncertain, and, by consequence, no decree at all. 2. His foreknowledge would be wavering, indeterminate, and liable to disappointment; whereas it always has its accomplishment, and necessarily infers the certain futurity of the thing or things foreknown; Isa. xlv. 9, 10. I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done; saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. 3. Neither would his word be true which declares that, with regard to the elect, the gifts and calling of God are without repentance, Rom. xi. 29; that whom he predestinated them he also glorified, chap. viii. 30; that whom he loveth he loveth to the end, John xiii. 1; with numberless passages to the same purpose. Nor would his word be true with regard to the non-elect, if it was possible for them to be saved; for it is there declared that they are fitted for destruction, &c. Rom. ix. 22, fore-ordained unto condemnation, Jude 4, and delivered over to a reprobate mind in order to their damnation, Rom. i. 28. 2 Thes. ii. 12. 4. If between the elect and reprobate there was not a great gulph fixed, so that neither can be otherwise than they are, then the will of God (which is the alone cause why some are chosen and others are not) would be rendered inefficacious and of no effect. 5. Nor could the justice of God stand if he was to condemn the elect, for whose sins he hath received ample satisfaction at the hand of Christ; or if he was to save the reprobate, who are not interested in Christ as the elect are. 6. The power of God (whereby the elect are preserved from falling into a state of condemnation, and the wicked held down and shut up in a state of death) would be eluded, not to say utterly abolished. 7. Nor would God be unchangeable, if they, who were once the people of his love, could commence the objects of his hatred; or if the vessels of his wrath could be saved with the vessels of grace. Hence that of St. Austin: (s) "Brethren," says he, "let us not imagine that God puts down any man in his book and then erases him; for if Pilate could say, What I have written I have written, how can it be thought that the great God would write a person's name in the book of life, and then blot it out again?" And may we not with equal reason ask, on the other hand, how can it be thought that any of the reprobate should be written in that book of life which contains the names of the elect only? or that any should be inscribed there who were not written among the living from eternity? I shall conclude this chapter with that observation of Luther: (t) "This," says he, "is the very thing that razes the doctrine of free-will from its foundations: to wit, that God's eternal love of some men and hatred of others is immutable, and cannot be reversed." Both one and the other will have its full accomplishment.

CHAP. III.

CONCERNING ELECTION UNTO LIFE, OR PREDESTINATION AS IT RESPECTS THE SAINTS IN PARTICULAR.

HAVING considered predestination as it regards all men in general, and briefly shewn that by it some are appointed to wrath and others to obtain salvation by Jesus Christ; 1 Thes. v. 9; I now come to consider more distinctly that branch of it which relates to the saints only, and is commonly styled election. Its definition I have given already in the close of the first chapter; what I have farther to advance from the Scriptures, on this important subject, I shall reduce to several positions, and subjoin a short explanation and confirmation of each.

(s) Tom. 8. in Psalm 68. col. 738.

Pos. 1. Those who are ordained unto eternal life were not so ordained on account of any worthiness foreseen in them, or of any good works to be wrought by them, nor yet for their future faith, but purely and solely of free, sovereign grace, and according to the mere pleasure of God. This is evident, among other considerations, from this: that faith, repentance, and holiness are no less the free gifts of God than eternal life itself. Eph. ii. 8. Faith is not of yourselves; it is the gift of God. Phil. i. 29. Unto you it is given to believe. Acts v. 31. Him hath God exalted with his right hand for to give repentance. Acts xi. 18. Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life. In like manner holiness is called the sanctification of the Spirit, 2 Thess. ii. 13, because the divine Spirit is the efficient of it in the soul, and, of unholiness, makes us holy. Now if repentance and faith are the gifts, and sanctification is the work of God, then these are not the fruits of man's free will, nor what he acquires of himself, and so can neither be motives to, nor conditions of, his election, which is an act of the divine mind, antecedent to, and irrespective of, all qualities whatever in the persons elected. Besides, the apostle asserts expressly that election is not of works, but of him that calleth, and that it passed before the persons concerned had done either good or evil, Rom. ix. 11. Again: if faith or works were the cause of election, God could not be said to choose us, but we to choose him, contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture. John xv. 16. Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you. 1 John iv. 10, 19. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us. We love him because he first loved us. Election is everywhere asserted to be God's act, not man's: Mark xiii. 20. Rom. ix. 17. Eph. i. 4. 1 Thess. v. 9. 2 Thess. ii. 13. Once more, we are chosen that we might be holy, not because it was foreseen we would be so, Eph. i. 4; therefore, to represent holiness as the reason why we were elected is to make the effect antecedent to the cause. The apostle adds, verse 5, having predestinated us according to the good pleasure of his will; most evidently implying that God saw nothing extra se, had no motive from without why he should either choose any at all, or this man before another. In a word, the elect were freely loved, Hos. xiv. 4, freely chosen, Rom. xi. 5, 6, and freely redeemed, Isa. lii. 3. They are freely called, 2 Tim. i. 9, freely justified, Rom. iii. 24, and shall be freely glorified, Rom. vi. 23. The great Augustin, in his book of Retractations, ingeniously acknowledges his error in having once thought that faith foreseen was a condition of election: he owns that that opinion is equally impious and absurd, and proves that faith is one of the fruits of election, and consequently could not be, in any sense, a cause of it: "I could never have asserted," says he, "that God, in choosing men to life, had any respect to their faith, had I duly considered that faith itself is his own gift." And in another treatise of his (u) he has these words: "Since Christ says, Ye have not chosen me, &c., I would fain ask whether it be scriptural to say we must have faith before we are elected, and not rather that we are elected in order to our having faith?"

Pos. 2. As many as are ordained to eternal life are ordained to enjoy that life in and through Christ, and on account of his merits alone; 1 Thess. v. 9. Here let it be carefully observed that not the merits of Christ, but the sovereign love of God only, is the cause of election itself; but then the merits of Christ are the alone procuring cause of that salvation to which men are elected. This decree of God admits of no cause out of himself; but the thing decreed, which is the glorification of his chosen ones, may and does admit, nay, necessarily requires, a meritorious cause, which is no other than the obedience and death of Christ.

Pos. 3. They who are predestinated to life are likewise predestinated to all those means which are indispensably necessary in order to their meetness for, entrance upon, and enjoyment of, that life; such as repentance, faith, sanctification, and perseverance in these to the end.

Acts xiii. 48. As many as were ordained to eternal life believed. Eph. i. 4. He hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love. Eph. ii. 10. For we [i. e. the same we whom he hath chosen before the foundation of the world] are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath fore-ordained that we should walk in them. And the apostle assures the same Thessalonians, whom he reminds of their election and God's everlasting appointment of them to obtain salvation, that this also was his will concerning them, even their sanctification; 1 Thess. i. 4, and v. 9, and iv. 3, and gives them a view of all these privileges at once; 2 Thess. ii. 13. God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. As does St. Peter; 1 Epis. i. 2. Elect—through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. Now though faith and holiness are not represented as the cause wherefore the elect are saved, yet these are constantly represented as the means through which they are saved, or as the appointed way wherein God leads his people to glory, these blessings being always bestowed previous to that. Agreeably to all which is that of Austin: (x) "Whatsoever persons are, through the riches of divine grace, exempted from the original sentence of condemnation, are undoubtedly brought to hear the gospel; (y) and when heard, they are caused to believe it, and are made likewise to endure to the end in the faith which works by love; and should they at any time go astray, they are recovered and set right again." A little after he adds, "All these things are wrought in them by that God who made them vessels of mercy, and who, by the election of his grace, chose them, in his Son, before the world began."

Pos. 4. Not one of the elect can perish, but they must all necessarily be saved. The reason is this; because God simply and unchangeably wills that all and every one of those whom he hath appointed to life should be eternally glorified: and, as was observed toward the end of the preceding chapter, all the divine attributes are concerned in the accomplishment of this his will. His wisdom, which cannot err; his knowledge, which cannot be deceived; his truth, which cannot fail; his love, which nothing can alienate; his justice, which cannot condemn any for whom Christ died; his power, which none can resist; and his unchangeableness, which can never vary: from all which it appears that we do not speak at all improperly when we say that the salvation of his people is necessary and certain. Now, that is said to be necessary quod nequit aliter esse which cannot be otherwise than it is: and if all the perfections of God are engaged to preserve and save his children, their safety and salvation must be, in the strictest sense of the word, necessary. See Psalm ciii. 17; and cxxv. 1, 2. Isaiah xlv. 17; and liv. 9, 10. Jer. xxxi. 38; and xxxii. 4c. John vi. 39; and x. 28, 29; and xiv. 19; and xvii. 12. Rom. viii. 30, 38, 39; and xi. 29. 1 Cor. i. 8, 9. Phil. i. 6. 1 Pet. i. 4, 5.

Thus St. Austin (z): "Of those whom God hath predestinated none can perish, inasmuch as they are his own elect." And ib. "They are the elect who are predestinated, foreknown, and called according to purpose.

Now, could any of these be lost, God would be disappointed of his will and expectation; but he cannot be so disappointed: therefore they can never perish. Again, could they be lost, the power of God would be made void by man's sin; but his power is invincible: therefore they are safe. And again, cap. 9, "The children of God are written, with an unshaken stability, in the book of their heavenly Father's remembrance." And in the same chapter he hath these words: "Not the children of promise, but the children of perdition shall perish: for the former are the predestinated, who are called according to the divine determination; not one of whom shall finally miscarry." So likewise Luther (a); "God's decree of predestination is firm and certain; and the necessity resulting from it is in like manner immoveable, and cannot but take place. For we ourselves are so feeble that if the matter was left in our hands very few, or rather none, would be saved: but Satan would overcome us all." To which he adds: "Now, since this stedfast and inevitable purpose of God cannot be reversed nor disannulled by any creature whatever, we have a most assured hope that we shall finally triumph over sin, how violently soever it may at present rage in our mortal bodies."

Pos. 5. The salvation of the elect was not the only, nor yet the principal, end of their being chosen; but God's grand end in appointing them to life and happiness was to display the riches of his own mercy, and that he might be glorified in and by the persons he had thus chosen.

For this reason the elect are styled vessels of mercy; because they were originally created, and afterwards by the divine Spirit created anew with this design, and to this very end, that the sovereignty of the Father's grace, the freeness of his love, and the abundance of his goodness, might be manifested in their eternal happiness. Now God, as we have already more than once had occasion to observe, does nothing in time which he did not from eternity resolve within himself to do; and if he in time creates and regenerates his people with a view to display his unbounded mercy, he must, consequently, have decreed from all eternity to do this with the same view. So that the final causes of election appear to be these two: 1. and principally, the (b) glory of God; 2. and subordinately, the salvation of

(x) De Corrept. et Grat. cap. 7.

(y) We must understand this in a qualified sense, as intending that all those of the elect who live where the Christian dispensation obtains are sooner or later, brought to hear the gospel, and to believe it.

(z) Tom. 7. De Corr. et Grat. 7.

(a) In prefat. ad Epist. ad Rom.

(b) Let it be carefully observed, that when with the Scriptures we assert the glory of God to be the ultimate end of his dealings with angels and men, we do not speak this with respect to his essential glory, which he has as God, and which, as it is infinite, is not susceptible of addition, nor capable of diminution, but of that glory which is purely manifestative, and which Micrologus, in his Lexic. Philosoph. col. 471, defines to be, "Clara rei, cum laude, notitia; cum, nempe, ipsa sua eminentia est magna, augusta et conspicua." And the accurate Mastricht, "Cele-those he has elected, from which the former arises, and by which it is illustrated and set off. So, Prov. xvi. 1. The Lord hath made all things for himself. And hence that of Paul, Eph. i. He hath chosen us—to the praise of the glory of his grace.

Pos. 6. The end of election, which, with regard to the elect themselves, is eternal life: I say this end, and the means conducive to it, such as the gift of the Spirit, faith, &c., are so inseparably connected together that whoever is possessed of these shall surely obtain that, and none can obtain that who are not first possessed of these. Acts xiii. 48. As many as were ordained to eternal life, and none else, believed. Acts v. 31. Him hath God exalted—to give repentance unto Israel and remission of sins: not to all men, or to those who were not, in the counsel and purpose of God, set apart for himself; but to Israel, all his chosen people, who were given to him, were ransomed by him, and shall be saved in him with an everlasting salvation. Tit. i. 1. According to the faith of God's elect; so that true faith is a consequence of election, is peculiar to the elect, and shall issue in life eternal. Eph. i. He hath chosen us that we might be holy; therefore all who are chosen are made holy, and none but they; and all who are sanctified have a right to believe they were elected, and that they shall assuredly be saved. Rom. viii. 30. Whom he did predestinate, them he also called; whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified. Which shews that effectual calling and justification are indissolubly connected with election on the one hand, and eternal happiness on the other; that they are a proof of the former, and an earnest of the latter. John x. 26. Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep; on the contrary, they who believe therefore believe because they are of his sheep. Faith, then, is an evidence of election, or of being in the number of Christ's sheep, consequently, of salvation, since all his sheep shall be saved. John x. 28.

Pos. 7. The elect may, through the grace of God, attain to the knowledge and assurance of their predestination to life; and they ought to seek after it. The Christian may, for instance, argue thus: As many as were ordained to eternal life believed: through mercy I believe; therefore I am ordained to eternal life. He that believeth shall be saved: I believe; therefore I am in a saved state. Whom he did predestinate, he called, justified, and glorified: I have reason to trust that he hath called and justified me; therefore I can assuredly look backward on my eternal predestination, and forward to my certain glorification. To all which frequently accedes the immediate testimony of the divine Spirit, witnessing with the believer's conscience that he is a child of God. Rom. viii. 16. Gal. iv. 6. 1 John v. 10. Christ forbids his little flock to fear, inasmuch as they might, on good and solid grounds, rest satisfied and assured that it is the Father's unalterably good pleasure to give them the kingdom. Luke xii. 32. And this was the faith of the apostle. Rom. viii. 38, 39.

Pos. 8. The true believer ought not only to be thoroughly established in the point of his own election, but should likewise believe the election of all his other fellow believers and brethren in Christ. Now, as there are most evident and indubitable marks of election laid down in Scripture, a child of God, by examining himself whether those marks are found on him, may arrive at a sober and well-grounded certainty of his own particular interest in that unspeakable privilege; and, by the same rule whereby he judges of himself, he may likewise (but with caution) judge of others. If I see the external fruits and criteria of election on this or that man, I may reasonably, and in a judgment of charity, conclude such a one to be an elect person. So St. Paul, beholding the gracious fruits which appeared in the believing Thessalonians, gathered thence that they were elected of God; 1 Thess. i. 4, 5; and knew also the election of the Christian Ephesians; Eph. i. 4, 5; as Peter also did that of the members of the Churches in Pontus, Galatia, &c.; 1 Peter i. 2. It is true, indeed, that all conclusions of this nature are not now infallible, but our judgments are liable to mistake; and God only, whose is the book of life, and who is the searcher of hearts, can absolutely know them that are his; 2 Tim. ii. 19; yet we may, without a presumptuous intrusion into things not seen, arrive at a moral certainty in this matter. And I cannot see how Christian love can be cultivated, how we can call one another brethren in the Lord, or how believers can hold religious fellowship and communion with each other, unless they have some solid and visible reason to conclude that they are loved with the same everlasting love, were redeemed by the same Saviour, are partakers of like grace, and shall reign in the same glory.

But here let me suggest one very necessary caution, viz. that though we may, at least very probably, infer the election of some persons from the marks and appearances of grace which may be discoverable in them, yet we can never judge any man bratio ceu manifestatio (quæ magis propriè glorificatio, quam gloria, appellatur), quæ, agnita intus eminentia, ejusque congrua æstimatio, propalatur et extollitur." Theolog. lib. 2. cap. 22. s. 8 whatever to be a reprobate. That there are reprobate persons is very evident from Scripture, as we shall presently shew; but who they are is known alone to Him who alone can tell who and what men are not written in the Lamb's book of life. I grant that there are some particular persons mentioned in the divine word of whose reprobation no doubt can be made; such as Esau and Judas; but now the canon of Scripture is completed, we dare not, we must not, pronounce any man living to be non-elect, be he at present ever so wicked. The vilest sinner may, for aught we can tell, appertain to the election of grace, and be one day wrought upon by the Spirit of God. This we know, that those who die in unbelief, and are finally unsanctified, cannot be saved, because God, in his word, tells us so, and has represented these as marks of reprobation; but to say that such and such individuals, whom, perhaps, we now see dead in sins, shall never be converted to Christ, would be a most presumptuous assertion, as well as an inexcusable breach of the charity which hopeth all things.

CHAP IV

OF REPROBATION, OR PREDESTINATION AS IT RESPECTS THE UNGODLY.

FROM what has been said in the preceding chapter concerning the election of some, it would unavoidably follow, even supposing the Scriptures had been silent about it, that there must be a rejection of others; as every choice does, most evidently and necessarily, imply a refusal; for where there is no leaving out there can be no choice. But, besides the testimony of reason, the divine word is full and express to our purpose; it frequently, and in terms too clear to be misunderstood, and too strong to be evaded by any who are not proof against the most cogent evidence, attests this tremendous truth, that some are of old fore-ordained to condemnation. I shall, in the discussion of this awful subject, follow the method hitherto observed, and throw what I have to say into several distinct positions, supported by Scripture.

Pos. 1. God did, from all eternity, decree to leave some of Adam's fallen posterity in their sins, and to exclude them from the participation of Christ and his benefits.

For the clearing of this, let it be observed that, in all ages, the much greater part of mankind have been destitute even of the external means of grace; have not been favoured with the preaching of God's word, or any revelation of his will. Thus, anciently the Jews, who were in number the fewest of all people, were, nevertheless, for a long series of ages, the only nation to whom the Deity was pleased to make any special discovery of himself; and it is observable that our Lord himself principally confined the advantages of his public ministry to that people; nay, he forbade his disciples to go among any others, Matt. x. 5, 6.; and did not commission them to preach the gospel indiscriminately to Jews and Gentiles until after his resurrection, Mark xvi. 15.—Luke xxiv. 47. Hence, many nations and communities never had the advantage of hearing the word preached: and, consequently, were strangers to the faith that cometh thereby. It is not, indeed, improbable, but some individuals in these unenlightened countries, might belong to the secret election of grace; and the habit of faith might be wrought in these; however, be that as it will, our argument is not affected by it; it is evident that the nations of the world were generally ignorant not only of God himself, but likewise of the way to please him, the true manner of acceptance with him, and the means of arriving at the everlasting enjoyment of him. Now, if God had been pleased to have saved those people, would he not have vouchsafed them the ordinary means of salvation? would he not have given them all things necessary in order to that end? but it is undeniable matter of fact that he did not; and to very many nations of the earth does not at this day. If, then, the Deity can, consistently with his attributes, deny to some the means of grace, and shut them up in gross darkness and unbelief, why should it be thought incompatible with his immensely glorious perfections to exclude some persons from grace itself, and from that eternal life which is connected with it? especially, seeing he is equally the Lord and sovereign disposer of the end to which the means lead, as of the means which lead to that end? both one and the other are his; and he most justly may, as he most assuredly will, do what he pleases with his own.

Besides, it being also evident that many even of them who live in places where the gospel is preached, as well as of those among whom it never was preached, die strangers to God and holiness, and without experiencing any thing of the gracious influences of his Spirit: we may reasonably and safely conclude that one cause of their so dying is, because it was not the divine will to communicate his grace to them; since, had it been his will he would actually have made them partakers thereof; and had they been partakers of it they could not have died without it. Now if it was the will of God, in time, to refuse them this grace; it must have been his will from eternity; since his will is, as himself, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever

The actions of God being thus fruits of his eternal purpose, we may safely, and without any danger of mistake, argue from them to that; and infer that God therefore does such and such things because he decreed to do them; his own will being the sole cause of all his works. So that from his actually leaving some men in final impenitency and unbelief we assuredly gather that it was his everlasting determination so to do; and consequently that he reprobated some from before the foundation of the world.

And as this inference is strictly rational, so it is perfectly scriptural. Thus, the Judge will, in the last day, declare to those on the left hand, I never knew you. Matt. vii. 23. i. e. "I never, no, not from eternity, loved, approved, or acknowledged you for mine;" or in other words, "I always hated you." Our Lord, in John xvii. divides the whole human race into two great classes; one he calls the world, the other the men who were given him out of the world. The latter, it is said, the Father loved, even as he loved Christ himself (ver. 23); but he loved Christ before the foundation of the world, verse 24., i. e. from everlasting; therefore he loved the elect so too; and if he loved these from eternity, it follows, by all the rules of antithesis, that he hated the others as early. So, Rom. ix., The children not being yet born, neither having done good or evil, that the purpose of God, &c. From the example of the twins, Jacob and Esau, the apostle infers the eternal election of some men, and the eternal rejection of all the rest.

Pos. 2. Some men were, from all eternity, not only negatively excepted from a participation of Christ and his salvation; but positively ordained to continue in their natural blindness, hardness of heart, &c.; and that by the just judgment of God. See Exod. ix. 1 Sam. ii. 25. 2 Sam. xvii. 14. Isa. vi. 9—11. 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12. Nor can these places of Scripture, with many others of like import, be understood of an involuntary permission on the part of God; as if God barely suffered it to be so, quasi invitus, as it were by constraint, and against his will; for he permits nothing which he did not resolve and determine to permit. His permission is a positive, determinate act of his will; as Austin, Luther, and Bucer, justly observe. Therefore, if it be the will of God, in time, to permit such and such men to continue in their natural state of ignorance and corruption, the natural consequence of which is their falling into such and such sins (observe God does not force them into sin; their actual disobedience being only the consequence of their not having that grace which God is not obliged to grant them); I say, if it be the will of God thus to leave them in time (and we must deny demonstration itself, even known, absolute matter of fact, if we deny that some are so left), then it must have been the divine intention, from all eternity, so to leave them; since, as we have already had occasion to observe, no new will can possibly arise in the mind of God. We see that evil men actually are suffered to go on adding sin to sin; and if it be not inconsistent with the sacred attributes actually to permit this, it could not possibly be inconsistent with them to decree that permission before the foundations of the world were laid.

Thus God efficaciously permitted (having so decreed) the Jews to be in effect the crucifiers of Christ; and Judas to betray him; Acts iv. 27, 28. Matt. xxvi. 23, 24. Hence we find St. Austin (c) speaking thus; "Judas was chosen, but it was to do a most execrable deed; that thereby the death of Christ, and the adorable work of redemption by him, might be accomplished. When therefore we hear our Lord say, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? we must understand it thus, that the eleven were chosen in mercy; but Judas in judgment: they were chosen to partake of Christ's kingdom; he was chosen and pitched upon to betray him, and be the means of shedding his blood."

Pos. 3. The non-elect were predestinated not only to continue in final impenitency, sin, and unbelief; but were, likewise, for such their sins, righteously appointed to infernal death hereafter.

This position is also self-evident; for it is certain that, in the day of universal judgment, all the human race will not be admitted into glory, but some of them transmitted to the place of torment. Now, God does, and will do nothing but in consequence of his own decree, Psalm cxxxv. 6. Isa. xlvi. 11. Eph. i. 9, 11; therefore, the condemnation of the unrighteous was decreed of God; and if decreed by him, decreed from everlasting, for all his decrees are eternal. Besides, if God purposed to leave those persons under the guilt and the power of sin, their condemnation must of itself necessarily follow; since without justification and sanctification (neither of which blessings are in the power of man) none can enter heaven, John xiii. 8. Heb. xii. 14. Therefore, if God determined within himself, thus to leave some in their sins (and it is but too evident that this is really the case,) he must also have determined within himself to punish them for those sins (final guilt and final punishment being correlatives which necessarily infer each other); but God did determine both to leave and to punish the non-elect; therefore there was a reprobation of some from eternity. Thus,

Matt. xxv., Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels; for Satan and all his messengers, emissaries, and imitators, whether apostate spirits, or apostate men. Now, if penal fire was, in decree, from everlasting prepared for them, they, by all the laws of argument in the world, must have been, in the counsel of God, prepared, i. e. designed for that fire; which is the point I undertook to prove. Hence we read, Rom. ix., of vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, κατηρτισμενα εις απολειαν, put together, made up, formed, or fashioned, for perdition; who are, and can be, no other than the reprobate. To multiply Scriptures on this head would be almost endless; for a sample, consult Prov. xvi. 4. 1 Pet. ii. 8. 2 Pet. ii. 12. Jude 4. Rev. xiii. 8.

Pos. 4. As the future faith and good works of the elect were not the cause of their being chosen; so neither were the future sins of the reprobate the cause of their being past by; but both the choice of the former, and the decretive omission of the latter, were owing, merely and entirely, to the sovereign will and determining pleasure of God.

We distinguish between preterition, or bare non-election, which is a purely negative thing; and condemnation, or appointment to punishment; the will of God was the cause of the former; the sins of the non-elect are the reason of the latter.— Though God determined to leave, and actually does leave, whom he pleases in the spiritual darkness and death of nature, out of which he is under no obligation to deliver them; yet he does not positively condemn any of these, merely because he hath not chosen them, but because they have sinned against him; see Rom. i. 21—24. Rom. ii. 8. 9. 2 Thess. ii. 12. Their preterition, or non-inscription in the book of life is not unjust on the part of God; because, out of a world of rebels, equally involved in guilt, God (who might, without any impeachment of his justice, have passed by all, as he did the reprobate angels) was most unquestionably at liberty, if it so pleased him, to extend the sceptre of his clemency to some, and to pitch upon whom he would as the objects of it. Nor was this exemption of some any injury to the non-elect; whose case would have been just as bad as it is, even supposing the others had not been chosen at all. Again, the condemnation of the ungodly (for it is under that character alone that they are the subjects of punishment, and were ordained to it) is not unjust, seeing it is for sin, and only for sin. None are or will be punished but for their iniquities; and all iniquity is properly meritorious of punishment; where, then, is the supposed unmercifulness, tyranny, or injustice of the divine procedure?

Pos. 5. God is the creator of the wicked, but not of their wickedness; he is the author of their being, but not the infuser of their sin.

It is, most certainly, his will (for adorable and unsearchable reasons) to permit sin; but, with all possible reverence he it spoken, it should seem that he cannot, consistently with the purity of his nature, the glory of his attributes, and the truth of his declarations, be himself the author of it. Sin, says the apostle, entered into the world by one man, meaning by Adam; consequently it was not introduced by the Deity himself. Though, without the permission of his will, and the concurrence of his providence, its introduction had been impossible; yet is he not hereby the author of sin so introduced. (d) Luther observes (De Serv. Arb. c. 42), “It is a great degree of faith to believe that God is merciful and gracious, though he saves so few, and condemns so many; and that he is strictly just, though in consequence of his own will, he made us not exempt from liability to condemnation.” And cap. 143. “Although God doth not make sin, nevertheless, he ceases not to create and multiply individuals in the human nature which, through the withholding of his Spirit, is corrupted by sin; just as a skilful artist may form curious statues out of bad materials. So, such as their nature is, such are men themselves: God forms them out of such a nature.”

Pos. 6. The condemnation of the reprobate is necessary and inevitable.

Which we prove thus: It is evident from Scripture that the reprobate shall be condemned. But nothing comes to pass (much less can the condemnation of a rational creature), but in consequence of the will and decree of God. Therefore the non-elect could not be condemned, was it not the divine pleasure and determination that they should. And, if God wills and determines their condemnation, that condemna-

(d) It is a known and very just maxim of the schools, effectus sequitur causam proximam: “An effect follows from, and is to be ascribed to, the last immediate cause that produced it.” Thus, for instance, if I hold a book, or a stone in my hand, my holding it is the immediate cause of its not falling; but if I let it go, my letting it go is not the immediate cause of its falling; it is carried downward by its own gravity, which is, therefore, the causa proxima effectus, the proper and immediate cause of its descent. It is true, if I had kept my hold of it, it would not have fallen; yet still the immediate, direct cause of its fall is its own weight not my quitting my hold. The application of this to the providence of God as concerned in sinful events is easy. Without God there could have been no creation; without creation, no creatures; without creatures, no sin. Yet is not sin chargeable on God: for effectus sequitur causam proximam.

tion is necessary and inevitable. By their sins they have made themselves guilty of death: and, as it is not the will of God to pardon those sins and grant them repentance unto life, the punishment of such impenitent sinners is as unavoidable as it is just. It is our Lord's own declaration, Matt. vii. that a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit: or, in other words, that a depraved sinner cannot produce in himself those gracious habits, nor exert those gracious acts, without which no adult person can be saved. Consequently the reprobate must, as corrupt, fruitless trees (or fruitful in evil only), be hewn down and cast into the fire, Matt. iii. This therefore serves as another argument in proof of the inevitability of their future punishment: which argument, in brief, amounts to this: They who are not saved from sin must unavoidably perish: but the reprobate are not saved from sin, (for they have neither will nor power to save themselves, and God, though he certainly can, yet he certainly will not save them): therefore their perdition is unavoidable. Nor does it follow hence that God forces the reprobate into sin, and thereby into misery, against their wills; but that in consequence of their natural depravity (which it is not the divine pleasure to deliver them out of, neither is he bound to do it, nor are they themselves so much as desirous that he would), they are voluntarily biassed and inclined to evil: nay, which is worse still, they hug and value their spiritual chains, and even greedily pursue the paths of sin, which lead to the chambers of death. Thus, God does not (as we are slanderously reported to affirm) compel the wicked to sin, as the rider spurs forward an unwilling horse; God only says in effect that tremendous word, Let them alone, Matt. xv. 14. He needs but slacken the reins of providential restraint, and withhold the influence of saving grace; and apostate man will too soon, and too surely, of his own accord, fall by his iniquity: he will presently be, spiritually speaking, a felo de se, and without any other efficiency, lay violent hands on his own soul. So that though the condemnation of the reprobate is unavoidable, yet the necessity of it is so far from making them mere machines or involuntary agents, that it does not in the least interfere with the rational freedom of their wills, nor serve to render them less inexcusable.

Pos. 7. The punishment of the non-elect was not the ultimate end of their creation; but the glory of God.

It is frequently objected to us that, according to our view of predestination, "God makes some persons on purpose to damn them." But this we never advanced: nay, we utterly reject it, as equally unworthy of God to do, and of a rational being to suppose. The grand principal end proposed by the Deity to himself in his formation of all things, and of mankind in particular, was, The manifestation and display of his own glorious attributes. His ultimate scope in the creation of the elect is to evidence and make known, by their salvation, the unsearchable riches of his power and wisdom, mercy and love: and the creation of the non-elect is for the display of his justice, power, sovereignty, holiness and truth. So that nothing can be more certain than the declaration of the text we have frequently had occasion to cite, Prov. xvi. The Lord hath made all things for himself, even the wicked for the day of evil. On one hand, the vessels of wrath are fitted for destruction, in order that God may shew his wrath, and make his power known, and manifest the greatness of his patience and long suffering, Rom. ix. 32. On the other hand, he afore prepared the elect to salvation, that on them he might demonstrate the riches of his glory and mercy, verse 23. As therefore God himself is the sole author and efficient of all his own actions; so is he likewise the supreme end to which they lead, and in which they terminate.

Besides, the creation and perdition of the ungodly answer another purpose (though a subordinate one), with regard to the elect themselves, who from the rejection of those, learn 1. to admire the riches of divine love towards themselves, which planned, and has accomplished, the work of their salvation, while others, by nature on an equal level with them, are excluded from a participation of the same benefits. And such a view of the Lord's distinguishing mercy is, 2. a most powerful motive to thankfulness, that when they too might justly have been condemned with the world of the non-elect, they were marked out as heirs of the grace of life. 3. Hereby they are taught ardently to love their heavenly Father; 4. to trust in him assuredly for a continued supply of grace while they are on earth, and for the accomplishment of his eternal decree and promise, by their glorification in heaven; and 5. to live as becomes those who have received such unspeakable mercies from the hand of their God and Saviour. So Bucer somewhere observes, that the punishment of the reprobate "is useful to the elect; inasmuch as it influences them to a greater fear and abhorrence of sin, and to a firmer reliance on the goodness of God."

Pos. 8. Notwithstanding God did, from all eternity, irreversibly choose out and fix upon some to be partakers of salvation by Christ, and rejected the rest (who are therefore termed by the apostle, οι λοιποι, the refuse, or those that remained and were left out); acting in both according to the good pleasure of his own sovereign will: yet he die not herein act an unjust, tyrannical, or cruel part; nor yet shew himself a respecter of persons.

1. He is not unjust in reprobating some: neither can he be so; for the Lord is holy in all his ways, and righteous in all his works, Psalm cxlv. But salvation and damnation are works of his: consequently, neither of them is unrighteous or unholy. It is undoubted matter of fact that the Father draws some men to Christ, and saves them in him with an everlasting salvation; and that he neither draws nor saves some others; and, if it be not unjust in God actually to forbear saving these persons after they are born, it could not be unjust in him to determine as much before they were born. What is not unjust for God to do in time, could not, by parity of argument, be unjust in him to resolve upon and decree from eternity. And surely if the apostle's illustration be allowed to have any propriety, or to carry any authority, it can no more be unjust in God to set apart some for communion with himself in this life and the next, and to set aside others according to his own free pleasure, than for a potter to make out of the same mass of clay some vessels for honourable, and others for inferior uses. The Deity, being absolute Lord of all his creatures, is accountable to none for his doings, and cannot be chargeable with injustice for disposing of his own as he will.

Nor, 2. is the decree of reprobation a tyrannical one. It is indeed strictly sovereign; but lawful sovereignty and lawless tyranny are as really distinct and different as any two opposites can be. He is a tyrant, in the common acceptation of that word, who 1. either usurps the sovereign authority, and arrogates to himself a dominion to which he has no right: or, 2. who being originally a lawful prince abuses his power and governs contrary to law. But who dares to lay either of these accusations to the Divine charge? God, as Creator, has a most unquestionable and unlimited right over the souls and bodies of men; unless it can be supposed, contrary to all Scripture and common sense that, in making of man, he made a set of beings superior to himself, and exempt from his jurisdiction. Taking it for granted therefore that God has an absolute right of sovereignty over his creatures; if he should be pleased (as the Scriptures repeatedly assure us that he is) to manifest and display that right by graciously saving some, and justly punishing others for their sins—Who are we, that we should reply against God?

Neither does the ever blessed Deity fall under the second notion of a tyrant; namely, as one who abuses his power, by acting contrary to law: for by what exterior law is he bound who is the supreme Lawgiver of all the universe? The laws, promulgated by him, are designed for the rule of our conduct, not of his. Should it be objected that "his own attributes of goodness and justice, holiness and truth, are a law to himself;" I answer that, admitting this to be the case, there is nothing in the decree of reprobation as represented in Scripture, and by us thence, which clashes with any of those perfections. With regard to the divine goodness, though the non-elect are not objects of it, in the sense the elect are, yet even they are not wholly excluded from a participation of it. They enjoy the good things of providence, in common with God's children, and very often in a much higher degree. Besides, goodness, considered as it is in God, would have been just the same infinite and glorious attribute, supposing no rational beings had been created at all, or saved when created. To which may be added that the goodness of the Deity does not cease to be infinite in itself only because it is more extended to some objects than it is to others. The infinity of this perfection, as residing in God and coinciding with his essence, is sufficiently secured without supposing it to reach, indiscriminately, to all the creatures he has made. For was this way of reasoning to be admitted, it would lead us too far, and prove too much: since, if the infinity of his goodness is to be estimated by the number of objects upon which it terminates, there would be an absolute, proper infinity of reasonable beings, to terminate that goodness upon; consequently, it would follow, from such premises, either that the creation is as truly infinite as the Creator; or, if otherwise, that the Creator's goodness could not be infinite, because it has not an infinity of objects to make happy. (e) Lastly, if it was not incompatible with God's infinite goodness to pass by the

(e) The late most learned and judicious Mr. Charnock has, in my judgment at least, proved most clearly and satisfactorily that the exclusion of some individual persons from a participation of saving grace, is perfectly consistent with God's unlimited goodness. He observes that "The goodness of the Deity is infinite, and circumscribed by no limits. The exercise of his goodness may be limited by himself, but his goodness, the principle, cannot: for since his essence is infinite, and his goodness is not distinguished from his essence, it is infinite also. God is necessarily good in his nature, but free in his communications of it. He is necessarily good affective, in regard of his nature; but freely good effective, in regard to the effluxes of it to this or that particular subject he pitcheth upon. He is not necessarily communicative of his goodness as the sun of its light, or a tree of its cooling shade, which chooses not its objects, but enlightens all indifferently without variation or distinction; this were to make God of no more understanding than the sun, which shines, not where it pleases, but where it must. He is an understanding agent, and hath a sovereign right to choose his own subjects. It would not be supreme, if it were not a voluntary goodness. It is agreeable to the nature of the highest good to be whole body of fallen angels, and leave them under the guilt of their apostacy, much less can it clash with that attribute, to pass by some of fallen mankind, and resolve to leave them in their sins, and punish them for them. Nor is it inconsistent with the divine justice to withhold saving grace from some; seeing the grace of God is not what he owes to any. It is a free gift to those that have it; and is not due to those that are without it: consequently there can be no injustice in not giving what God is not bound to bestow.

There is no end of cavilling at the divine dispensations, if men are disposed to do it. We might, with equality of reason, when our hand is in, presume to charge the Deity with partiality for not making all his creatures angels, because it was in his power to do so, as charge him with injustice for not electing all mankind. Besides, how can it possibly be subversive of his justice to condemn, and resolve to condemn, the non-elect for their sins; when those very sins were not atoned for by Christ as the sins of the elect were? His justice, in this case, is so far from hindering the condemnation of the reprobate that it renders it necessary and indispensable. Again, is the decree of sovereign preterition, and of just condemnation for sin, repugnant to the divine holiness? not in the least: so far from it, that it does not appear how the Deity could be holy, if he did not hate sin, and punish it. Neither is it contrary to his truth and veracity. Quite the reverse. For would not the divine veracity fall to the ground if the finally wicked were not condemned?

3. God, in the reprobation of some, does not act a cruel part. Whoever accused a chief magistrate of cruelty for not sparing a company of atrocious malefactors, and for letting the sentence of the law take place upon them by their execution? If, indeed, the magistrate please to pity some of them, and remit their penalty, we applaud his clemency; but the punishment of the rest is no impeachment of his mercy. Now with regard to God, his mercy is free and voluntary. He may extend it to, and withhold it from, whom he pleases, Rom. ix. 15, 18, and it is sad indeed if we will not allow the Sovereign, the all-wise Governor of heaven and earth, the same privilege and liberty we allow to a supreme magistrate below.

Nor, 4. is God, in choosing some and rejecting others, a respecter of persons. He only comes under that title who, on account of parentage, country, dignity, wealth, or for any other (f) external con-absolutely free; and to dispense his goodness in what methods and measures he pleases, according to the free determinations of his own will, guided by the wisdom of his mind, and regulated by the holiness of his nature. He will be good to whom he will be good. When he doth act he cannot but act well; so far it is necessary: yet he may act this good or that good, to this or that degree: so it is free: As it is the perfection of his nature, it is necessary; as it is the communication of his bounty, it is voluntary. The eye cannot but see if it be open: yet it may glance on this or that colour, fix upon this or that object, as it is conducted by the will. What necessity could there be on God to resolve to communicate his goodness [at all]? It could not be to make himself better by it; for he had [before] a goodness incapable of any addition. What obligation could there be from the creature? Whatever sparks of goodness any creature hath are the free effusions of God's bounty, the offspring of his own inclination to do well, the simple favour of the donor. God is as unconstrained in his liberty, in all his communications, as [he is] infinite in his goodness, the fountain of them." Charnock's Works, vol. i. p. 583, &c. With whom agrees the excellent Dr. Bates (surnamed, for his eloquence, the silver tongued); and who, if he had a silver tongue had likewise a golden pen: "God," says he, "is a wise and free agent; and as he is infinite in goodness, so the exercise of it is voluntary, and only so far as he pleases." Harm. of Div. Attrib. chap. 3.

(f) προσωποληψια, persone acceptio, quum magis huic favemus, quam illi, ob circumstantiam aliquam, seu qualitatem, externam, et adherentem; puta genus, dignitatem, opes, patriam, &c. Scapula, in voc.

So that elegant, accurate, and learned Dutch divine, Laeventius; Hæc vero [i. e. προσωποληψια] est, quando persona persone præfertur ex causa indeclitâ: puta, si judex absolvat reum, vel quia dives est, vel quia est potens, vel quia magistratus est, vel quia amicus et propinquus est, &c. "That is respect of persons, when one man is preferred to another on some sinister and undue account; as when a judge acquits a criminal, merely because he is rich, or powerful, or is his friend, or relation, &c." Comment. in Epist. Jacob. p. 92.

Now, in the matter of election and preterition, God is influenced by no such motives; nor, indeed, by any exterior inducement, or any motive, extra se, out of himself. He does not, for instance, condemn any persons on account of their poverty; but on the reverse, hath chosen many, who are poor in this world, Jam. ii. 5. Nor does he condemn any for being rich; for some, even of the mighty and noble, are called by his grace. 1 Cor. i. 26. He does not respect any man's parentage, or country; for the elect will be gathered together from the four winds, from under one end of heaven to the other, Matt. xxiv. 31; and he hath redeemed to himself a select number, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, Rev. v. 9; and vii. 9. So far is God from being in any sense, a respecter of persons, that, in Christ Jesus, there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, Gal. iii. 28. He does not receive one, nor reject another, merely for coming or not coming under any of these characters. His own sovereign will and not their external or internal circumstances, was the sole rule by which he proceeded, in appointing some to salvation, and decreeing to leave others in their sins: so that God is not, herein, a respecter of their persons, but a respecter of himself, and his own glory.

And as God is no respecter of persons, because he chooses some as objects of his favour, and omits others; all being on a perfect equality: so neither does it follow that he is such, from his actually conferring spiritual and eternal blessings on the former, and denying them to the latter: Seeing these blessings are absolutely his own, and which he may, therefore, without injustice, give, or not give, at his pleasure. Dr. Whitby himself, though so strenuous an adversary to every thing that looks like predestination, yet he very justly observes (and such a concession, from such a pen, merits the reader's attention), Locum non habet [scil. προσωποληψια] in bonis mere liberis et gratuitis; neque in sideration, shews more favour to one person than to another. But that is not the case with God. He considers all men as sinners by nature; and has compassion not on persons of this or that sect, country, sex, age, or station in life, because they are so circumstanced, but on whom, and because, he will have compassion. Pertinent to the present purpose is that passage of St. Austin: (g) "Forasmuch as some people imagine that they must look on God as a respecter of persons if they believe that, without any respect had to the previous merits of men, he hath mercy on whom he will, and calls whom it is his pleasure to call, and makes good whom he pleases. The scrupulousness of such people arises from their not duly attending to this one thing, namely, that damnation is rendered to the wicked, as a matter of debt, justice, and desert; whereas the grace, given to those who are delivered, is free and unmerited: so that the condemned sinner cannot allege that he is unworthy of his punishment; nor the saint vaunt or boast, as if he was worthy of his reward. Thus, in the whole course of this procedure, there is no respect of persons. They who are condemned, and they who are set at liberty, constituted originally one and the same lump, equally infected with sin and liable to vengeance. Hence the justified may learn, from the condemnation of the rest, that would have been their own punishments, had not God's free grace stepped in to their rescue."

Before I conclude this head, I will obviate a fallacious objection very common in the mouths of our opponents: "How," say they, "is the doctrine of reprobation reconcilable with the doctrine of a future judgment?" To which I answer that there need no pains to reconcile these two, since they are so far from interfering with each other, that one follows from the other, and the former renders the latter absolutely necessary. Before the judgment of the great day, Christ does not so much act as the Judge of his creatures as their absolute Lord and Sovereign. From the first creation, to the final consummation of all things, he does in consequence of his own eternal and immutable purpose (as a divine person) graciously work in and on his own elect, and permissively harden the reprobate.—But, when all the transactions of providence and grace are wound up in the last day, he will then properly sit as Judge; and openly publish, and solemnly ratify, if I may so say, his everlasting decrees, by receiving the elect, body and soul, into glory, and by passing sentence on the non-elect (not for their having done what they could not help, but) for their wilful ignorance of divine things, and their obstinate unbelief; for their omissions of moral duty, and for their repeated iniquities and transgressions.

Pos. 9. Notwithstanding God's predestination is most certain and unalterable, so that no elect person can perish, nor any reprobate be saved, yet it does not follow thence that all precepts, reproofs, and exhortations on the part of God, or prayers on the part of man, are useless, vain, and insignificant.

1. These are not useless with regard to the elect, for they are necessary means of bringing them to the knowledge of the truth at first, afterwards of stirring up their pure minds by way of remembrance, and of edifying and establishing them in faith, love, and holiness. Hence that of St. Austin: (h) "The commandment will tell thee, O man, what thou oughtest to have; reproof will shew thee wherein thou art wanting; and praying will teach thee from whom thou iis in quibus unum alteri præferre, nostri arbitrii aut privilegii est. Ethic. Compend. l. 2. c. 5. sect. 9. i. e. "the bestowing" [and consequently, the withholding] "of such benefits as are merely gratuitous and undeserved, does not argue respect of persons; neither is it respect of persons to prefer one before another, when we have a right, and it is our pleasure so to do." I shall only add the testimony of Thomas Aquinas; a man of some genius, and much application; who, though in very many things a laborious trifler, was yet, on some subjects, a clear reasoner and judicious writer. His words are, "Duplex est datio; una quidem pertinens ad iustitiam; quæ scilicet, aliquis dat alicui quod ei debetur: et circa tales dationes attenditur personarum acceptio. Alia est datio ad liberalitatem pertinens; quæ scilicet, gratis datur alicui quod ei non debetur. Et talis est collatio munerum gratiæ, per quæ peccatores assumuntur a Deo. Et, in hac donatione, non habet locum personarum acceptio; quia quilibet, absque iniustitia, potest de suo dare quantum vult, et cui vult: secundum illud. Matt. xx. Annon licet mihi, quod volo, facere? tolle quod tuum est et vade." i. e. "There is a two-fold rendering or giving: the one a matter of justice, whereby that is paid to a man which was due to him. Here it is possible for us to act partially, with respect of persons:"

[Thus, for example's sake, I owe money to two men, one of whom is rich, the other poor; and I pay the rich man because he has it in his power to sue me, but defraud the other, because of his inability to do himself justice; I should be a respecter of persons. But, as Aquinas goes on] "There is a second kind of rendering or giving, which is a branch of mere bounty and liberality, by which that is freely bestowed on any man which was not due to him: such are the gifts of grace, whereby sinners are received of God. In the bestowment of grace, respect of persons is absolutely out of the question: because every one may, and can, without the least shadow of injustice, give as much of his own as he will, and to whom he will: according to that passage in Matt. xx. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will [with my own]? take up that which is thine and go thy way." Aquin. Summ. Theol. 2—2dæ Qu. 63. A. 1.

On the whole, it is evident that respect of persons can only have place in matters of justice, and is but another name for perversion of justice: consequently, it has nothing to do with matters of mere goodness and bounty, as all the blessings of grace and salvation are.

(g) Tom. 2. Epist. 105. ad Sixtum Presb.

(h) De Corrupt. et Grat. chap. 3.

must receive the supplies which thou wantest." Nor, 2. are these vain with regard to the reprobate; for precept, reproof, and exhortation may, if duly attended to, be a means of making them careful to adjust their moral, external conduct according to the rules of decency, justice, and regularity, and thereby prevent much inconvenience to themselves and injury to society. And as for prayer, it is the duty of all, without exception. Every created being (whether elect or reprobate matters not as to this point) is, as such, dependent on the Creator for all things; and, if dependent, ought to have recourse to him, both in a way of supplication and thanksgiving.

But to come closer still. That absolute predestination does not set aside nor render superfluous the use of preaching, exhortation, &c., we prove from the examples of Christ himself and his apostles, who all taught and insisted upon the article of predestination, and yet took every opportunity of preaching to sinners, and enforced their ministry with proper rebukes, invitations, and exhortations, as occasion required.— Though they shewed unanswerably that salvation is the free gift of God, and lies entirely at his sovereign disposal; that men can, of themselves, do nothing spiritually good; and that it is God who, of his own pleasure, works in them both to will and to do; yet they did not neglect to address their auditors as beings possessed of reason and conscience, nor omitted to remind them of their duties as such, but shewed them their sin and danger by nature, and laid before them the appointed way and method of salvation, as exhibited in the gospel. Our Saviour himself expressly and in terminis assures us, that no man can come to him except the Father draw him; and yet he says, Come unto me all ye that labour, &c. St. Peter, in the 2d of Acts, told the Jews that they had fulfilled the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God in putting the Messiah to death, and yet sharply rebukes them for it. St. Paul declares, It is not of him that wilth, nor of him that runneth; and yet exhorts the Corinthians so to run as to obtain the prize. He assures us, Rom viii., that we know not what to pray for as we ought; and yet, 1 Thess. v., directs us to pray without ceasing. He avers, 1 Tim. ii., that the foundation or decree of the Lord standeth sure; and yet cautions him, who thinks he stands, to take heed lest he fall. St. James, in like manner, says, that every good and perfect gift cometh down from above; and yet exhorts those who want wisdom to ask it of God. So, then, all these being means whereby the elect are frequently enlightened into the knowledge of Christ, and by which they are, after they have believed through grace, built up in him, and are means of their perseverance in grace to the end; these are so far from being vain and insignificant that they are highly useful and necessary, and answer many valuable and important ends, without in the least shaking the doctrine of predestination in particular, or the analogy of faith in general. Thus St. Austin: (i) "We must preach, we must reprove, we must pray, because they to whom grace is given will hear and act accordingly; though they to whom grace is not given will do neither."

CHAP. V.

SHEWING THAT THE SCRIPTURE DOCTRINE OF PREDESTINATION SHOULD BE OPENLY PREACHED AND INSISTED ON; AND FOR WHAT REASONS.

UPON the whole, it is evident that the doctrine of God's eternal and unchangeable predestination should neither be wholly suppressed and laid aside, nor yet be confined to the disquisition of the learned and speculative only, but likewise should be publicly taught from the pulpit and the press, that even the meanest of the people may not be ignorant of a truth which reflects such glory on God, and is the very foundation of happiness to man. Let it, however, be preached with judgment and discretion; i. e. delivered by the preacher as it is delivered in Scripture, and no otherwise. By which means it can neither be abused to licentiousness, nor misapprehended to despair; but will eminently conduce to the knowledge, establishment, improvement, and comfort of them that hear. That predestination ought to be preached I thus prove:

I. The gospel is to be preached, and that not partially and by piece-meal, but the whole of it. The commission runs, Go forth and preach the gospel; the gospel itself, even all the gospel, without exception or limitation, for, so far as the gospel is maimed, or any branch of the evangelical system is suppressed and passed over in silence, so far the gospel is not preached. Besides, there is scarce any other distinguishing doctrine of the gospel can be preached in its purity and consistency without this of predestination. Election is the golden thread that runs through the whole Christian system; it is the leaven that pervades the whole lump. Cicero says of the various parts of human learning, "Omnes artes, quæ ad humanitatem pertinent, habent quoddam commune vinculum, et quasi cognatione quiddam inter se continentur: i. e. "The whole circle of arts have a kind of mutual bond and connection; and, by a sort of reciprocal relationship, are held together and interwoven with each other." Much the same may be said of this important doctrine: it is the bond which connects and keeps together the whole Christian system, which, without this, is like a system of sand, ever ready to fall to pieces. It is the cement which holds the fabric together; nay, it is the very soul that animates the whole frame. It is so blended and interwoven with the entire scheme of gospel doctrine, that when the former is excluded, the latter bleeds to death. An ambassador is to deliver the whole message with which he is charged. He is to omit no part of it, but must declare the mind of the sovereign he represents fully and without reserve. He is to say neither more nor less than the instructions of his court require. Else he comes under displeasure; perhaps loses his head. Let the ministers of Christ weigh this well.

(i) De Bon. Persev. cap. 14.

Nor is the gospel to be preached only, but preached to every creature; i. e. to reasonable beings promiscuously and at large; to all who frequent the Christian ministry, of every state and condition of life, whether high or low, young or old, learned or illiterate. All who attend on the ministrations of Christ's ambassadors have a right to hear the gospel fully, clearly, and without mincing. Preach it, says Christ, Mark xvi. 15, κηρυσσατε, publish it abroad; be its criers and heralds; proclaim it aloud; tell it out; keep back no part of it; spare not; lift up your voices like trumpets. Now a very considerable branch of this gospel is the doctrine of God's eternal, free, absolute, and irreversible election of some persons in Christ to everlasting life. The saints were singled out in God's eternal purpose and choice, ut crederent, to be ended with faith, and thereby fitted for their destined salvation. By their interest in the gratuitous, unalienable love of the blessed Trinity, they come to be, subjectively, saints and believers; so that their whole salvation, from the first plan of it in the divine mind, to the consummation of it in glory, is at once a matter of mere grace and of absolute certainty. While they who die without faith and holiness prove thereby that they are not included in this elect number, and were not written in the book of life. The justice of God's procedure herein is unquestionable. Out of a corrupt mass, wherein not one was better than another, he might (as was observed before) love and choose whom and as many as he pleased. It was likewise, without any shadow of injustice, at his option whom and how many he would pass by. His not choosing them was the fruit of his sovereign will; but his condemning them after death and in the last day is the fruit (not of their non-election, which was no fault of theirs, but) of their own positive transgressions. The elect, therefore, have the utmost reason to love and glorify God which any beings can possibly have; and the sense of what he has done for them is the strongest motive to obedience. On the other hand, the reprobates have nothing to complain of, since whatever God does is just and right; and so it will appear to be (however darkly matters may appear to us now) when we see him as he is, and know him even as we are known.

And now, why should not this doctrine be preached and insisted upon in public? a doctrine which is of express revelation; a doctrine that makes wholly for the glory of God; which conduces, in a most peculiar manner, to the conversion, comfort, and sanctification, of the elect, and leaves even the ungodly themselves without excuse!

But perhaps you may still be inclined to question whether predestination be indeed a Scripture doctrine. If so, let me, by way of sample, beg you to consider the following declarations: 1. of Christ; 2. of his apostles.

Matt. xi. If the mighty works that have been done in thee had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented, &c.; whence it is evident that the Tyrians and Sidonians, at least the majority of them, died in a state of impenitency; but that if God had given them the same means of grace afforded to Israel they would not have died impenitent: yet those means were not granted them. How can this be accounted for? only on the single principle of peremptory predestination flowing from the sovereign will of God. No wonder, then, that our Lord concludes that chapter with these remarkable words: I thank thee, Holy Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. Where Christ thanks the Father for doing that very thing which Arminians exclaim against as unjust, and censure as partial!

Matt. xiii. To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given.

Matt. xx. 23. To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, αλλ' ος ητοιμασαι υπο του πατρος μου, except to them for whom it hath been prepared by my Father: q. d. Salvation is not a precarious thing: the seats in glory were disposed of long ago in my Father's intention and des-tion: I can only assign them to such persons as they were prepared for in his decree.

Matt. xxii. Many are called, but few chosen: i. e. All who live under the sound of the gospel will not be saved; but those only who are elected unto life.

Matt. xxiv. For the elect's sake those days shall be shortened, and ibid. If it were possible, they should deceive the very elect: where it is plain Christ teaches two things; 1. That there is a certain number of persons who are elected to grace and glory; and, 2. That it is absolutely impossible for these to be deceived into total or final apostacy.

Matt. xxv. Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.

Mark xi. Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God; but to them that are without, i. e. out of the pale of election, all these things are done in parables; that, seeing, they may see, and not perceive; and, hearing, they may hear, and not understand: lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them.

Luke x. Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven

Luke xii. It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.

Luke xvii. One shall be taken and the other shall be left.

John vi. All that the Father hath given me shall come unto me: as much as to say, These shall, but the rest cannot.

John viii. He that is of God heareth God's words; ye therefore hear them not because ye are not of God; nor chosen of him.

John x. Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep.

John xv. Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you.

I come now, 2. to the apostles.

John xii. 37, 40. They believed not on him, that the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled which he spake; Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? Therefore they could not believe, because Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their hearts, and be converted, and I should heal them. Without certain prescience there could be no prophecy; and without predestination no certain prescience. Therefore, in order to the accomplishment of prophecy, prescience, and predestination, we are expressly told that these persons could not believe οικηδυνατο, they were not able; it was out of their power. In short, there is hardly a page in St. John's gospel which does not, either expressly or implicitly, make mention of election and reprobation.

St. Peter says of Judas, Acts i. Men and brethren, the Scriptures must needs have been fulfilled which the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, spake before concerning Judas. So, verse xxv. That he might go to his own place: to the place of punishment appointed for him.

Acts. ii. Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and with wicked hands have crucified and slain.

Acts iv. Herod and Pontius Pilate, and the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done; προωρισε γενεσθαι, predestinated should come to pass.

Acts xiii. And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed: τεταγμενοι, designed, destined, or appointed unto life.

Concerning the apostle Paul what shall I say? every one that has read his Epistles knows that they teem with predestination from beginning to end. (k) I shall only give one or two passages: and begin with that famous chain, Rom. viii., whom he did fore-know (or fore-love, for to know often signifies in Scripture to love) he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren: that as in all things else, so in the business of election, Christ might have the pre-eminence; he being first chosen as a Saviour, and they in him to be saved by him: moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

The 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of the same Epistle are professed dissertations on, and illustrations of, the doctrine of God's decrees; and contain likewise a solution of the principal objections brought against that doctrine.

Gal. i. Who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace.

The first chapter of Ephesians treats of little else but election and predestination.

(k) A friend of mine, who has a large property in Ireland, was conversing one day with a popish tenant of his upon religion. Among other points, they discussed the practice of having public prayers in an unknown tongue. My friend took down a New Testament from his book-case, and read part of 1 Cor. xiv. When he had finished, the poor, zealous papist rose up from his chair and said with great vehemence, "I verily believe St. Paul was a heretic."

Can the person who carefully reads the epistles of this great apostle doubt of his having been a thorough-paced predestinarian?

2 Thes. ii. After observing that the reprobates perish wilfully, the apostle, by a striking transition, addresses himself to the elect Thessalonians, saying: But we are bound to give thanks unto God always for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.

2 Tim. i. Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ before the world began.

St. Jude, on the other hand, describes the reprobate as ungodly men, who were of old fore-ordained to this condemnation.

Another apostle makes this peremptory declaration; Who stumble at the word, being disobedient, whereunto also they were appointed; but ye are a chosen generation [γενος εκλεκτον, an elect race], a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, λαος εις περιποιησιν, a people purchased to be his peculiar property and possession, 1 Pet. ii. 8, 9. To all which may be added, Rev. xvii. 8. Whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world.

All these texts are but as a handful to the harvest: and yet are both numerous and weighty enough to decide the point with any who pay the least deference to Scripture authority. And let it be observed that Christ and his apostles delivered these matters, not to some privileged persons only, but to all at large who had ears to hear, and eyes to read. Therefore it is incumbent on every faithful minister to tread in their steps by doing likewise: nor is that minister a faithful one, faithful to Christ, to truth, and to souls, who keeps back any part of the counsel of God, and buries those doctrines in silence which he is commanded to preach upon the house tops.

The great St. Austin, in his valuable treatise De Bono Persever., effectually obviates the objections of those who are for burying the doctrine of predestination in silence. He shews that it ought to be publicly taught; describes the necessity and usefulness of preaching it; points out the manner of doing it to edification. And, since some persons have condemned St. Austin, by bell, book, and candle, for his steadfast attachment to, and nervous successful defences of, the decrees of God, let us hear what Luther, that great light in the Church, thought respecting the argument before us.

Erasmus (in most other respects a very excellent man) affected to think that it was of dangerous consequence to propagate the doctrine of predestination, either by preaching or writing. His words are these: "What can be more useless than to publish this paradox to the world? namely, that whatever we do is done, not by virtue of our own free will, but in a way of necessity, &c. What a wide gap does the publication of this tenet open among men for the commission of all ungodliness! What wicked person will reform his life? Who will dare to believe himself a favourite of heaven? Who will fight against his own corrupt inclinations? Therefore, where is either the need or the utility of spreading these notions, whence so many evils seem to flow?"

To which Luther replies: "If, my Erasmus, you consider these paradoxes (as you term them) to be no more than the inventions of men, why are you so extravagantly heated on the occasion? In that case, your arguments affect not me: for there is no person now living in the world who is a more avowed enemy to the doctrines of men than myself. But, if you believe the doctrines in debate between us to be (as indeed they are) the doctrines of God, you must have bid adieu to all sense of shame and decency thus to oppose them. I will not ask, Whither is the modesty of Erasmus fled? but, which is much more important, where, alas! are your fear and reverence of the Deity, when you roundly declare that this branch of truth, which he has revealed from heaven, is, at best, useless and unnecessary to be known? What! shall the glorious Creator be taught by you his creature what is fit to be preached, and what to be suppressed? Is the adorable God so very defective in wisdom and prudence as not to know, till you instruct him, what would be useful and what pernicious? Or could not He, whose understanding is infinite, foresee previous to his revelation of this doctrine, what would be the consequences of his revealing it, until those consequences were pointed out by you? You cannot, you dare not, say this. If, then, it was the divine pleasure to make known these things in his word, and to bid his messengers publish them abroad, and leave the consequences of their so doing to the wisdom and providence of him in whose name they speak, and whose message they declare; who art thou, O Erasmus, that thou shouldst reply against God, and say to the Almighty, What doest thou? St. Paul, discoursing of God, declares peremptorily, Whom he will he hardeneth: and again, God, willing to shew his wrath, &c. And the apostle did not write this to have it stifled among a few persons, and buried in a corner; but wrote it to the Christians at Rome: which was in effect bringing this doctrine upon the stage of the whole world; stamping an universal imprimatur upon it; and publishing it to believers at large throughout the earth. — What can sound harsher in the uncircumcised ears of carnal men than those words of Christ, Many are called but few chosen? and elsewhere, I know whom I have chosen? Now these and similar assertions of Christ and his apostles are the very positions which you, O Erasmus, brand as useless and hurtful. You object, If these things are so, who will endeavour to amend his life? I answer; Without the Holy Ghost, no man can amend his life to purpose. Reformation is but varnished hypocrisy, unless it proceed from grace. The elect and truly pious are amended by the Spirit of God; and those of mankind who are not amended by him will perish.—You ask moreover, Who will dare to believe himself a favourite of heaven? I answer; It is not in man's own power to believe himself such upon just grounds until he is enabled from above: but the elect shall be so enabled: they shall believe themselves to be what indeed they are. As for the rest, who are not endued with faith, they shall perish; raging and blaspheming as you do now. But, say you, these doctrines open a door to ungodliness. I answer; Whatever door they may open to the impious and profane, yet they open a door of righteousness to the elect and holy, and shew them the way to heaven, and the path of access unto God. Yet you would have us abstain from the mention of these grand doctrines, and leave our people in the dark as to their election of God: the consequence of which would be that every man would bolster himself up with a delusive hope of share in that salvation which is supposed to lie open to all; and thus genuine humility, and the practical fear of God, would be kicked out of doors. This would be a pretty way indeed of stopping up the gap Erasmus complains of! Instead of closing up the door of licentiousness, as is falsely pretended, it would be, in fact, opening a gulph into the nethermost hell. Still you urge, Where is either the necessity or utility of preaching predestination? God himself teaches it, and commands us to teach it: and that is answer enough. We are not to arraign the Deity, and bring the motives of his will to the test of human scrutiny: but simply to revere both him and it. He who alone is all-wise and all-just can in reality (however things appear to us) do wrong to no man; neither can he do any thing unwisely or rashly. And this consideration will suffice to silence all the objections of truly religious persons. However, let us, for argument's sake, go a step farther. I will venture to assign, over and above, two very important reasons why these doctrines should be publicly taught: 1. For the humiliation of our pride, and the manifestation of divine grace. God hath assuredly promised his favour to the truly humble. By truly humble I mean those who are en-dued with repentance, and despair of saving themselves: for a man can never be said to be really penitent and humble until he is made to know that his salvation is not suspended in any measure whatever on his own strength, machinations, endeavours, free-will or works; but entirely depends on the free pleasure, purpose, determination, and efficiency of another; even of God alone. Whilst a man is persuaded that he has it in his power to contribute any thing, be it ever so little, to his own salvation, he remains in carnal confidence; he is not a self-despairer, and therefore he is not duly humbled before God: so far from it, that he hopes some favourable juncture or opportunity will offer, when he may be able to lend a helping hand to the business of his salvation.—On the contrary, whoever is truly convinced that the whole work depends singly and absolutely on the will of God, who alone is the author and finisher of salvation; such a person despairs of all self-assistance: he renounces his own will and his own strength; he waits and prays for the operation of God; nor waits and prays in vain. For the elect's sake, therefore, these doctrines are to be preached: that the chosen of God being humbled by the knowledge of his truths, self-emptied, and sunk as it were into nothing in his presence, may be saved in Christ with eternal glory. This, then, is one inducement to the publication of the doctrine; that the penitent may be made acquainted with the promise of grace, plead it in prayer to God, and receive it as their own. 2. The nature of the Christian faith requires it. Faith has to do with things not seen.—And this is one of the highest degrees of faith, steadfastly to believe that God is infinitely merciful, though he saves (comparatively) but few, and condemns so many; and that he is strictly just, though of his own will he makes such numbers of mankind necessarily liable to damnation. Now, these are some of the unseen things whereof faith is the evidence. Whereas, was it in my power to comprehend them, or clearly to make out how God is both inviolably just and infinitely merciful, notwithstanding the display of wrath and seeming inequality in his dispensations respecting the reprobate, faith would have little or nothing to do. But now, since these matters cannot be adequately comprehended by us in the present state of imperfection, there is room for the exercise of faith. The truths, therefore, respecting predestination in all its branches should be taught and published: they, no less than the other mysteries of Christian doctrine, being proper objects of faith on the part of God's people." (l)

With Luther the excellent Bucer agrees,

particularly on Eph. i. where his words are, "There are some who affirm that election is not to be mentioned publicly to the people. But they judge wrongly. The blessings which God bestows on man are not to be suppressed, but insisted and enlarged upon; and, if so, surely the blessing of predestination unto life, which is the greatest blessing of all, should not be passed over." And a little after he adds, "Take away the remembrance and consideration of our election, and then, good God! what weapons have we left us wherewith to resist the temptations of Satan? As often as he assaults our faith (which he is frequently doing), we must constantly, and without delay, have recourse to our election in Christ as to a city of refuge. Meditation upon the Father's appointment of us to eternal life is the best antidote against the evil surmisings of doubtfulness and remaining unbelief. If we are entirely void of all hope and assurance respecting our interest in this capital privilege, what solid and comfortable expectation can we entertain of future blessedness? How can we look upon God as our gracious Father, and upon Christ as our unchangeable Redeemer? without which I see not how we can ever truly love God; and if we have no true love towards him, how can we yield acceptable obedience to him? Therefore those persons are not to be heard who would have the doctrine of election laid (as it were) asleep, and seldom or never make its appearance in the congregations of the faithful."

To what these great men have so nervously advanced, permit me to add, that the doctrine of predestination is not only useful, but absolutely necessary to be taught and known. For,

1. Without it we cannot form just and becoming ideas of God. Thus, unless he certainly foreknows and foreknew from everlasting all things that should come to pass, his understanding would not be infinite; and a Deity of limited understanding is no Deity at all. Again, we cannot suppose him to have foreknown any thing which he had not previously decreed, without setting up a series of causes, extra Deum, and making the Deity dependent for a great part of the knowledge he has upon the will and works of his creatures, and upon a combination of circumstances exterior to himself. Therefore his determinate plan, counsel, and purpose (i. e. his own predestination of causes and effects), is the only basis of his foreknowledge; which foreknowledge could neither be certain nor independent, but as founded on his own antecedent decree. 2. He alone is entitled to the name of True God who governs all things, and without whose will

(either efficient or permissive) nothing is or can be done. And such is the God of the Scriptures, against whose will not a sparrow can die, nor a hair fall from our heads; Matt. x. Now what is predestination but the determining will of God? I defy the subtlest semi-pelagian in the world to form or convey a just and worthy notion of the Supreme Being without admitting him to be the great cause of all causes else, himself dependent on none; who willed from eternity how he would act in time, and settled a regular, determinate scheme of what he would do and permit to be done from the beginning to the consummation of the world. A contrary view of the Deity is as inconsistent with reason itself, and with the very religion of nature, as it is with the decisions of revelation. Nor can we rationally conceive of an independent, all-perfect first Cause, without allowing him to be, 3. unchangeable in his purposes. His decrees and his essence coincide; consequently a change in those would infer an alteration in this. Nor can that being be the true God whose will is variable, fluctuating, and indeterminate; for his will is himself willing. A Deity without decrees, and decrees without immutability, are, of all inventions that ever entered the heart of man, the most absurd. 4. Without predestination to plan, and without providence to put that plan in execution, what becomes of God's omnipotence? It vanishes into air. It become a mere nonentity. For what sort of omnipotence is that which may be baffled and defeated by the very creatures it has made? Very different is the idea of this attribute suggested by the Psalmist, Psalm cxiii. Whatsoever the Lord willed, that did he; in heaven and in earth, in the sea and in all deep places: i. e. he not only made them when he would, but orders them when made. 5. He alone is the true God, according to Scripture representation, who saves, by his mere mercy and voluntary grace, those whom he hath chosen; and righteously condemns (for their sins) those whom he thought fit to pass by. But without predestination there could be no such thing, either as sovereign mercy or voluntary grace. For, after all, what is predestination but his decree to save some of his mere goodness, and to condemn others in his just judgment? Now it is most evident that the Scripture doctrine of predetermination is the clearest mirror wherein to see and contemplate these essential attributes of God. Here they all shine forth in their fulness of harmony and lustre. Deny predestination, and you deny (though, perhaps, not intentionally, yet by necessary consequence) the adorable perfections of the Godhead: in concealing that, you throw a veil over these; and in preaching that, you hold up these to the comfort, the establishment, and the admiration, of the believing world.

II. Predestination is to be preached, because the grace of God (which stands opposed to all human worthiness) cannot be maintained without it. The excellent St. Austin makes use of this very argument. "If," says he, "these two privileges" [namely, faith itself, and final perseverance in faith] "are the gifts of God; and if God foreknew on whom he would bestow these gifts, (and who can doubt of so evident a truth?) it is necessary for predestination to be preached, as the sure and invincible bulwark of that true grace of God which is given to men without any consideration of merit." (m) Thus argued St. Austin against the Pelagians, who taught that grace is offered to all men alike; that God, for his part, equally wills the salvation of all; and that it is in the power of man's free-will to accept or reject the grace and salvation so offered. Which string of errors do, as Austin justly observes, centre in this grand point: gratiam secundam nostra merita dari; that God's grace is not free, but the fruit of man's desert. Now the doctrine of predestination batters down this delusive Babel of free-will and merit. It teaches us that if we do indeed will and desire to lay hold on Christ and salvation by him, this will and desire are the effect of God's secret purpose and effectual operation; for he it is who worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure, that he that glorieth should glory in the Lord. There neither is nor can be any medium between predestinating grace and salvation by human merit. We must believe and preach one or the other, for they can never stand together. No attempts to mingle and reconcile these two incompatible opposites can ever succeed, the apostle himself being judge: If, says he, it [namely, election] be by grace, then is it no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace; but if it be of works, then is it no more grace, otherwise work is no more work; Rom. xi. 6. Exactly agreeable to which is that of St. Austin: "Either predestination is to be preached as expressly as the Scriptures deliver it, viz. That with regard to those whom he hath chosen, the gifts and callings of God are without repentance; or we must roundly declare, as the Pelagians do, that grace is given according to merit." (n) Most certain it is that the doctrine of gratuitous justification through Christ can only be supported on that of our gratuitous predestination in Christ, since the latter is the cause and foundation of the former.

III. By the preaching of predestination man is duly humbled, and God alone is exalted; human pride is levelled, and the divine glory shines untarnished, because unrivalled. This the sacred writers positively declare. Let St. Paul be spokesman for the rest (Eph. i. 5, 6.) having predestinated us—to the praise of the glory of his grace. But how is it possible for us to render unto God the praises due to the glory of his grace without laying this threefold foundation? 1. That whosoever are or shall be saved are saved by his alone grace in Christ, in consequence of his eternal purpose, passed before they had done any one good thing. 2. That what good thing soever is begun to be wrought in our souls (whether it be illumination of the understanding, rectitude of will, or purity of affections) was begun altogether of God alone, by whose invincible agency grace is at first conferred, afterwards maintained, and finally crowned. 3. That the work of internal salvation (the sweet and certain prelude to eternal glory) was not only begun in us of his mere grace alone, but that its continuance, its progress, and increase, are no less free and totally unmerited than its first original donation. Grace alone makes the elect gracious; grace alone keeps them gracious; and the same grace alone will render them everlastingly glorious in the heaven of heavens.

Conversion and salvation must, in the very nature of things, be wrought and effected, either by ourselves alone, or by ourselves and God together, or solely by God himself. The Pelagians were for the first. The Arminians are for the second. True believers are for the last; because the last hypothesis, and that only, is built on the strongest evidence of Scripture, reason, and experience. It most effectually hides pride from man, and sets the crown of undivided praise upon the head, or rather casts it at the feet, of that glorious tri-une God who worketh all in all. But this is a crown which no sinners ever yet cast before the throne of God who were not first led into the transporting views of his gracious decree to save, freely, and of his own will, the people of his eternal love. Exclude, therefore, O Christian, the article of sovereign predestination from thy ministry or from thy faith, and acquit thyself, if thou art able, from the charge of robbing God.

When God does, by the omnipotent exertion of his Spirit, effectually call any of mankind in time to the actual knowledge of himself in Christ; when he likewise goes on to sanctify the sinners he has called, making them to excel in all good works, and to persevere in the love and resemblance of

(m) De Bono Persever. cap. 21.

(n) De Bono Persever. cap. 16.

God to their lives' end; the observing part of the unawakened world may be apt to conclude that these converted persons might receive such measure of grace from God because of some previous qualifications, good dispositions, or pious desires and internal preparations discovered in them by the all-seeing Eye; which, if true, would indeed transfer the praise from the Creator, and consign it to the creature. But the doctrine of predestination—absolute, free, unconditional predestination—here steps in, and gives God his own. It lays the axe to the root of human boasting, and cuts down (for which reason the natural man hates it) every legal, every independent, every self-righteous imagination that would exalt itself against the grace of God and the glory of Christ. It tells us that God hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in his Son, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, in order to our being afterwards made holy and blameless before him in love: Eph. i. Of course whatever truly and spiritually good thing is found in any person, it is the special gift and work of God, given and wrought in consequence of eternal, unmerited election to grace and glory. Whence the greatest saint cannot triumph over the most abandoned sinner, but is led to refer the entire praise of his salvation, both from sin and hell, to the mere good will and sovereign purpose of God, who hath graciously made him to differ from that world which lieth in wickedness. Such being the tendency of this blessed doctrine, how injurious, both to God and man, would the suppression of it be! Well does St. Austin argue: "As the duties of piety ought to be preached up, that he who hath ears to hear may be instructed how to worship God aright; and as chastity should be publicly recommended and enforced, that he who hath ears to hear may know how to possess himself in sanctification; and as charity, moreover, should be inculcated from the pulpit, that he who hath ears to hear may be excited to the ardent love of God and his neighbour; in like manner should God's predestination of his favours be openly preached, that he who hath ears to hear may learn to glory, not in himself, but in the Lord." (o)

IV. Predestination should be publicly taught and insisted upon in order to confirm and strengthen true believers in the certainty and confidence of their salvation. (p) For when regenerate persons are told, and are enabled to believe, that the glorification of the elect is so assuredly fixed in God's eternal purpose that it is impossible for any of them to perish, and when the regenerate are led to consider themselves as actually belonging to this elect body of Christ, what can establish, strengthen, and settle their faith like this? Nor is such a faith presumptuous; for every converted man may and ought to conclude himself elected, since God the Spirit renews those only who were chosen by God the Father and redeemed by God the Son. This is a hope which maketh not ashamed, nor can possibly issue in disappointment, if entertained by those into whose hearts the love of God is poured forth by the Holy Ghost given unto them, Rom. v. 5.

The holy triumph and assurance resulting from this blessed view are expressly warranted by the apostle, Rom. viii., where he deduces effectual calling from a prior predestination, and infers the certainty of final salvation from effectual calling: whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified. How naturally, from such premises, does the apostle add, Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Who and where is he that condemneth them? Who and what shall separate us from the love of Christ? In all these things we are and shall be more than conquerors through him that hath loved us; for I am persuaded [πεπεισμαι, (q) I am most clearly and assuredly confident] that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. So elsewhere: The foundation of the Lord, i. e. his decree or purpose, according to election, standeth sure, having this seal: The Lord knoweth them that are his; which is particularly noted by the apostle, lest true believers might be discouraged, and begin to doubt of their own certain perseverance to salvation, either from a sense of their remaining imperfections, or from observing the open apostacy of unregenerate professors; 2 Tim. ii. How little obliged, therefore, are the flock of Christ to those persons who would, by stifling the mention of predestination, expunge the sense and certainty of everlasting blessedness from the list of Christian privileges!

V. Without the doctrine of predestination we cannot enjoy a lively sight and ex-

(p) Our venerable reformers, in the 17th of our XXXIX Articles, make the very same observation, and nearly in the same words:—"The godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of everlasting salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, &c."

perience of God's special love and mercy towards us in Christ Jesus. Blessings not peculiar, but conferred indiscriminately on every man, without distinction or exception, would neither be a proof of peculiar love in the donor, nor calculated to excite peculiar wonder and gratitude in the receiver. For instance, rain from heaven, though an invaluable benefit, is not considered as an argument of God's special and peculiar favour to some individuals above others; and why? because it falls on all alike; as much on the rude wilderness and the barren rock as on the cultivated garden and the fruitful field. But the blessing of election, somewhat like the Sibylline books, rises in value proportionably to the fewness of its objects. So that when we recollect that, in the view of God (to whom all things are at once present), the whole mass of mankind was considered as justly liable to condemnation, on account of original and actual iniquity, his selecting some individuals from among the rest, and graciously setting them apart in Christ for salvation both from sin and punishment, were such acts of sovereign goodness as exhibit the exceeding greatness and the entire freeness of his love in the most awful, amiable, and humbling light. In order, then, that the special grace of God may shine, predestination must be preached, even the eternal and immutable predestination of his people to faith and everlasting life. "From those who are left under the power of guilt," says St. Austin, "the person who is delivered from it may learn what he too must have suffered had not grace stepped in to his relief. And if it was grace that interposed, it could not be the reward of man's merit, but the free gift of God's gratuitous goodness. Some, however, call it unjust for one to be delivered while another, though no more guilty than the former, is condemned: if it be just to punish one, it would be but justice to punish both. I grant that both might have been justly punished. Let us, therefore, give thanks unto God our Saviour for not inflicting that vengeance on us which, from the condemnation of our fellow-sinners, we may conclude to have been our desert no less than theirs. Had they, as well as we, been ransomed from their captivity, we could have framed but little conception of the penal wrath due, in strictness of justice, to sin; and, on the other hand, had none of the fallen race been ransomed and set at liberty, how could divine grace have displayed the riches of its liberality?" (r) The same evangelical Father delivers himself elsewhere to the same effect: "Hence," says he, "appears the greatness of that grace by which so many are freed from condemnation; and they may form some idea of the misery due to themselves from the dreadfulness of the punishment that awaits the rest. Whence those who rejoice are taught to rejoice, not in their own merits (quæ paria esse vident damnatis, for they see that they have no more merit than the damned), but in the Lord." (s) Hence results,

VI. Another reason, nearly connected with the former, for the unreserved publication of this doctrine: viz. That from a sense of God's peculiar, eternal, and unalterable love to his people, their hearts may be enflamed to love him in return. Slender indeed will be my motives to the love of God, on the supposition that my love to him is before hand with his to me; and that the very continuance of his favour is suspended on the weather-cock of my variable will, or the flimsy thread of my imperfect affection. Such a precarious, dependent love were unworthy of God; and calculated to produce but a scanty and cold reciprocation of love from man. At the happiest of times, and in the best of frames below, our love to God is but a spark (though small and quivering, yet inestimably precious, because divinely kindled, fanned and maintained in the soul; and an earnest of better to come); whereas, love as it glows in God, is an immense sun which shone without beginning, and shall shine without end. Is it probable then, that the spark of human love should give being to the sun of divine? and that the lustre and warmth of this should depend on the glimmering of that? yet so it must be if predestination is not true; and so must be represented, if predestination is not taught.—Would you therefore know what it is to love God as your Father, Friend, and Saviour; you must fall down before his electing mercy. Until then, you are only hovering about in quest of true felicity. But you will never find the door, much less can you enter into rest, until you are enabled to love him because he hath first loved you, 1 John iv. 19.

This being the case, it is evident that, without taking predestination into the account, genuine morality and the performance of truly good works will suffer, starve, and die away. Love to God is the very fuel of acceptable obedience. Withdraw the fuel, and the flame expires. But the fuel of holy affection (if Scripture, experience, and observation are allowed to carry any conviction) can only be cherished, maintained, and increased in the heart by the sense and apprehension of God's predestinating love to us in Christ Jesus. Now our obedience to God will always hold proportion to our love. If the one be relaxed and feeble, the other cannot be alert and vigorous. And electing goodness being the very life and soul of the former, the latter, even good works, must flourish or decline, in proportion as election is glorified or obscured. Hence arises a VIIIth argument for the preaching of predestination: namely, that by it we may be excited to the practice of universal godliness. The knowledge of God's love to you will make you an ardent lover of God: and the more love you have to God, the more will you excel in all the duties and offices of love. Add to this, that the Scripture view of predestination includes the means as well as the end. Christian predestinarians are for keeping together what God hath joined. He who is for attaining the end without going to it through the means, is a self-deluding enthusiast. He, on the other hand, who carefully and conscientiously uses the means of salvation, as steps to the end, is the true Calvinist.—Now eternal life being that to which the elect are ultimately destined; faith (the effect of saving grace), and sanctification (the effect of faith), are blessings to which the elect are intermediately appointed.—According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love, Eph. i. 4. We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained, that we should walk in them; Eph. ii. 10.—Knowing, brethren, beloved, your election of God:—Ye became followers of us and of the Lord, 1 Thess. i. 4, 6.—God hath chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth. 2 Thess. ii. 13—Elect, according to the foreknowledge [or ancient love] of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, 1 Pet. i. 2.

(r) Epist. 105, ad Sixt. Presb.

(s) De Predest. Sanctior. lib. 1. cap. 9.

Nor is salvation (the appointed end of election) at all the less secure in itself (but the more so) for standing necessarily connected with the intervening means; seeing, both these and that are inseparably joined, in order to the certain accomplishment of that through these. It only demonstrates that, without regeneration of heart and purity of life, the elect themselves are not led to heaven. But then it is incontestible, from the whole current of Scripture, that these intermediate blessings shall most infallibly be vouchsafed to every elect person, in virtue of God's absolute covenant, and through the effectual agency of his almighty Spirit. Internal sanctification constitutes our meetness for the kingdom to which we were predestinated; and a course of external righteousness is one of the grand evidences by which we make our election sure to our own present comfort and apprehension of it. (†)

VIII. Unless predestination be preached, we shall want one great inducement to the exercise of brotherly kindness and charity. When a converted person is assured, on one hand, that all whom God hath predestinated to eternal life shall infallibly enjoy that eternal life to which they were chosen; and, on the other hand, when he discerns the signs of election, not only in himself, but also in the rest of his fellow-believers; and concludes, thence (as in a judgment of charity, he ought), that they are as really elected as himself; how must his heart glow with love to his Christian brethren! How feelingly will he sympathize with them in their distresses! how tenderly will he bear with their infirmities! how readily will he relieve the former, and how easily overlook the latter!—Nothing will so effectually knit together the hearts of God's people in time as the belief of their having been written, by name, in one book of life from everlasting: and the unshaken confidence of their future exaltation to one and the same state of glory above will occasion the strongest cement of affection below.—This was, possibly, one end of our Saviour's so frequently reminding his apostles of their election: namely, that from the sense of such an unspeakable blessing, in which they were all equally interested, they might learn to love one another with pure hearts, fervently: and cultivate on earth that holy friendship which they well knew, from the immutability of God's decrees, would be eternally matured to the highest perfection and refinement in heaven.—St. Paul, likewise, might have some respect to the same amiable inference when, treating of the saints collectively, he uses those sweet and endearing expressions, he hath chosen us; he hath predestinated us, &c. that believers, considering themselves as συνεκλεκτοι, or co-elect in Christ, might be led to love each other with peculiar intensity, as the spiritual children of one electing Father, brethren in grace, and joint-heirs of glory.—Did the regenerate of the present age but practically advert to the everlasting nearness in which they stand related to each other, how happy would be the effect!

Hence it appears, that since the preaching of predestination is thus evidently calculated to kindle and keep alive the twofold congenial flame, of love to God and love to man, it must, by necessary consequence, conduce,

To the advancement of universal obedience, and to the performance of every social and religious duty (u): which alone, was there nothing else to recommend it, would be a sufficient motive to the public delivery of that important doctrine.

IX. Lastly, without a due sense of predestination, we shall want the surest and the most powerful inducement to patience, resignation, and dependence on God, under every spiritual and temporal affliction.

How sweet must the following consideration be to a distressed believer! 1. There most certainly exists an almighty, all-wise, and infinitely gracious God.—2. He has given me in times past, and is giving me at present (if I had but eyes to see it), many and signal intimations of his love to me, both in a way of providence and grace.—3. This love of his is immutable: He never repents of it, nor withdraws it.—4. Whatever comes to pass, in time, is the result of his will from everlasting—Consequently, 5. My afflictions were a part of his original plan, and are all ordered, in number, weight and measure. 6. The very hairs of my head are every one counted by him; nor can a single hair fall to the ground but in consequence of his determination. Hence, 7. My distresses are not the result of chance, accident, or a fortuitous combination of circumstances: but, 8. The providential accomplishment of God's purpose: and, 9. Designed to answer some wise and gracious ends. Nor, 10. shall my affliction continue a moment longer than God sees meet. 11: He who brought me to it has promised to support me under it, and to carry me through it. 12. All shall most assuredly, work together for his glory and my good. Therefore, 13. The cup which my heavenly Father hath given me to drink, shall I not drink it? Yes: I will, in the strength he imparts, even rejoice in tribulation; and, using the means of possible redress which he hath, or may hereafter put into my hands, I will commit myself and the event to him, whose purpose cannot be overthrown, whose plan cannot be disconcerted, and who, whether I am resigned or not, will still go on to work all things after the counsel of his own will. (x)

Above all, when the suffering Christian takes his election into the account, and knows that he was, by an eternal and im-

(u) Our excellent bishop Davenant instances particularly in the great religious duty of prayer. "The consideration of election," says this learned and evangelical prelate, "doth stir up the faithful to constancy in prayer: for, having learnt that all good tending to salvation is prepared for them out of God's good pleasure; they are hereby encouraged to call for, and, as it were, to draw down from heaven, by their prayers: those good things which from eternity were ordained for the elect. Moreover, the same Spirit of adoption, who beareth witness to our spirit, that we are God's chosen children, is also the Spirit of prayer and supplication, and enflameth our hearts to call daily upon our heavenly Father. Those, therefore, who, from the certainty of predestination, do pretend that the duty of prayer is superfluous, do plainly shew that they are so far from having any certainty of their predestination, that they have not the least sense thereof. To be slack and sluggish in prayer is not the property of those who, by the testimony of God's Spirit, have got assurance of their election: but rather of such as have either none, or very small, apprehension thereof. For, as soon as any one, by believing, doth conceive himself to be one of God's elect children, he earnestly desireth to procure unto himself, by prayer, those good things which he believeth that God prepared for his children before the foundation of the world." Bp. Davenant's Animadversions on an Arminian treatise, entitled God's Love to Mankind, p. 526, and seq.

(x) The learned Lipsius thus writes to an unmarried friend, who appears to have referred himself to his judgment and direction: "Sive uxor ducitur, sive omittitur, &c. Whether you marry or live single, you will still have something or other to molest you: nor does the whole course of man's present sublunary life afford him a single draught of joy without a mixture of wormwood in the cup. This is the universal and immutable law: which to resist were no less vain than sinful and rebellious. As the wrestlers of old had their respective antagonists assigned them, not by their own choice, but by necessary lot; in like manner each of the human race has his peculiar destiny allotted to him by Providence. To conquer this is to endure it. All our strength in this warfare is to undergo the inevitable pressure. It is victory to yield ourselves to fate." Lips. Epist. miscell. cent. l. ep. 43. opr. tom. 2. p. 54. edit. Vesaliens. 1675.

About two years after, this celebrated Christian Seneca wrote, as follows, to the same person (Theodore Leewius) who had married, and just lost his wife in childbed: "Jam fatum quid? aeterna, ah aeterno, in aeternum, Dei Lex: what is fate? God's everlasting ordinance, settled in eternity, and for eternity: an ordinance which he can never repeal, disannul, or set aside, either in whole or in part. Now, if this his decree be eternal, à retro, and immovable, quoad futurum; why does foolish man struggle and fight against that which must be? Especially seeing fate is thus the offspring of God, why does impious man murmur and complain? you cannot justly find fault with any thing determined or done by him, as though it were evil or severe: for he is all goodness and benevolence. Were you to define his nature, you could not do it more suitably than in those terms: is, therefore, your wife dead? debuit, it is right she should be so. But was it right that she should die, and at that very time, and by that very kind of death? Most certainly. Lex ita lata: the decree so ordained it. The restless acumen of the human mind may sift and canvass the appointments of fate; but cannot alter them. Were we truly wise, we should be implicitly submissive, and endure with willingness what we must endure whether we be willing or not. A due sense of our inability to reverse the disposals of Providence, and the consequent vanity of resisting them, would administer solid repose to our minds, and sheathe, if not remove, the anguish of affliction. And why should we even wish to resist? Fate's supreme ordainer is not only the all-wise God, but an all-gracious Father. Embrace every event as good and prosperous: though it may, for the present, carry an aspect of the reverse. Think you not that he loves and careth for us more and better than we for ourselves? But, as the tenderest parent below doth oftentimes cross the inclinations of his children, with a view to do them good; and obliges them both to do and to undergo many things against the bent of their wills; so does the great Parent of all." Iud. epist. 61. p. 82.

mutable act of God, appointed to obtain salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ; that, of course, he hath a city prepared for him above, a building of God, a house not made with hands, but eternal in the heavens; and that the heaviest sufferings of the present life are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in the saints; what adversity can possibly befall us which the assured hope of blessings like these will not infinitely overbalance?

"A comfort so divine,
May trials well endure."

However keenly afflictions might wound us on their first access, yet under the impression of such animating views we should quickly come to ourselves again, and the arrows of tribulation would, in great measure, become pointless. Christians want nothing but absolute resignation to render them perfectly happy in every possible circumstance; and absolute resignation can only flow from an absolute belief of, and an absolute acquiescence in, God's absolute providence, founded on absolute predestination. The apostle himself draws these conclusions to our hand in Rom. viii., where, after having laid down as most undoubted axioms the eternity and immutability of God's purposes, he thus winds up the whole: "What shall we say, then, to these things? if God be for us, who can be against us? Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay: in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us."

Such, therefore, among others, being the uses that arise from the faithful preaching and the cordial reception of predestination, may we not venture to affirm, with Luther, hæc ignoratâ doctrinâ, neque fidem, neque ullum Dei cultum, consistere posse? that "Our faith and all right worship of God depend, in no small degree, upon our knowledge of that doctrine?" (y)

The excellent Melancthon, in his first Common Places (which received the sanction of Luther's express approbation), does, in the first chapter, which treats professedly of free-will and predestination, set out with clearing and establishing the doctrine of God's decrees, and then proceeds to point out the necessity and manifold usefulness of asserting and believing it. He even goes so far as to affirm roundly that "a right fear of God, and a true confidence in him, can be learned more assuredly from no other source than from the doctrine of predestination." But Melancthon's judgment of these matters will best appear from the whole passage, which the reader will find in the book and chapter just referred to.

"Divina predestinatio," says he, "libertatem homini admittit: Divine predestination quite strips man of his boasted liberty; for all things come to pass according to God's fore-appointment, even the internal thoughts of all creatures, no less than their external works. Therefore, Eph. i. the apostle gives us to understand that God performeth all things according to the counsel of his own will. And our Lord himself asks, Matt. x. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? yet one of them falleth not to the ground without your Father. Pray, what can be more full to the point than such a declaration? So Solomon, Prov. xvi., The Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil. And in the xxth chap., Man's goings are of the Lord: how then can a man understand his own way? To which the prophet Jeremiah does also set his seal, saying, chapter x., O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his own steps. The historical part of Scripture teaches us the same great truth. So, Gen. xv., we read that the iniquity of the Amorites was not yet full. In 1 Sam. ii. we are told that Eli's sons hearkened not to his reproof, because the Lord would slay them. What could bear a stronger resemblance to chance and accident than Saul's calling upon Samuel only with a view to seek out his father's asses? 1 Sam. ix. Yet the visit was fore-ordained of God, and designed to answer a purpose little thought of by Saul; 1 Sam. ix. 15, 16." [See also a most remarkable chain of predestinated events in reference to Saul, and foretold by the prophet, 1 Sam. x. 2, 8.] "In pursuance of the divine pre-ordination, there went with Saul a band of men whose hearts God had touched, 1 Sam. x. 26.—The harshness of king Rehoboam's answer to the ten tribes, and the subsequent revolt of those tribes from his dominion, are, by the sacred historian, expressly ascribed to God's decree: wherefore the king hearkened not unto the people; for the cause was from the Lord, that he might perform his saying which the Lord spake by Ahijah, the Shilonite, unto Jeroboam, the son of Nebat; 1 Kings xii. 15.—What is the drift of the apostle Paul in the 9th and 11th of Romans, quæ ut omnia, quæ fiunt, in destinationem divinam referat? but to resolve all things that come to pass into God's destination? the judgment of the flesh, or of mere unregenerate reason, usually starts back from this truth with horror; but, on the contrary, the judgment of a spiritual man will embrace it with affection. Neque enim vel timorem Dei, vel fiduciam in Deum, certius aliunde discas, quam ubi imbueris animum hęc de predestinatione sententię: You will not learn, either the fear of God, or affiance in him, from a surer source than from getting your mind deeply tinctured and seasoned with this doctrine of predestination. Does not Solomon, in the book of Proverbs, inculcate it throughout, and justly? for how else could he direct men to fear God and trust in him? the same he does in the Book of Ecclesiastes: nor had any thing so powerful a tendency to repress the pride of man's encroaching reason, and to lower the swelling conceit of his supposed discretion, as the firm belief, quod a Deo fiunt omnia that all things are from God. What invincible comfort did Christ impart to his disciples, in assuring them that their very hairs were all numbered by the Creator? Is there, then (may an objector say), no such thing as contingency? no such thing as chance, or fortune?—No. Omnia necessarię evenire scripturę docent; the doctrine of scripture is that all things come to pass necessarily. Be it so, that to you some events seem to happen contingently: you, nevertheless, must not be run away with by the suggestions of your own narrow-sighted reason. Solomon himself, the wisest of men, was so deeply versed in the doctrine of inscrutable predestination, as to leave this humbling maxim on record: When I applied my heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth; then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because, though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find; yea, further, though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it. Ecclesiastes viii. 16, 17."

Melancthon prosecutes the argument much farther: but this may suffice for a specimen. And it is not unworthy of notice that Luther so highly approved of Melancthon's performance, and especially of the first chapter (whence the above extract is given), that he [Luther] thus writes of it, in his Epistle to Erasmus, prefixed to his book, De Serv. Arb. "That it was worthy of everlasting duration and to be received into the ecclesiastical canon." Let it likewise be farther observed, that Melancthon never, to the very last, retracted a single word of what he there delivers; which a person of his decided piety and known integrity would most certainly have done, had he afterwards (as some have most artfully and falsely insinuated) found any reason to change his judgment on these heads.

APPENDIX

CONCERNING THE

FATE OF THE ANCIENTS. (z)

FATE (says Apuleius), according to Plato, is that, "Per quod inevitabiles cogitationes Dei atque incepta complentur"; whereby the purposes and designs of God are accomplished. Hence the Platonics considered providence under a three-fold distinction: 1. The Providentia prima, or that which gave birth to all effects; and is defined by them to be του παρωτου Θεου νοησις, the intention, or will of the supreme God. 2. The Providentia secunda, or actual agency of the secondary or inferior beings, who were supposed to pervade the heavens, and thence, by their influence, to regulate and dispose of all sublunary things; and especially to prevent the extinction of any one species below. 3. The Providentia tertia, supposed to be exerted by the Genii, whose office it was to exercise a particular care over mankind; to guard our persons, and direct our actions.

But the Stoical view of providence, or fate, was abundantly more simple, and required no such nicety of distinction. These philosophers did at once derive all the chain of causes and effects from their true and undoubted source, the will of the one living and true God. Hence, with these sages, the words Deity, Fate, Providence, were frequently reciprocated, as terms synonymous. Thus Seneca, speaking of God; "Will you call him Fate? You will call him rightly: for all things are suspended on him. Himself is causa causarum, the cause of all causes beside." The laws of the universe are from God; whence the same philosopher elsewhere observes, "Omnia certę et in æternum dictę lege decurrere"; all things go on according to a certain rule or decree, ordained for ever;" meaning the law of fate. So Cicero: "All things come to pass, according to the sovereignty of the eternal law." And Pindar probably had an eye to this where he says, Νομου παρωτων βασιλευς, Συκτων τε και αθανατων ειναι. That the law ruleth all, whether gods or mortals. Manlius most certainly had:

Sed nihil in totā magis est mirabile mole.

Quam ratio, et certis quod legibus omnia parent.

Where, by ratio is evidently meant the decreeing mind of God: and by leges is meant Fate, or that series of causes and effects which is the offspring of his decree.

Homer cannot begin his Iliad without asserting this grand truth:—Διος δ' ετελειετο βουλη. The counsel or decree of Jupiter was fulfilled. The divine poet sets out on this exalted principle: he puts it in front of the noblest poem in the world, as a testimony both of his wisdom and his faith. It was as if he had said, "I shall sing of numberless events, equally grand, entertaining and important: but I cannot begin to unfold them without laying down this as a first fundamental axiom, That, though brought to pass by the instrumental agency of men, they were the fruit of God's determining will, and of his all-directing providence."

Neither are those minuter events, which seemingly are the result of chance, excluded from this law. Even these do not happen, but come to pass in a regular order of succession, and at their due period of time. "Causa pendet ex causâ privata ac publica longus ordo rerum trahit." says Seneca; "Cause proceeds from cause: the long train of things draws with it all events both public and private." Excellent is that of Sophocles; (Aj. Flagell). "I am firmly of opinion that all these things, and whatever else befall us, are in consequence of the divine purpose: who so thinks otherwise is at liberty to follow his own judgment; but this will ever be mine."

The Longus ordo rerum, mentioned by Seneca, is what he elsewhere styles, Causarum implexa series, or a perpetual implication of causes. This, according to Laertius, was called by the Stoics, αἰτία τῶν ὄντων ἐφορμῆν, an involved, or concatenate causality of whatever has any existence; for ἐφορμῆς is a chain, or implicate connection. Agreeably to this idea, Chrysippus gives the following definition of fate: "Fate is that natural established order and constitution of all things from everlasting; whereby they mutually follow upon each other, in consequence of an immutable and perpetual complication."

Let us examine this celebrated definition of fate. 1. He calls it a natural ἀνταίτις, meaning by nature, the great natura prima, or God: for, by some Stoics, God and nature are used promiscuously. But because the Deity must be supposed both to decree and to act with wisdom, intelligence and design, fate is sometimes mentioned by them under the name of Λόγος, or reason. Thus they define fate (Laert. in Zen.) to be that supreme "reason whereby the world is governed and directed," or more minutely thus; that reason whereby the things that have been were; the things that now are have a present existence; and the things that are to be shall be. Reason you see, or wisdom in the Deity, is an antecedent cause whence both providence and inferior nature are derived. It is added in Stobæus, that Chrysippus sometimes varies his terms; and instead of the word reason, substitutes the words truth, cause, nature, necessity: intimating that fate is the true, natural, necessary cause of the things that are, and of the manner in which they are. 2. This fate is said to be ἐξ αἰδίου, from everlasting. Nor improperly: since the constitution of things was settled and fixed in the divine mind (where they had a sort of ideal existence) previous to their actual creation; and therefore, considered as certainly future in his decree, may be said to have been, in some sense, co-eternal with himself. 3. The immutable and perpetual complication, mentioned in the definition, means no more than that reciprocal involution of causes and effects from God downwards, by which things and events, positis omnibus ponendis, are necessarily produced, according to the plan which infinite wisdom designed from the beginning. God, the first cause, hath given being and activity to an immense number of secondary, subaltern causes, which are so inseparably linked and interwoven with their respective effects (a connection truly admirable, and not to be comprehended by man in his present state), that those things which do in reality come to pass necessarily, and by inevitable destiny, seem to the superficial observer to come to pass in the common course of nature, or by virtue of human reasoning and freedom. This is that inscrutable method of divine wisdom, "A quâ" (says St. Austin) "est omnis modus, omnis species, omnis ordo, mensura, numerus, pondus; à quâ sunt semina formarum, formæ seminum, motus seminum atque formarum."

Necessity is the consequence of fate. So Trismegistus: All things are brought about by nature and by fate: neither is any place void of providence. Now providence is the self-perfect reason of the super-celestial God: from which reason of his issue two native powers, necessity and fate. Thus, in the judgment of the wiser heathens, effects were to be traced up to their producing causes; those producing causes were to be further traced up to the still higher causes by which they were produced; and those higher causes to God the cause of them. Persons, things, circumstances, events, and consequences, are the effects of necessity: necessity is the daughter of fate: fate is the offspring of God's infinite wisdom and sovereign will. Thus all things are ultimately resolved into their great primary cause; by whom the chain was originally let down from heaven, and on whom every link depends.

It must be owned that all the fatalists of antiquity (particularly among the Stoics) did not constantly express themselves with due precision. A Christian who is savingly taught by the word and Spirit of God, must be pained and disgusted, not to say shocked, when he reads such an assertion as this: Τὴν πεπρωμένην μορὰν ἀδύνατον εἶναι ἀποφύγειν καὶ Θεῷ. God himself cannot possibly avoid his destiny (Herodot 1.) or that of the poet Philemon :

Ἄλλοι βασιλέων εἰσιν, οἱ βασιλεὺς θεῶν
Ὁ θεὸς ἀναγκῆς.

Common men are servants to kings ; kings are servants to the Gods ; and God is a servant to necessity. So Seneca : "Eadem necessitas et Deos alligat : irrevocabilis divina pariter atque humana cursus vehit. Ille ipse, omnium conditor ac rector, scripsit quidem fata, sed sequitur. Semper parat : semel jussit." The self-same necessity binds the Gods themselves. All things divine, as well as human, are carried forward by one identical and overpowering rapidity. The supreme Author and Governor of the universe hath indeed written and ordained the fates ; but having once ordained them, he ever after obeys them. He commanded them at first, for once : but his conformity to them is perpetual. This is without doubt very irreverently and very incautiously expressed.—Whence it has been common with many Christian writers to tax the Stoics with setting up a first cause, superior to God himself, and on which he is dependent.

But I apprehend these philosophers meant in reality no such thing. All they designed to inculcate was that the will of God and his decrees are unchangeable : that there can be no alteration in the divine intention ; no new act arise in his mind ; no reversion of his eternal plan ; all being founded in adorable sovereignty ; ordered by infallible wisdom ; ratified by omnipotence ; and cemented with immutability. Thus Lucan :

Finixit in æternum causas ; quæ cuncta coercet,
Se quoque lege tenens.

And this, not through any imbecility in God, or as if he was subject to fate, of which (on the contrary) himself was the ordainer ; but because it is his pleasure to abide by his own decree. For as Seneca observes, "Immutatio majestatis sit, et confessio erroris, mutanda fecisse. Necesse est ei eadem placere, qui nisi optima placere non possunt." it would detract from the greatness of God, and look as if he acknowledged himself liable to mistakes, was he to make changeable decrees : his pleasure must necessarily be always the same ; seeing that only which is best can at any time please an all-perfect being. A good man (adds this philosopher) is under a kind of pleasing necessity to do good ; and, if he did not do it he could not be a good man.

"Magnum hoc argumentum est firmæ vo- luntatis, ne mutare quidem posse :" it is a striking proof of a magnanimous will to be absolutely incapable of changing. And such is the will of God, it never fluctuates nor varies. But, on the other hand, was he susceptible of change ; could he, through the intervention of any inferior cause, or by some untoward combination of external circumstances, be induced to recede from his purpose and alter his plan ; it would be a most incontestible mark of weakness and dependence : the force of which argument made Seneca, though a heathen, cry out, "Non externa Deos cogunt ; sed sua illis in legem æterna voluntas est : outward things cannot compel the Gods ; but their own eternal will is a law to themselves. It may be objected that this seems to infer as if the Deity was still under some kind of restraint. By no means. Let Seneca obviate this cavil ; as he effectually does, in these admirable words : "Nec Deus ab hoc minùs liber aut potens est, ipse enim est necessitas sua : God is not hereby either less free, or less powerful ; for he himself is his own necessity.

On the whole, it is evident that when the Stoics speak, even in the strongest terms, of the obligation of fate on God himself, they may and ought to be understood in a sense worthy of the adorable, uncreated Majesty.—In thus interpreting the doctrine of fate, as taught by the genuine philosophers of the Portico, I have the great St Austin on my side : who after canvassing, and justly rejecting, the bastard or astrological fate ; thus goes on : "At qui omnium connectionem seriemque causarum, quæ sit omne quod sit, fati nomine appellant ; non multum cum eis, de verbî controversiâ, certandum atque laborandum est : quandoquidem ipsum causarum ordinem, et quandam connectionem, summi Dei tribuunt voluntati : i. e. But for those philosophers [meaning the Stoics] who, by the word fate mean that regular chain and series of causes to which all things that come to pass owe their immediate existence ; we will not earnestly contend with these persons about a mere term ; and we the rather acquiesce in their manner of expression because they carefully ascribe this fixed succession of things, and this mutual concatenation of causes and effects, to the will of the Supreme God. Austin adds many observations of the same import ; and proves from Seneca himself, as rigid a Stoic as any, that this was the doctrine and the meaning of his philosophic brethren.

A LETTER

TO THE

REV. MR. JOHN WESLEY;

RELATIVE TO HIS PRETENDED

ABRIDGMENT

ZANCHIUS ON PREDESTINATION.

ÆNEID II.

Credulitate, Puer; Audacia, Juvenis; Deliriis, Senex.

Mr. DE BOZE' Epitaph on HARDOVIN, the French Jesuit.

NINE months are now elapsed since the first publication of this letter; in all which time Mr. W. has neither apologized for the misdemeanor which occasioned his hearing from me in this public manner, nor attempted to answer the charges entered against him. Judging, probably, that the former would be too condescending in one who has erected himself into the leader of a sect, and that the latter would prove rather too difficult a task, and involve him in a subsequent train of fresh detections, he has prudently omitted both.

Some of his followers, however, have not been so tamely inactive, on this occasion, as their pastor. Anxious, at once, to palliate his offence and to screen his timidity, several penny and two-penny defences have successively appeared: wherein the anonymous scribblers wretchedly endeavoured to gather up, and put together, the fragments of a shattered reputation. The very printers, the mid-wives who handed these "insects of a day" into public existence, were ashamed to subjoin their names at the bottom of the title pages.

Two lay-preachers, in particular, have feebly taken up the cudgels for their master. Of one I shall say very little, as he writes with some degree of decency. Of the other I shall not say much; for both his talents and his morals sink him far below the dignity of chastisement. This illiterate "haberdasher of small wares" entitles his penny effusion, as well as I remember, "A Letter of thanks to the Reverend Mr. Toplady, in the Names of all the hardened Sinners in London and Westminster." The poor creature, it is plain from his title-page, aims at humour; and yet unhappily for such a design, he is in reality but too literally qualified to act as secretary in chief to the sinners of London and Westminster. For he has given very numerous and ample proofs, of his own sinnership, and that there can hardly exist, in those two cities, a more atrocious sinner than himself. I will not pollute this paper with a recital of his crimes. They who know the man are no strangers to his communication. Though a doctrinal Pharisee, his life has, long ago, evinced him a practical Sadducee. Surely, Arminianism is likely to flourish mainly under the auspices of such able and virtuous advocates!

And so much for Mr. Wesley's redoubtable subalterns.

What image of their fury can we form?
 Dulness and rage. A puddle in a storm.

If my advice carries any weight with them, they will carefully peruse their spelling-books before they make another sally from the press. As to themselves and their refined productions, I mean to take no farther notice of either. I am quite of Mr. Gay's opinion;

To shoot at crows is powder thrown away.

I had almost forgot the monthly reviewers. One word concerning them, and I have done. The two reverend gentlemen who are hired to dissect and characterize whatever comes within the divinity-department, à calendis ad calendis, would fain have it, in their superficial strictures on the first edition of this letter, than I am angry with Mr. Wesley. If, by anger, the ingenious animadvertisers mean a just and becoming disapprobation of Mr. Wesley's lying abridgment, and of the surreptitious manner in which he snuggled it into the world, I acknowledge myself, in this respect, angry. I hope the reverend reviewers will not, in their turn, be angry too, at seeing themselves tacked to the list of Mr. Wesley's allies: since, in their mode of representing my dispute (or, to adopt their own military term, my battle) with that gentleman, they seem to rank themselves in the number of his seconds. The reason is obvious. Mr. W. is a red-hot Arminian: and the sagacious doctors can discern, with half an eye, that Arminianism lies within a bow-shot of Socinianism and Deism. Yet, notwithstanding the alliance is thus not altogether unnatural, why should these two divines, who are, certainly, possessed of abilities which might do honour to human nature, by a narrow, sordid attachment to party, render those abilities less respectable?

Broad Hembury, January, 9 1771.

SIR,

Probably the following letter may fall into the hands of some who are unacquainted with the merits of the occasion on which I write. For the information of such, I must premise that, in November, 1769, I published a Two Shilling Pamphlet, entitled "The Doctrine of Absolute Predestination stated and asserted: with a preliminary Discourse on the Divine Attributes. Translated, in great measure, from the Latin of Jerom Zanchius."

Though you are neither mentioned, nor alluded to, throughout the whole book, yet it could hardly be imagined that a treatise apparently tending to lay the axe to the root of those pernicious doctrines which, for more than thirty years past, you have endeavoured to palm on your credulous followers, with all the sophistry of a jesuit, and the dictatorial authority of a pope, should long pass without some censure from the hand of a restless Arminian, who has so eagerly endeavoured to distinguish himself as the bellwether of his deluded thousands.

Accordingly, in the month of March, 1770, out sneaks a printed paper (consisting of one sheet, folded into twelve pages; price one penny) entitled, "The Doctrine of Absolute Predestination stated and asserted, by the Reverend Mr. A——— T———." Wherein you pretend to give an abridgment of the pamphlet above referred to. But,

1. Why did you not make your abridgment truly public? For an apparent reason: that, if possible it might elude my knowledge, and so escape the rod. Born of a stolen embrace, it was needful for the spurious pusillanimous performance to steal its way into the world. It privately crept abroad from the Foundry, the seat of its nativity; it was sold indeed, but sold under the rose; it was carefully circulated in the dark, and the friends of Mr. Wesley were designed to be the sole sphere of its acquaintance. Thus every one that doth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deed should be reproved. In such conduct, I can discern much of the Jesuit, but nothing of the saint.—I had to this hour remained unapprized of the secret stab, but for the information received from some of superior integrity to yourself.—I will put Christianity quite out of the question, and suppose it to have no kind of influence. But should you not at least act as a man of common honour? Come forth openly, sir, in future, like an honest generous assailant; and, from this moment forward, disdain to act the ignoble part of a lurking sly assassin.

2. Why did you not abridge me faithfully and fairly? Why must you lard your ridiculous compendium with additions and interpolations of your own; especially as you took the liberty of prefixing my name to it? Your reasons are obvious. My publication had spread among some of your people: and the longer it continued to diffuse itself, the more you trembled for your Diana. Hence, Demetrius like, you found it needful, by the help of a pious fraud, to prejudice your Ephesians against the doctrines of St. Paul. The book was likely to give the Arminian Babel a shake: therefore, no way so effectual to secure it as by endeavouring to spike the cannon which was planted against it. That you might seem to gratify the curiosity of your partisans, and keep them really hood-winked at the same time, you draw up a flimsy, partial compendium of Zanchius: a compendium which exhibits a few detached propositions, placed in the most disadvantageous point of view, and without including any part of the evidence on which they stand.

But this alone was not sufficient to compass the desired end. Unsatisfied with carelessly and totally suppressing every proof alleged by Zanchius in support of his argument; a false colouring must likewise be superinduced, by inserting a sentence or two now and then of your own foisting in. After which you close the motley piece, with an entire paragraph, forged every word of it by yourself: and conclude all, as you began, with subjoining the initials of my name: to make the ignorant believe that the whole, with your omissions, additions, and alterations, actually came from me.—An instance of audacity and falsehood hardly to be paralleled!

I am very far from desiring the reader to take my word in proof of the charge alleged against you. As an instance of your want of honour, veracity, and justice, I refer to the following paragraph, 1. as published by me; and, 2. as quoted by you.

1 "When all the trans- actions of Providence and grace are wound up in the last day, he (Christ) will then properly sit as Judge, and openly publish, and solemnly ratify, if I may so, say his everlasting decrees, by receiving the elect, body and soul, into glory: and by passing sentence on the non-elect (not for having done what they could not help, but) for their wilful ignorance of divine things and their obstinate unbelief; for their omissions of moral duty, and for their repeated iniquities and transgressions."

Doct. of Abs. Predest.

2 "In the last day, Christ will sit as Judge and openly publish and solemnly ratify his everlasting decrees, by receiving the elect into glory, and by passing sentence on the non-elect (not for having done what they could not help, but) for their wilful ignorance of divine things and their obstinate unbelief; for their omissions of moral duty, and for their repeated iniquities and transgressions which they could not help." Wesley's Abridgement, p. 9.

Whether my view of the doctrine itself be, in fact, right or wrong is no part of the present enquiry: the question is, have you quoted me fairly? Blush, Mr. Wesley, if you are capable of blushing. For once publicly acknowledge yourself to have acted criminally: "unless," to use your own words on another occasion, "shame and you have shook hands and parted."

Your concluding paragraph, which you have the effrontery to palm on the world as mine, runs thus: "(a) The sum of all this: one in twenty (suppose) of mankind are elected; nineteen in twenty are reprobated. The elect shall be saved, do what they will; the reprobate shall be damned, do what they can. Reader, believe this, or be damned. Witness my hand, A—— T——."

In almost any other case, a similar forgery would transmit the criminal to Virginia or Maryland, if not to Tyburn. If such an opponent can be deemed an honest man, where shall we find a knave?—What would you think of me, were I infamous enough to abridge any treatise of yours, sprinkle it with interpolations, and conclude it thus: "Reader, buy this book, or be damned, witness my hand, John Wesley?"

And is it thus you contend for victory? are these the weapons of your warfare? Is this bearing down those who differ from you with meekness? Do you call this binding with cords of love? Away, for shame, with such disingenuous artifices. At least, endeavour to conceal that narrow sectarian spirit, which betrays itself more or less in almost every thing you write. Renounce the low serpentine cunning, which puts you on falsifying what you find yourself unable to refute. And, as you regard your character and the cause you espouse, dismiss those dirty subterfuges (the last resources of mean malicious impotence), which degrade the man of parts into a lying sophister, and sink a divine beneath the level of an oyster-woman. Cease to fight like the French, with old nails and broken glass. Charge fairly and fire as forcibly as you can. But if you persist to employ the weapons of scurrility and falsehood, the splinters will not only recoil on yourself, but you will continue to be posted for a theological coward.

And why should you, of all people in the world, be so very angry with the doctrines of grace? Forget not the days and months that are past. Remember that it once depended on the toss of a shilling, whether you yourself should be a Calvinist or an Arminian. Tails fell uppermost, and you resolved to be an universalist. It was a happy throw which consigned you to the tents of Arminius: for it saved us from the company of a man who, by a kind of religious gambling peculiarly his own, risked his faith on the most contemptible of all lots; and was capable of tossing up for his creed as porters or chairmen toss up for a halfpenny.

I have read of princes and other eminent persons, who, having risen from ignoble life to greatness, took care to have some striking memorials of their former obscurity frequently in their view, by way of a counterpoise to pride, and as a preservative from being exalted above measure. When from the pinnacle of your own importance you look down upon the advocates for free-grace, and consider them as reptiles, to be treated as you please, only recollect the humbling circumstance of which I have just reminded you: and repress the complacent swellings of self-adulation, by some such soliloquy as this: "I have been in danger myself of believing that St. Paul says true, when he declares that God hath mercy on whom he will have mercy. How precious was the shilling, and above all how lucky was the throw, which convinced me of St. Paul's mistake!" Forgive us if we as implicitly determine our faith by the Scriptures as you determined yours by the fall of the splendid shilling.

But even since this memorable epoch, you have by no means proved yourself that steady Arminian you would have the world believe. Proteus like, you disdain to be shackled and circumscribed by any certain form. Her ladyship of Loretto, though she has a different suit for every day in the year, is semper eadem, when compared with the quondam fellow of Lincoln College. There are times when you vary as much from your preceding self, as you do at all times from the rest of mankind. Possessed of more than serpentine elability, you cast your slough not once a year, but almost once an hour. Hence your innumerable inconsistencies and flagrant self-contradictions; the jarring of your principles (ever at intestine war with each other), and the incoherence of your religious system. Your scheme of doctrines reminds me of the feet of a certain visionary image, which, as the sacred penman acquaints us, seemed to be composed of iron and clay—heterogeneous materials, which may, indeed be put together, but will never incorporate with each other. Somewhat like the necromantic soup, of which you have probably read in the tragedy of Macbeth; your doctrines may be stirred into a chaotic jumble, but witchcraft itself would strive in vain to bring them into coalition.—On the contrary, evangelical truth knows nothing of this harlequin assemblage. It is not like Joseph's coat of many colours; nor made up of a patch from Donatus, of another from Pelagius, and a third from Arminius: but is invariably simple, uniform, and harmonious; resembling the robe of its adorable Teacher, which was without seam, and woven from the top throughout.

On one occasion you had the candour to own your levity, as to points of faith. I am acquainted with a very respectable person (Mr. J. D.) who, not many years ago, taking the freedom to tell you that "your prejudices, like armed men, stood with their swords ready drawn, to guard all the passes of conviction, and hew down every truth as fast as it presented itself to your mind;" you had the unusual honesty to answer, "Ah! sir! if you knew how distressed I have been what doctrines I should embrace, and how I have been tossed about from system to system, you would think me the most open to conviction, and the least liable to prejudice of any man you ever knew."—This answer did you real honour, for I am persuaded you spoke true. Yet why should you, who have been so remarkably tossed about, take upon you to revile those who have been enabled to stand fast? I hope for your own sake that you will never cease tossing about, until you have gained the harbour of truth: and that, amidst all your manifold shifting from system to system, you will at length be enabled to fix on the only right system, which asserts the lawfulness of God's doing what he will with his own.

I am told the penny-sheet (which occasions this free address), is to be followed, some time hence, by a four-penny pamphlet against Zanchius: wherein you are to be siege the doctrine of predestination in form. Commence the siege, and welcome. Open your trenches and plant your batteries. Bring forth your strong arguments and play them off with vigour. I publicly profess, and subscribe my name to it, that if I cannot beat you back, I will freely capitulate and own myself conquered. But remember that if you would do any thing to purpose you must make a regular attack. You must encounter the whole of Zanchius, and take his arguments in their regular connection and dependency on each other. You must go through with my preface, which I prefixed to my translation of that great man. Having carried and dismantled the out-work, you must next proceed to demolish the disertation on the divine attributes: which having destroyed, you are then to assail the citadel; I mean those five stubborn chapters which make up the body of the treatise itself. All the allies or the arguments drawn from Scripture and reason, must likewise be put to the sword. This should you attempt to do in a manner worthy of a scholar and a divine, I shall have no objection (if life and health continue) to measuring swords, or breaking a pike, with you. Controversy properly conducted is a friend to truth, and no enemy to benevolence. When the flint and the steel are in conflict some sparks may issue, which may both warm and enlighten.—But I have no notion of encountering a wind-mill in lieu of a giant. If, therefore you come against me (as now) with straws instead of artillery, and with chaff in the room of ammunition, I shall disdain to give you battle: I shall only laugh at you from the ramparts.

Much less, if you descend to your customary resource of false quotations, despicable invective, and unsupported dogmatism, shall I hold myself obliged again to enter the lists with you. An opponent who thinks to add weight to his arguments by scurrility and abuse, resembles the insane person, who rolled himself in mud, in order to make himself fine. I would no more enter into a formal controversy with such a scribbler, than I would contend for the wall with a chimney-sweeper.

When some of your friends gave out, two or three months before your late doughty publication, that Mr. John (as they call you) was shutting himself up (b), in order to answer the translator of Zanchius; I really imagined that something tolerably respectable was going to make its appearance. But

Quid dignum tanto tulit hic promissor hiatus?

After the teeming mountain had been

(b) Dreadful his thunders, while unprinted roar,
But when once published, they are heard no more.

So distant bug-bears fright: but, nearer draw,
The block's a block, and turns to mirth your awe.
DR. YOUNG.

shut up a competent time, long enough to have been brought to bed of a Hercules, forth creeps a puny toothless mouse! a mouse of heterogeneous kind: having little more than its head and tail (c) from you; and the main of its body made up of some mangled, castrated citations from Zanchius.

—Currente rotâ, cur urceus exit?

If I may judge of the future, by the past, and unless you amend greatly in a short time, your four-penny supplement, when it appears, will be no less inconsiderable than the penny sheet already extant. And, as the mouse is not cheap at a penny, I am very apprehensive the rat, when it ventures out, will be far too dear at a groat.

Hitherto your treatment of Zanchius resembles that of some clumsy, bungling anatomist: who in the dissection of an animal dwells much on the larger and more obvious particulars; but quite omits the nerves, the lymphatics, the muscles, and the most interesting parts of the complicate machine. Thus, in your piddling extract from the pamphlet, you have thought proper to curtail, you only give a few of the larger outlines; without at all entering into the spirit of the subject, or so much as producing (so far from attempting to refute) any of the turning points, on which the argument depends. Wrench the finest eye that ever shone in a lady's head from its socket, and it will appear frightful and deformed: whereas, in its natural connection, the symmetry and brilliancy, the expressiveness and the beauty, are conspicuous. So it often fares with authors. A detached sentence, artfully misplaced, or unseasonably introduced, maliciously applied, or unfairly cited, may appear to carry an idea the very reverse of its real meaning. But re-place the dislocated passage, and its propriety and importance are restored. I would wish every unprejudiced person, into whose hands your abridgment of my translation has fallen, to suspect his judgment concerning it until he sees the translation itself. On comparing the two together, he will at once perceive how candid and honest you are; and what quantity of confidence may be reposed on your integrity as a citer.

When I advert to the unjust and indecent manner in which you attacked the late excellent Mr. Hervey; above all, when I consider how daringly free you have made with the Scriptures themselves, both in your commentaries, and in your alterations of the text itself; I cease to wonder at the audacious licentiousness of your pen respecting me. I should rather wonder if you treated any opponent with equity, or canvassed any subject impartially. Rise but once to this, and I shall both wonder and rejoice.

You give me to understand that I am but "a young translator." Granted. Better however to be a young translator than an old plagiary. Which of our ancient divines have you not evaporated and spoiled? and then made them speak a language, when dead, which they would have started from, with horror, when alive? (d)

Yet Brutus is an honourable man!

How miserably have you pillaged even my publication? Books, when sent into the world, are no doubt in some sense public property. Zanchius, if you chose to buy him, was yours to read; and, if you thought yourself equal to the undertaking, was yours to answer: but he was not yours to mangle. Remember how narrowly you escaped a prosecution some years ago, for pirating the Poems of Dr. Young.

I would wish you to keep your hands from literary picking and stealing. However, if you cannot refrain from this kind of stealth, you can abstain from murdering what you steal. You ought not, with Ahab, to kill as well as take possession: nor, giant like, to strew the area of your den with the bones of such authors as you have seized and slain.

On most occasions you are too prone to set up your own infallible judgment as the very lapis lydius of right and wrong. Hence the firebrands, arrows and death, which you hurl at those, who presume to vary from the oracles you dictate. Hence particularly your illiberal and malevolent spleen against the Protestant dissenters; (e)

(c) The advertisement, on the back-side of Mr. Wesley's title-page; and his concluding paragraph, p. 12.

(d) See almost every part of what Mr. Wesley miscalls the Christian Library.

(e) "How little is the case mended at the meeting! either the teachers are new-light men, denying the Lord that bought them; or they are predestinarians, and so preach predestination and final perseverance, more or less. Nor is it expedient for any methodist preacher to imitate the dissenters in their manner of praying: either in his tone, or in his language, or in the length of his prayer. Neither should we sing, like them, in a slow, drawing manner. We sing swift, both because it saves time, and because it tends to awake and enliven the soul."

Mr. Wesley's Preserv. against Unsettled Notions, p. 245.

How much more civilly, not to say cordially, this gentleman shakes hands with the Papists, let his own words declare: "Can nothing be done, even allowing us, on both sides, to retain our own opinions, for the softening our hearts towards each other? My dear friend, consider. I am not persuading you to leave or change your religion: but to follow after that fear and love of God without which all religion is vain. I say not a word to you about your opinions or outward manner of worship.—We ought, without this endless jangling about opinions, to provoke one another to love and to good works. Let the points wherein we differ stand aside. Here are enough wherein we agree.—O brethren, let us not still fall out by the way!

Mr. Wesley's Letter to a Roman Catholic, p. 4, 8-10.

Far be it from me to charge Mr. Wesley with a fondness for all the grosser parts of Popery. Yet I fear the partition between that Church and him is somewhat thinner than might be wished. Or rather, like the loving Pyramis and Thisbe, they endeavour to remedy the want of a perfect coalition, by kissing each other through a hole in the wall.

though yourself are, in many respects a dissenter of the worst kind. I would not however by this declaration be understood as if I meant to dishonour that respectable body by classing you with them; for you stand alone, and are a dissenter of a cast peculiar to yourself. And yet, like Henry I., you are for making the length of your own arm the standard-measure for every body else. No wonder therefore that you eminently inherit the fate of Ishmael; that your hand is against every man, and every man's hand against you. Strange! that one who pleads so strenuously for universal love in the Deity, should adopt so little of, the love for which he pleads! that a person of principles so large should have a heart so narrow! bigots of every denomination are much the same: and of all vices, bigotry is one of the meanest and most mischievous. Its shrivelled, contracted breast leaves no room for the noble virtues to dilate and play. Candour, benevolence, and forbearance, become smothered and extinguished: partly from being cramped by littleness of mind, partly from being overwhelmed with intellectual dust. Bigotry is a determined enemy to truth; inasmuch as it essentially interferes with freedom of enquiry, restrains the grand indefeasible right of private judgment, confines our regards to a party, and, by limiting the extent of moderation and mutual good-will, tears up charity by the very roots. In short, bigotry is the very essence of Popery; and too often leads its votaries, before they are aware, into the bosom of that pretended Church, whose doctrines and maxims are the worst corruption of the best religion that ever was. And though this baneful vice is so uncomfortable in itself; so contrary to the genius of the gospel; and so extensively pernicious in its effects; yet is it not as common as it is detestable? May all God's children be enabled to cast it, with the rest of their idols, to the moles and to the bats!

You have obliquely given me a sneering lecture upon "modesty, self-diffidence, and tenderness" to opponents: and it must be owned, that the lesson comes with a peculiar grace and quire in character from you. The words sound well: but, like many other prescribers, you say and do not. Else why do you represent me as telling my readers that they must, "upon pain of damnation believe, that only one person in twenty is elected?" Why do you introduce me as enjoining them to believe under the same penalty that "the elect shall be saved, do what they will; and the reprobate damned, do what they can?" This is a sample indeed of your own modesty, tenderness, and self-diffidence: but God forbid that I should give such dismal proof of mine. I believe and preach that the chosen and ransomed of the Lord are appointed to salvation though sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth: and, with regard to the rest, that they will be condemned, not for doing what they can in a moral way, but for not doing what they can: for not believing the gospel report; and for not ordering their conversation according to it.

Let me likewise ask you when or where I ever presumed to ascertain the number of God's elect? Point out the treatise and the page, wherein I assert that only "one in twenty of mankind are elected." The book of life is not in your keeping, nor in mine. The Lord, and the Lord only, knoweth them that are his. He alone who telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names, calleth also his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out, first from a state of sin into a state of grace, and then into the state of glory. Yet, as the learned and devout Beza expresses himself, "I shall never blush to abide by that simplicity which the Holy Spirit, speaking in the Scriptures, hath been pleased to adopt:" (f) and it is but too certain that in the Scriptures are such awful passages as these: Broad is the way and wide is the gate which leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat: while on the other hand, Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.—Many are called, but few chosen.—Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.— There is a remnant, according to the election of grace. Declarations of this tremendous import, instead of furnishing you with fuel for contention, and setting you on a presumptuous and fruitless calculation of the number that shall be saved or lost, should rather bring you on your knees before God, with your hand upon your breast and this cry in your lips: "Search me, O Lord, and try me; prove me also and examine my thoughts. Shew me to which class I belong. Give me solid proof that my name is in the Lamb's Book of Life, by making it clear to me that I am in the faith." And ever remember that true faith utterly disclaims all ground of pretension to justification and eternal life, but on the sole footing of God's absolute grace and the Messiah's finished redemption. Pelagianism is for serving the Deity as pope Celestine III. is said to have treated the emperor Hen. VI. It quite kicks off the crown from the head of sovereign grace; and makes the will of God bend and truckle and shape itself to the caprice of man. Arminianism, somewhat more specious, but altogether as pernicious, cuts the crown in two, by dividing the praise of salvation between God and man, and fairly runs away with half. On the contrary, that faith which is of divine operation acts like the emperor Charles V. when he retired from the throne: it resigns the crown entirely, and renounces it for ever, without reserving so much as a single jewel for itself.

Should the Holy Spirit vouchsafe to lead you thus far you will then no longer be ready to object that "the elect shall be saved, do what they will:" for you will know by heart-felt experience that the converted elect are, and cannot but be, ambitious to perform all those good works in which God hath ordained them to walk; and to act worthy of him who hath graciously and effectually called them to his kingdom and glory.

Your pretended fear of Antinomianism, like your real fear of the comet, which was expected to have appeared a few years back, is perfectly idle and chimerical. You publicly testified your apprehensions that the latter would dry up our rivers, and burn up our vegetables if not reduce the earth itself to a cinder. But your prophecies proved to be "the baseless fabric of a vision;" and our rivers, trees, and earth remain as they were.——Nor will the doctrines of grace, experimentally received into the heart, destroy or weaken the obligation of moral (g) virtue. On the contrary they will operate on the practice, not like your scorching comet on our globe, but like the genial beams of the sun, which diffuse gladness, and occasion fruitfulness wherever they arise. Whoever wishes in earnest to lead a new life must first cordially embrace the good old doctrine of salvation by grace alone.—In short, your own tenet of sinless perfection leads directly to the grossest Antinomianism. I once knew a lady whom you had inveigled into your pale, and who in a short space professed herself perfect. Being in her company some time after, I pointed out a part of her conduct which to me seemed hardly compatible with a sinless state. Her answer was to this effect: "You are no competent judge of my behaviour. You are not yourself perfectly sanctified; and therefore see my tempers and actions through a false medium. I may to you seem angry: but my anger is only Christian zeal."—I could, moreover mention the names of some of your quondam followers who, from professing themselves sinless, have cast off all appearance of godliness, and are working all manner of iniquity with greediness. If you are in search of Antinomians, truly and justly so called, you must look for them, not among those whom you term Calvinists, but among your own hair-brained (h) perfectionists. Had not you yourself (to remind you of but one instance) a proof of it not very long ago? You formed a scheme of collecting as many perfect ones as you could, to live together under one roof. A number of these flowers were accordingly transplanted from some of your nursery-beds to the hot-house. And a hot-house it soon proved. For would we believe it? the sinless people quarrelled in a short time at so violent a rate that you found yourself forced to disband the select regiment. Had you kept them together much longer, that line would have been literally verified in these squabbling members of your Church Militant;

The males pulled noses, and the females caps.

A very small house, I am persuaded, would hold the really perfect upon earth. You might drive them all into a nutshell. But to return.

I cannot dismiss your objection concerning the supposed fewness of God's truly elect people without observing that, how few soever they may appear, and really be in a single generation, and as balanced with

(g) Consciousness of guilt and dread of detection frequently put bad men upon entering those accusations against their opponents, which without such a timely precaution, they are justly apprehensive will be charged upon themselves, like the apostate spirits in Milton, who were for turning their own torments into weapons against heaven. Such is the prudent conduct of very many Arminians. Fully aware that their own lives are none of the best, they affect to cry out against Calvinism, as though she was the very mother and nurse of licentiousness. Were she really so, what myriads would desert the standard of Arminius, and flock to the banner of Calvin! But all who are capable of discernment know that the pretended licentious tendency of Calvinism (so called) is no more than idle flourish and empty declamation. Were the doctrines of grace unfavourable to strict morality, we should quickly see them the reigning system of the age. On the contrary, they are therefore at present unfashionable because they make no allowance for the wickedness of the wicked. It is a fundamental axiom with us, who abide by the principles of the Reformation, that holiness of heart and life is (not the cause, price or condition, but, which adds infinitely stronger security to the interests of moral virtue) an essential and inseparable part of that very salvation to which the elect were chosen from everlasting. A Calvinist must consequently renounce both the letter and the spirit of his own constitutive principles (i.e. he must cease to be a Calvinist), ere he can consistently degenerate into a sensualist.

(h) I might with too much justice add that some of Mr. W.'s own lay preachers are indisputably to be numbered among practical Antinomians. These, however, are regarded by their partizans as very excellent men, that have not yet attained to perfection, though they are in a fair way for it.—If Mr. Wesley should have the front to deny that any of his preaching mechanics are men of loose lives, I have it in my power to appeal to facts, which a tenderness for those persons as individuals of mankind, and a concern for the honour of human nature in general, restrain me at present from holding up to public view. Nor would I be thought to hint at these things with pleasurable triumph. I feel too strongly for the interests of Christian obedience, and for the happiness of souls, to exult over the vices of the vicious. But, when men, whose lives would be a disgrace to heathenism; when men, whom Socrates or Seneca would have blushed to own for disciples, take upon them to arraign the doctrines of the Scriptures, and of our established Church, under a pretence of guarding against those immoralities of which they themselves are notorious and noon-day examples; what can such shameless ruffians expect but to have their own real crimes deservedly exposed?

the many unrighteous among whom they live below, yet when the whole number of the Redeemer's jewels is made up—when the entire harvest of his saints is gathered in—when his complete mystic body is presented collectively before the throne of his Father; they will amount to an exceeding great multitude which no man can number. On earth the company of the faithful may to us, who know but in part, resemble Elijah's cloud, which, at first, seemed no bigger than a man's hand; whereas, in the day of God, they will be found to overspread the whole heavens. They may appear now, to use Isaiah's phrase, but as two or three berries on the top of a bough, or as four or five in the most fruitful branches thereof; but they shall then be like the tree in Nebuchadnezzar's vision, the height of which reached unto heaven, and the sight of it to the end of all the earth; the leaves whereof were fair and the fruit thereof much. The kingdom of glory will both be more largely and more variously peopled than bigots of all denominations are either able to think, or willing to allow.

Go now, sir, and dazzle the credulous with your mock victory over the supposed reprobation of "nineteen in twenty." Go on to chalk hideous figures on your waistcoat; and enjoy the glorious triumph of battering your knuckles in fighting them. But father no more of your hideous figures on me. Do not dress up scare-crows of your own, and then affect to run away from them as mine. I do not expect to be treated by Mr. John Wesley with the candour of a gentleman, or the meekness of a Christian; but I wish him, for his reputation's sake, to write and act with the honesty of a heathen.

You affect to be deemed a minister of the national Church. Why then do you decry her doctrines, and, as far as in you lies, sap her discipline? That you decry her doctrines needs no proof: witness, for example, the wide discrepancy between her decisions and yours on the articles of free-will, justification, predestination, perseverance, and sinless perfection; to say nothing concerning your new-fangled doctrine of the intermediate state of departed souls (i).

That you likewise do not overflow with zeal for the discipline (k) of the Church of England is manifest, not only from the numerous and intricate regulations, with which you fetter (l) your societies, but from the measures you lately pursued, when a foreign mendicant was in England, who went by the name of Erasmus and stiled himself bishop of Arcadia. This old gentleman passed for a prelate of the Greek Church; though to me it seems not improbable that he might rather be a member of the Romish. Thus much, however, is certain; that the

(i) In Mr. Wesley's first edition of his notes on the New Testament, published in 1755, are the two following assertions, than which even he himself has, perhaps, never given a more striking specimen of presumption and inconsistency. "Enoch and Elijah are not in heaven, but only in paradise;" Note on John iii. 13. "Enoch and Elijah entered at once into the highest degree of glory, without first waiting in paradise;" Note on Rev. xix. 20. This it is to be wise above what is written!

(k) Mr. Wesley's re-baptization of some adult persons is another proof of this charge. I could point out by name more than one who have undergone from his hand a reiteration of that sacred ceremony. I shall only at present mention a single instance, which I had from the person herself with permission to publish her name at full length, in case Mr. W. should deny the fact. Mrs. L. S. now living in Southwark, was baptized in a bathing-tub, in a cellar, by Mr. John Wesley; who at the time, held her down so very long under water, while he deliberately pronounced the words of the administration, that some friends of her's who were present screamed out, from an apprehension that she was actually drowned; and she herself was so far gone that she began to grow insensible, and was lifted out of the water but just time enough to save her life.—Yet this is the man who, in the writings which he has published to the world, professes to hold infant baptism, and that by sprinkling, not by immersion!

Quo tenam vultus mutantem Protea nodo?

(l) The rules of what Mr. Wesley calls Band Societies demonstrate the miserable servitude of those who are admitted into that gossiping club. The whole of these rules would be too tedious to insert. One or two of them, as samples of the rest, may not be unacceptable to the reader.

"To speak each of us in order, freely and plainly, the true state of our souls; with the faults we have committed, in thought, word, or deed; and the temptations we have felt since our last meeting.

To desire some person among us to speak his own state first, and then ask the rest in order as many and as searching questions as may be, concerning their state, sins, and temptations."

Among the questions proposed to such as are candidates for admission into this pretended Sanctum Sanctorum is the following:

"Is it your desire and design to be on this, and all other occasions, entirely open, so as to speak every thing that is in your heart without exception, without disguise, and without reserve?"

The printed account, whence these extracts were taken verbatim, adds, that the five following questions are to be asked at every meeting:

"1. What known sins have you committed, since our last meeting?"

"2. What temptations have you met with?"

"3. How were you delivered?"

"4. What have you thought said, or done, of which you doubt whether it be sin or not?"

"5. Have you nothing you desire to keep a secret?"

The reader, doubtless, will on this occasion be reminded of the Popish practice of auricular confession. For my own part I make no scruple to acknowledge that confession, as managed in the Church of Rome, is infinitely preferable to confession as conducted under the auspices of Mr. Wesley. In those countries where Popery is established, confession is made only to one person, and he a priest; who, if he divulges what is made known to him under the character of confessor, is liable by law to suffer death. But, in these Band Societies the most open and unreserved confession is, it seems, made in the hearing of a dozen or twenty old women and boys, who are at liberty to blab out all they hear, without being obnoxious to any penalty at all.

I shall only transcribe from the above account the two following rules imposed on these same societies:

"1. To wear no needless ornaments; such as rings, ear-rings, necklaces, lace, ruffles.

"2. To use no needless self-indulgencies; such as taking snuff or tobacco: unless prescribed by physicians."
